Section 2 directs that "the general assembly shall provide for levying a tax by valuation, so that every person or corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his or her property; such value to be ascertained by some person or persons to be elected or appointed in such manner as the general assembly shall direct, and not otherwise." Section 5 directs that "the corporate authorities of counties, townships, school districts, cities, towns and villages may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes; such taxes to be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same. And the general assembly shall require that all property within the limits of municipal corporations belonging to individuals shall be taxed for the payment of debts contracted under authority of law." The corresponding provisions of the constitution of 1870 are in substance the same.

The object of these sections is to secure uniformity of taxation. That, it is said in Bureau Co. v. C. B. & Q. R. R. Co., 44 Ill. 238, is to be regarded as the cardinal principle, the dominant idea of this article of the constitution. But uniformity in this connection is only another name for equality, for the provision is for "levying a tax by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his or her property." The value of the property being ascertained, the same rate of taxation must be laid upon all.

P operty is made the constitutional basis of taxation. This is not unreasonable. Governments are organized for the protection of persons and property, and the expenses of the protection may very properly be apportioned among the persons protected according to the value of their property protected.

The constitution does not undertake to fix the value of the property; neither does it prescribe any rules by which it is to be fixed That is left to the general assembly, for the provision in that respect is, "such value to be ascertained by some person or persons to be elected or appointed in such manner as the general assembly shall direct, and not otherwise." The mode and manner in which the persons appointed to make the valuation shall proceed, are left to the discretion of the general assembly. In fact, the whole machinery of taxation must be contrived and put in operation by the legislative department of the government.

As part of this machinery, taxation districts must be created. All property within the district must be taxed by a uniform rate. If property is actually within a district it is but proper that the legislature should provide that it should be listed, valued, and assessed there. In fact, the last clause of section 5, article IX., seems to make that a duty, for it provides that the general assembly shall require that all property within the limits of municipal corporations, belonging to individuals, shall be taxed for the payment of debts contracted under authority of law.

This power of locating personal property for the purpose of taxation, without regard to the residence of the owner, has been often exercised in Illinois and sustained by the courts. City of Dunleith v. Reynolds, 53 Ill. 45. Since the adoption of the constitution of 1870, which did not enlarge the powers of the general assembly in this particular, very extended legislation has been had with a view to such location. Thus, live stock and other personal property used upon a farm must be listed and assessed where the farm is situated; property in the hands of agents at the place where the business of the agent is transacted; water-craft where they are enrolled, or, if not enrolled, where they are kept; the property of bankers, brokers, merchants, manufacturers, and many other classes of persons specially enumerated, at the place where their business is carried on. This became necessary in order that the burdens of taxation might be equally distributed among those who should bear them.

We do not understand the counsel for the appellee to dispute this power where the property is tangible and capable of having so to speak, an actual situs of its own; but he claims that if it is tangible it can not be separated from the person of its owner. It must be borne in mind that all this property, intangible though it may be, is within the state. That which belongs to non-residents is there by operation of law. That which belongs to residents is there by reason of their residence. All the owners have submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the state, and they must obey its will when kept within the limits of constitutional power.

The question is then presented whether the general assembly, having complete jurisdiction over the person and theproperty, could separate a bank share from the person of the owner for the purposes of taxation. It has never been doubted that it was a proper exercise of legislative power and discretion to separate the interest of a partner in partnership property from his person for that purpose, and to cause him to be taxed on its account at the place where the business of the partnership was carried on. And this, too, without reference to the character of the business or the property. The partnership may have been formed for the purpose of carrying on mercantile, banking, brokerage, or stock business. The property may be tangible or intangible, goods on the shelf or debts due for goods sold. The interest of the partner in all the property is made taxable at the place where the business is located.

A share of bank stock may be in itself intangible, but it represents that which is tangible. It represents money or capital invested in the capital stock of the bank. That capital is employed in business by the bank, and the business is very likely carried on at a place other than the residence of some of the shareholders. The shareholder is protected in his person by the government at the place where he resides, but his property in this stock is protected at the place where the bank transacts his business. If he were a partner of a private bank doing business at the same place, he might be taxed there on account of his interest in the partnership. It is not easy to see why, upon the same principle, he may not be taxed there on account of his stock in an incorporated bank. His business is there as much in one case as in the other He requires for it the protection of the government there, and it seems reasonable that he should be compelled to contribute there to the expenses of maintaining that government. It certainly can not be an abuse of legislative discretion to require him to do so. If it is not, the general assembly can rightfully locate his shares there for the purpose of taxation.

Digitized by Google

But it is said to be a violation of the constitutional rule of uniformity to compel the owner of a bank share to submit to taxation for this part of his property at a place other than his residence, because other residents are taxed for their personal property where they reside. It is a sufficient answer to this proposition to say that all persons owning the same kind of property are taxed as he is taxed. Absolute equality in taxation can never be attained. That system is the best which comes the nearest to it. The same rules can not be applied to the listing and valuation of all kinds of property. Railroads, banks, partnerships, manufacturing associations, telegraph companies, and each one of the numerous agencies of business which the inventions of the age are constantly bringing into existence, require different machinery for their purposes of taxation. The object should be to place the burden so that it will bear as nearly as possible equally upon all. For this purpose different systems, adjusted with reference to the valuation of different kinds of property, are adopted. The courts permit this. Thus, in a case in Illinois, involving the system adopted for the taxation of bank shares, it was said by the supreme court (McVeagh v. Chicago, 49 Ill. 329) "in view of this legislation it must be apparent that a system of taxation for bank shares was designed peculiar to itself and independent of the general revenue laws of the state," and the authority of the law was sustained and enforced.

Again, it is said the law in question destroys the uniformity of taxation, because it provides for the collection of the taxes assessed on account of this kind of property in an unusual way. The constitution does not require uniformity in the manner of collection. Uniformity in the assessment is all it demands. When assessed the tax may be collected in the manner the law shall provide, and this may be varied to suit the necessities of each case.

Since the decree was rendered in the circuit court, the Supreme Court of Illinois has passed upon this same question and declared the law of 1867 to be constitutional. We might have contented ourselves by acknowledging the authority of this decision, but we are willing not only to acknowledge its authority, but to admit its correctness.

We have not felt called upon to consider whether the general assembly could, under the provisions of the act of congress, provide for the taxation of shareholders at any other place within the state than that in which the bank is located. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case that it might tax them there.

Other questions have been discussed in the argument, and among them one which relates to the power of the bank to interfere in behalf of its stockholders in the manner which has been done. We have not deemed it necessary to pass upon any of these questions, as those already decided are conclusive of the case.

The decree of the circuit court is reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

DECREE REVERSED.

Removal of Causes from State to Federal Court —Act of July 27, 1866—Citizenship—Amount—Removal by Part of the Defendants.

JOHN McGINNITY v. FRANCIS A. WHITE et al.

United States Circuit Court, District of Nebraska, May Term, 1874.

Before DILLON and DUNDY, Judges.

1. Removal of Causes—Citizenship.—Under the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stats. at Large, 306), as to the removal of suits from a state court into the federal court, it is sufficient, it seems, as respects citizenship, that the defendant applying for the removal is, at the time of filing his petition therefor, a citizen of another state, and the plaintiff a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought.

2. ——. Amount in Dispute.—It is sufficient in such case that the matter in dispute exceeds $500 besides costs at the time when the right to the removal accrues and is applied for.

3. One of Several Defendants sued as co-partners may, if the other requisites exist, have the cause removed to the federal court so far as concerns himself.

On motion by the plaintiff to remand the cause to the state court because it was improperly removed to this court. The removal was ordered by the state court upon the petition of Francis A. White, one of the defendants.

The record shows that the plaintiff commenced his suit in the state court, February 28, 1870, demanding, in his petition, of the defendants, five in number, as co-partners, $1,000 for work and labor. A summons claiming that amount was served. The defendants separately demurred for misjoinder of causes of action and parties defendant. On the first day of April, 1870, the demurrers were sustained and leave given to the plaintiff to amend the petition in forty days. On May 12, 1870, an amended petition was filed against the same persons as co-partners, and claiming of them the "sum of $445, with interest thereon at ten per cent. per annum from January 21, 1870, * * * for work and labor before that date performed by the plaintiff for the said defendants, co-partners in business as aforesaid." The original petition referred to certain written contracts, but the amended petition does not.

On July 22, 1870, Francis A. White answered separately, traversing the petition, and especially denying that he was a co-partner with the other defendants, as alleged therein. One of the other defendants, G. Frederick White, answered separately to the same effect. The cause was continued, and at the December term, 1870, at the instance of the two defendants last named, the venue was changed to another state court, and in that court the cause was continued from time to time by stipulation until the 11th day of April, 1873, when the defendant, Francis A. White, filed his petition for its removal to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska, and offering surety, &c.

The petition was under the act of July 27, 1866, and states, inter alia, that "the petitioner, Francis A. White, is now, and since the 19th day of February, 1873, has been a citizen of the state of New Jersey; that the plaintiff is, and was at the time of bringing the suit, a citizen of Nebraska; that the amount in dispute exceeds $500, exclusive of costs; that all the defendants, except David Everest, are citizens of some other state than the state of Nebraska (naming the states); that there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as concerns the petitioner, without the presence of the other defendants as parties," &c. The petition offers surety, &c., and prays the removal of the suit to this court. The surety was accepted and an order made transferring the cause as prayed.

And now in this court the plaintiff moves to remand the same on two grounds:

1. The amount involved does not exceed $500.

2d. One of several alleged co-partners made defendants is not entitled to remove the cause, where some of his co-defendants are citizens of the state in which the suit is brought.

Stevenson and Hayward, for the plaintiff.

T. M. Marquette, for petitioner for removal.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—I. The petition for removal was under the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stats. at Large, 306). This enactment copies, in many respects, section 12 of the judiciary act as to the removal of causes into the federal courts, but it makes two important changes in that section; first, in authorizing, in certain cases, the removal by part of several defendants if some are citizens of the state where suit is brought, and others are aliens or citizens of some other state; second, in extending the time in which the application for the removal may be made, down to the trial or final hearing. But as respects the amount in the controversy, the language of the judiciary act is retained—"the matter in dispute must exceed the sum of $500, exclusive of costs."

Digitized by Google

In cases like the present the amount in controversy, for the purpose of the removal, is determined by the declaration or petition. In this case a demurrer to the original petition having been sustained, the plaintiff made his case by an amended petition filed May 12th, 1870, in which he claimed to recover $445 with ten per cent. interest from January 21, 1870. This is the only pleading on the record which the defendants were bound to answer, and the one upon which the defendant who subsequently applied to remove the cause, took issue. At the time when this amended petition was filed, and at the time when the petitioner for the removal of the cause took issue upon it, the sum demanded, including interest, did not amount to $500. But by continuances the cause remained pending in the state court until the 14th day of April, 1873 Meanwhile, to-wit: on the 19th day of February, 1873, the defendant, Francis A. White, who was served in Nebraska when the suit was originally commenced, became a citizen of New Jersey At the next term of the state court thereafter, he applied for the removal of the suit, and by this time, if interest on the sum demanded in the amended petition be included, the amount was more than $500.

Under these circumstances the question is, whether "the matter in dispute exceeded $500," within the meaning of act of July 27, 1866. Under the amendatory act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. at Large, 558), Mr. Justice MILLER has determined that a party to a suit who while it is pending becomes bona fide citizen of another state is entitled, if the other required conditions are met, to have the cause removed. Johnson v. Monell, 1 Woolworth, C. C. 370. As both acts give the right to apply for the removal "at any time before the trial or final hearing of the cause," I can see no difference in this respect between the act of 1866 and the act of 1867, and the reasoning in the case cited seems to be applicable here, and to favor the right of removal. Pending the suit in the state court, the defendant has in good faith become a non-resident of the state of Nebraska and a citizen of another state, and it is this which constitutes the substantial ground upon which the right, under the act of 1866, to the removal is based. If, then, the right to removal accrues upon the party becoming bona fide a non-resident citizen, is it not enough that the total amount then claimed against him by his adversary exceeds the sum of $500? The action being ex-contractu, the right to interest follows upon establishing the right to the principal sum, and may properly be included in determining the amount of the matter in dispute. I confess to doubts respecting the soundness of the foregoing view, but have adopted it because it seems to be equally consistent with the language of the act and more consistent with the reason and purpose of it than the opposite conclusion, denying the right to the removal on the ground that the amount was insufficient, when, if judgment should then be rendered by the state court, it would be for a sum greater than that which the act adopts as giving the defendant the right to the transfer.

II. This result makes it necessary to consider the other objection made by the plaintiff to the jurisdiction of this court, which is that the suit in its nature is not "one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy," so far as concerns the party applying for the removal, "without the presence of the other defendants as parties to the cause."

The five defendants are sued as co-partners for work and labor, and the separate answer of the defendant now before us puts in issue two cardinal propositions in the petition:

1st. That he was a partner with his co-defendants, and 2d. That the plaintiff is entitled to recover of him the amount claimed.

Under the legislation of congress and of the state of Nebraska, the plaintiff could have maintained an action against one or more of the defendants, and it would have been no cause of abatement that all the co-partners were not before the court.

If all the other defendants had failed to answer, the defendant who applied for the removal could have answered, as he did for himself, and the issues thus raised would have stood for trial. Why can they not be tried, as well in the federal as in the state court? And when tried, is not the controversy finally determined, so far as it concerns him, as effectually as if all the defendants were in the federal court?

If the plaintiff establishes that the defendant was a partner, and that the firm were indebted to him as he alleges, he recovers of the defendant and takes his judgment, and meanwhile his case proceeds as to the other defendants in the state court. And so, if the plaintiff fails, the defendant has judgment in his favor in the federal court, leaving the plaintiff and the other defendants to their litigation in the state court.

This view of the case encounters the objection that it may compel the plaintiff to litigate in two courts, but that objection obtains in every similar case which falls within the act of 1866, for the express purpose of that enactment is to give the non-resident defendant a right to litigate separately in the federal court, in cases where his rights can be finally determined, which of necessity, as well as by the plain letter of the statute, leaves the residue of the litigation in the state tribunal.

DUNDY, J., concurs.

MOTION DENIED.

NOTE.—"Final determination of controversy" as to the defendants who apply to remove. Bixby v. Couse, 8 Blatchf. 73; Tield v. Lounsdale (tenants in common), 1 Deady, 288.

"Final hearing or trial." Dart v. McKinney, 9 Blatchf. 359; Stevenson v. Williams, Sup. Ct. U. S. 1873; Waggener v. Cheek, 2 Dillon, 565; Akerly v. Vilas, 1 Abb. C. C. 284; Boggs v. Willard (where supreme court of state reversed and ordered bill to be dismissed—held too late to remove under act of 1867), 4 Ch. Legal News, 325; Johnson v. Monell (voluntary change of residence pending suit on right of removal), 1 Woolw. 390; Sands v. Smith, 1 Dillon, 290. The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts hold that under the act of March 2, 1867, it is too late to remove after a trial has been entered on, although the jury disagree. Galpin v. Critchlow, 13 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 137; but see cases last above cited.

Act of March 2, 1867, is constitutional (Chicago &c., R. R. Co. v. Whitton, 13 Wall. 270), and does not repeal act of July 27, 1866. Fields v. Lamb, 1 Deady, 430.

And under act of 1867, all the defendants, not merely nominal, must be entitled to removal. Bixby v. Couse, 8 Blatchf. 73. In this case it is even said that "they must unite in the petition for removal, or there can be no removal of the suit." See Field v. Lownsdale, 1 Deady, 288; and particularly Sewing Machine Co. v. Sewing Machine Co., Sup. Ct. U. S., 1873.

Under act of 1866, even as amended by act of 1867, it is not necessary to state "prejudice or local influence" in the affidavit, the ground of removal being citizenship. Field v. Lamb, 1 Deady, 430–432; Allen v. Ryerson, 2 Dillon, 501.

"Amount in controversy." Interest may be included in determining the amount in controversy. Roberts v. Nelson, 8 Blatchf. 74; King v. Wilson (illegal taxes), 1 Dillon, 555.

Right of removal depends upon facts as they exist when the suit was brought (under act of 1789, sec. 12, Roberts v. Nelson, 8 Blatchf. 74), and when right is complete it can not be defeated by amendment or other action of the state court. Kanouse v. Martin, 15 How. 198; Ladd v. Tudor, 3 Woodb. & Minot, 325.

Negotiable Instruments — Effect of Signatures Fraudulently Obtained.

ALPHEUS CHAPMAN v. SILAS ROSE.

New York Court of Appeals, ——— Term, 1874.

1. Negotiable Paper—Fraud—Negligence—Rights of Bona Fide Holder.—If a person negligently signs a negotiable instrument, relying upon the representations of another as to its contents, whereby he is fraudulently induced to sign a different instrument from the one he had engaged to sign, he can not resist payment of the same when in the hands of a bona fide holder for value.

This was an action on a promissory note, brought by Chapman against Rose, and tried at the Circuit Court at Newburgh, in November, 1871, before a jury, Hon. JOSEPH F. BARNARD presiding. On the trial it appeared that on the first day of February, 1871, a person, representing himself as Alfred E. Miller, came to the defendant, a farmer, at his barn in the town of Warwick, and asked him to take an agency for the sale of a patent hay-fork, which defendant finally consented to do. Miller then requested him to sign an agreement creating and accepting the agency, and also a printed order for one hay-fork, which order was attached at the bottom. He also requested defendant to execute a duplicate of the agreement and order, which he did; and Miller took the one and defendant kept the other. It was understood that defendant was not to pay for any forks until he had actually sold them. This was all that passed between them. About seven months afterwards the defendant was notified by the plaintiff in this suit to pay a promissory note, purporting to be made by the defendant February 1, 1871, for $270, payable to Alfred E. Miller or bearer, seven months after date, and transferred to the plaintiff before maturity. Defendant, although conceding that the signature looked like his, denied that he ever made the note, and the plaintiff brought this suit on it. The charge of the trial court, which is the ground assigned as error, is stated in the opinion. The verdict and judgment were for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed. The judgment was affirmed at General Term (44 Howard's Practice Reports, 364), and the plaintiff again appealed.

Digitized by Google

W. Vanamee and Charles H. Winfield for plaintiff; W. J. Groo, for defendant.

JOHNSON, J.—The judge charged the jury that if the paper sued upon was never delivered as a note, the plaintiff must fail in the action, and that even if it was delivered and the plaintiff neglected to make proper enquiry as to its origin, he was not a bona fide holder and could not recover.

The exception to the charge was general, but if both propositions were erroneous the error can be reached and corrected, especially as the attention of the judge appears to have been called by request to charge to the precise grounds on which the charge is now claimed to be erroneous. The latter branch of the charge presents the question of notice to put a party on enquiry as affecting his right to be regarded as a bona fide holder. It is now, however, the settled law that mere negligence, however gross, is not sufficient to deprive a party of the character of a bona fide holder. There must be proof of bad faith. That alone will deprive him of that character. Welch v. Sage, 47 N. Y. 143; Seybel v. National Currency Bank, Comm. of Appeals, 1873, MS.; Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. 110; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. 343. This part of the charge, therefore, can not be sustained. If, then, the appellant can maintain the position that the other branch of the charge is also erroneous, he will be entitled to a reversal of the judgment, notwithstanding the generality of the exception.

The evidence tended very strongly to show that the signature of the defendant to the note sued upon was obtained from him through a very gross and fraudulent imposition perpetrated upon him by one Miller; that when he signed it he supposed he was signing a paper of a very different character, and not an engagement to pay money absolutely. He had just before signed an order for the delivery to himself of a hay-fork and two grappling-pulleys, amounting together in price to nine dollars, for which he engaged to pay, and this paper now in suit was presented to him as a duplicate of that order, and was signed as such without examination or reading it, upon the statement of Miller, with whom he was dealing, that such was its character. There does not appear to have been any physical obstacle to the defendant's reading the paper before he signed it. He understood that he was signing a paper by which he was about to incur an obligation of some sort, and he abstained from reading it. He had the power to know with certainty the exact obligation he was assuming, and chose to trust the integrity of the person with whom he was dealing instead of exercising his own power to protect himself. It turns out that he signed a promissory note, and that it is now in the hands of a holder in good faith for value. The question which arises on the branch of the charge now under consideration is whether it is enough as against a bona fide holder to show that he did not know or suppose that he was signing a note, unless it also appears that he was guilty of no laches or negligence in signing the instrument. To that enquiry the attention of the judge at the trial was distinctly called, and the instruction which he gave and which was excepted to did not submit, but excluded, the consideration of it from the jury. It is quite plain that if the law is that no such enquiry is admissible, a serious blow will have fallen upon the negotiability of paper—it will be a premium offered to negligence. To ensure irresponsibility, only the utmost carelessness, coupled with a little friendly fraud, will be essential. Paper in abundance will be found afloat, the makers of which will have no idea they were signing notes, and will have trusted readily to the assurance of whoever procured it that it created no obligation. To avoid such evils it is necessary at least to hold firmly to the doctrine that he who by his carelessness or undue confidence has enabled another to obtain the money of an innocent person shall answer the loss. If it be objected that there must be a duty of care in order to found an allegation of negligence upon the neglect of it, it must be answered that every man is bound to know that he may be deceived in respect to the contents of a paper which he signs without reading. When he signs an obligation without ascertaining its character and extent, which he has the means to do, upon the representation of another, he puts confidence in that person, and if injury ensues to an innocent third person by reason of that confidence, his act is the means of the injury and he ought to answer to it.

In Foster v. MacKinnon, L. R. 4 C. P. 704, the action was upon an endorsement of a bill of exchange, and the evidence was that the defendant endorsed it believing it to be a guarantee, that being represented to him as its nature by a person in whom he put confidence.

The judge charged the jury that if the defendant signed it not knowing it to be a bill, and believing it to be a guarantee, in consequence of a fraudulent representation as to its character, and if he was not guilty of any negligence or laches in signing it, he was not bound. The jury found for the defendant. Upon a review of the decision, and after a very full and able discussion of the questions involved, the court held the direction at the trial to have been right. But a new trial was granted upon the ground that they were not satisfied with the finding of the jury on the question of fact, as I understand it, in respect to the question of negligence.

In Whitney v. Snyder, 2 Lansing, 477, evidence had been refused that the defendant was unable to read, and that the note which he had in fact signed was represented to him to be an instrument of a different character and was signed by him under such a belief. The court held that the evidence ought to have been received, principally upon the grounds and authority of the case last cited, approving both branches of the rule as stated in that case, and adding that the case then in judgment was stronger for the defendant on the question of negligence than was Foster v. MacKinnon. This was clearly so, for in Whitney v. Snyder it appeared that the defendant could not read, and he was, therefore, compelled to put confidence in some one as to the contents of any paper which he might be called upon to sign. Indeed, the same exception in respect to negligence is recognized as a necessary element in the decision at General Term in this case. The difficulty is that at the trial the judge rejected that qualification of the rule, and held that if the party did not intend to make a promissory note he could not be held bound even in favor of a bona fide holder for value. The principle involved is recognized and in substance decided in Putnam v. Sullivan, 3 Mass. 45. In that case the defendants had left with a clerk some signatures on blank pieces of paper intended to be used as notes or endorsements, according to specific instructions. The clerk was induced by fraud to part with one of these blank signatures, and it was filled up as a note, leaving the signature to appear as that of a payee and endorsee. The action was by a holder in good faith, and the court giving judgment, by PARSONS, C. J., said: "The counsel make a distinction between the cases where the endorser, through fraudulent pretences, has been induced to endorse the note he is called upon to pay, and where he never intended to endorse a note of that description, but a different note and for a different purpose. Perhaps there may be cases in which this distinction ought to prevail; as if a Chinaman had a note falsely and fraudulently read to him, and he endorsed it, supposing it to be the note read to him. But we are satisfied that an endorser can not avail himself of this distinction, but in cases where he is not chargeable with any laches or neglect, or misplaced confidence in others. Here one or two innocent parties must suffer. The loss has been occasioned by the misplaced confidence of the endorsers in a clerk too young or too inexperienced to guard against the act of the promissors." Upon those grounds the endorsers were held liable.

Digitized by Google

In Douglass v. Matting, 29 Iowa, 495, the judge says: "It is better that the defendant and others who so carelessly affix their names to papers, the contents of which are unknown to them, should suffer from the fraud their recklessness invites, than that the character of commercial paper should be impaired, and the business of the country thus interfered with and unsettled."

In all these cases the real ground of decision is not that the party meant to make a promissory note, but that, meaning to make an obligation in writing, and which was put in writing, that it might of itself import both the fact and the form and the measure of the obligation, he trusted another to fix that form and measure without exercising that supervision which was in his power, and by which perfect protection was possible. In such cases the rule is, that he is bound by the act of him who has been trusted, in favor of a holder in good faith.

The judgment must be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

JOHNSON, J., reads for reversal and new trial. All concur.

JUDGMENT REVERSED.

Constitutional Law—Effect of Laws Permitting Amendments in Pending Suits.

KENT v. GRAY.

Supreme Judicial Court of New Hampshire, August 15, 1873.

1. Retrospective Laws—Amendments.—A statute allowing writs to be amended by striking out the names of some of the plaintiffs can not, under the New Hampshire bill of rights, be constitutionally applied to suits pending at the time of its passage.

DEBT. "By Richard P. Kent, George A. Cossitt and George O. Rogers, the health officers of the town of Lancaster, who sue this action as well for the county of Coos as for themselves," against Hosea Gray, for penalties under Gen. Stat. chap. 101, sec. 8. The action was brought before 1872. At the November term, 1872, the plaintiffs moved to amend the writ by striking out the names of two of the plaintiffs, and the motion was reserved.

Ray & Drew and Crawford, for the plaintiffs.

Burns & Heywood, Fletcher & Heywood and George A. Bingham, for the defendant.

DOE, J.—Chapter 39 of the laws of 1872 provides: "In all civil proceedings, when two or more are joined as plaintiffs, the writ or other process may be amended by striking out the name of any plaintiff before the evidence is closed or the case is submitted," and "This act shall take effect upon its passage and apply to existing suits." Can this act be constitutionally applied to suits existing at the time of its passage?

In Rich v. Flanders, 39 N. H. 304, it was held by a majority of the court that the legislature could, by a general act, remove the common-law disability of parties to testify in pending as well as future suits. The objection to retrospective laws is declared in article 23 of the bill of rights to be that they "are highly injurious, oppressive and unjust." The objection is substantial, not formal, reasonable, not technical; and the reason of the objection, like the reason of all law, is entitled to consideration in its interpretation and consideration. The reason of the constitutional prohibition of retrospective legislation is the material and substantial injury, oppression and injustice caused by its practical operation. Taking the prohibition in the reasonable and equitable sense explicitly announced in the bill of rights, and applying it in that sense to the case of Rich v. Flanders, there is one view of the decision of that case which may give it the approval of some who, in other views, would be inclined to doubt its soundness.

The reason of the prohibition being the injustice of retrospectively converting right into wrong, or wrong into right, it might be argued that, in allowing both parties to testify in that case, there was no such transmutation, but merely a grant of equal rights to both parties by an impartial enlargement of the bounds of competent evidence on each side of the issue, not changing the issue, or the right to be established, or the wrong to be redressed, or the form or substance of the remedy; that giving both parties the additional means of showing the truth and proving and disproving the right asserted or the wrong complained of, and demonstrating what was right and what was wrong, was neither an injury nor oppression, nor injustice, in a moral or legal sense, and, therefore, not within the constitutional prohibition; that allowing the parties to testify did not alter the character of competent evidence, but only increased its quantity; that the defendant had no vested right in the exclusion of evidence and the suppression of the truth on the trial of an unaltered issue, upon the determination of which depended the vindication of an unaltered right by an unaltered remedy, or the discharge of the defendant from an unaltered claim on unaltered grounds in an unaltered process; that there could be no vested right upon which the additional testimony of the parties would have an injurious, oppressive or unjust effect in the sense of the words as used in the bill of rights; that the objection to such an impartial increase of the bulk of competent evidence, leaving the general character and weight of evidence unchanged, stands upon two presumptions not recognized by law—1, that the parties will testify falsely; 2, that the tribunal trying the facts will be incompetent to perform its duty, or that the more light a competent tribunal has, the more unable it will be to see the truth; that the constitutional prohibition is to be construed by the principles of natural justice on which it professes to rest, and which it professes to guarantee and enforce; that no principle of justice is violated by removing from both parties a disability to tell their own stories; that the act allowing parties to testify was an enabling and not a disabling act; that it merely enabled each party to put himself and the other party on the stand and throw more light on their unaltered controversy; that it would be a very different thing if the legislature should undertake to give artificial weight to a certain class of evidence in a pending suit, as by declaring certain proof to be prima facie evidence (Chappell v. Purdy, 12 M. & W. 303, 306, where Lord ABINGER thought the legislature did not intend, by an ex post facto law, to give one party to a suit already commenced so great an advantage over his adversary); that it would also be a very different thing if the legislature should undertake, by a disabling act, to render a competent witness incompetent in a pending suit; that it might be injurious, oppressive and unjust, by a retrospective statute to deprive a party to a pending suit of the means of showing the truth; that to destroy the competency of a witness might unjustly defeat the party having the burden of proof—might unjustly defeat either party, by depriving him of evidence of the truth on which he relied and had a right to rely; that the only escape from the conclusion reached in Rich v. Flanders is by way of the possibility of the tribunal being deceived by the untruth of the testimony of the parties, and of injustice being done to vested rights in consequence of the inability of the tribunal to discern the truth, and that such a possibility is no more ground for holding the application of the enabling act to pending suits to be unconstitutional than it would be for holding every change of the tribunal inapplicable to pending suits by reason of the possibility that the new tribunal might not ascertain the truth which, perhaps, the old tribunal would have ascertained.

Digitized by Google

An argument of that kind might be made in support of the doctrine of Rich v. Flanders on very narrow ground. We are not to be understood as saying that it is only on such a ground that the doctrine of that case can be supported; but it is suggested that if such a ground can be maintained, it would be sufficient for that case.

In the present case, at the time of the passage of the act of 1872, there were three plaintiffs, and they, jointly constituting the party plaintiff, had no right of action against the defendant, they had no right to be vindicated against him, and he was under no liability to them. This state of things the legislature undertook to change, by allowing two of the plaintiffs to withdraw—a proceeding which, if successfully followed, would, so far as these parties are concerned, change no cause of action into a good cause of action, and operate as a substantial creation of a new suit, that could be maintained, in place of an old one that could not. This is going far beyond impartially giving both parties additional means of proof. We see nothing in the doctrine of Rich v. Flanders that sustains legislation of this character; and we are of opinion that the act of 1872 can not be applied to cases pending at the time of its passage, and that the amendment desired by the plaintiff can not be made.

MOTION DENIED.

The New Jersey Pavement Case.

From a carefully prepared article in a New Jersey contemporary we learn that the decision pronounced by the Court of Errors and Appeals in the matter of the Broad street wooden pavement, in the city of Newark, is regarded by the lawyers of the state as the most important case decided in many years. This is on account of its far-reaching effects as to the vast amount of public improvements accomplished in this state during the past decade. The court having decided that all laws fixing any arbitrary proportion of the expense of improvements upon property are unconstitutional, and that payment can be exacted only in proportion to the actual benefits received, many of the assessments at present lying against property in the state can be resisted, and cities, towns and counties which ventured upon extravagant improvements in the flush times now departed, will find their burdens considerably augmented. The following history of this interesting case has been prepared by a well-informed writer in the Newark Morning Register:—

In the year 1868 the legislature passed a law authorizing the common council of Newark to cause any street in that city to be repaved, whenever a majority of the owners of the frontage on such street should apply to have the same done; and providing that, in case of such repaving, two-thirds of the costs and expenses thereof should be assessed upon such owners, and one-third thereof should be borne by the city treasury.

In the summer of 1869, Mr. T. W. Lord, then a member of the common council and the chairman of the street committee of said council, circulated a petition among the property-owners on a section of Broad street, between Canal and Market street, on which there is a double-track horse railroad, and succeeded in obtaining the signatures of twenty-four out of forty-nine such owners to said petition, which prayed the common council to repave the said section of Broad street with Nicholson wooden pavement. Many of the signatures were obtained by representations that the company owning the horse railroad would pay a large proportion (about one-third) of the expense of repaving, which, however, it afterwards refused to do, asserting that it never agreed to pay anything at all. The cost of repaving was very heavy ($37,500) and some of the property-owners affirmed that their bills were twice as large as they were informed they would be when they signed the petition. Before the Nicholson pavement was put down, the street was paved with cobble stones, with excellent crossings at convenient distances of heavy bridge stone, the cost of laying which cobble stone pavement had been in the year 1852 assessed upon and paid wholly by the property-owners aforesaid. This cobble stone pavement and the crossings were in as good condition as the rest of the pavement on Broad street, and there was no real necessity for a new one. The pavement no doubt needed repairing, but this the common council were bound to do by the provisions of the revised charter of the city, passed March 11, 1857, "without further direct assessment on the property on such street."

About one-half of the property-owners were opposed to the laying of a wooden pavement of any kind, and asserted that such a pavement would not last for five years, as the experiment of wooden pavements had been fully tested and utterly exploded fifty years ago. They said they would be perfectly willing to bear their proportion of the expense of a substantial stone pavement, although they were of the opinion that any repaving would be a public improvement for the public benefit, and should be paid for by the public. They were strengthened in this opinion by a decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, about that time (1869) delivered, to the effect that property which has once been assessed for paving could not legally be assessed anew for a repaving, inasmuch as in the eye of the law, such property, after once being so assessed, had reaped all the benefit which could possibly accrue to it from the paving process, and that a street once paved became thenceforth a public charge, its support merging in that of the other paved streets, to be borne by all the inhabitants of the city.

This decision, rendered by Judge SHARSWOOD, induced some of the property-owners, who did not petition for the repaving of Broad street, and also some of those who did sign the petition, under the representations aforesaid, to carry the matter by a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court—they insisting that the act of 1868, above referred to, was unconstitutional and null and void. The wooden pavement was completed early in 1870, a little more than four years ago; and its present dilapidated condition fully justifies the opposition made to it by the "old fogies" who believed that stone was better than wood.

In the meantime, while the issue was pending in the supreme court, one of the property-owners sent the case to his friend, the Hon. Emory Washburn, ex-governor of Massachusetts, one of the professors in Harvard law school and the author of the standard treatises on "Real Property," "The Law of Easements and Servitudes," &c., with the request that it might be "mooted," that is, argued and decided in the law school connected with Harvard University. This was done. The case was thoroughly studied and elaborately argued on excellent and carefully-prepared printed briefs, and Professor Washburn gave his written opinion in favor of the property-owners and against the city, and that upon general principles and not upon merely technical issues.

The case was argued before Judges DEPUE, VAN SYCKEL and WOODHULL, of the New Jersey Supreme Court, November 10, 1870, Thomas N. Carter, Esq., representing the property-owners, and N. Perry, Jr., Esq., the city council of the city of Newark. The subject had been very carefully studied by both of these gentlemen, and their arguments were exhaustive. Cortlandt Parker, Esq., also made an argument in behalf of the city. At the June term of the court in 1871, Judge WOODHULL delivered the opinion of the court, which was in favor of the city, Judges DEPUE and VAN SYCKEL concurring. The opinion seems to have been based on the decision of the supreme court in the case of The State, Sigler Pros. v. Fuller Collector, delivered in June, 1870 (5 Vroom, 227), which was plainly in conflict with the ruling of the court of errors in the well-known case of The Tide Water Company v. Coster, in 3 C. E. Green, 518, which held that an assessment for benefits must be just and equitable, and not arbitrary, and that the only just and equitable assessment is one in proportion to benefits and limited to benefits, and that any other assessment is a taking, pro tanto, of private property for public uses, without compensation.

This was the main issue in the wooden-pavement case. There were other minor issues made by the property-owners, one of which was that 24 was not a majority of 49, but they were all decided by the court in favor of the city.

Digitized by Google

The property-owners were dismayed and disheartened by this decision, but not demoralized. They at once took measures to carry up the case to the court of errors and appeals, the court of last resort in the state of New Jersey. After many delays and postponements it was argued last month by Mr. McCarter for the property-owners, and by Messrs. Francis and Parker for the city, before the vice chancellor (the chancellor not sitting in the case, as he had at one time been retained therein by the city), the chief justice, three supreme court justices and five lay judges. The arguments were very elaborate, Mr. McCarter alone occupying a whole day. On the 6th instant the opinion of the court was delivered by Chief Justice BEASLEY, all the members of the court, with the solitary exception of Judge DALRIMPLE, concurring. It was in favor of the property-owners. It is also rumored that Judge VAN SYCKEL, of the court below, had undergone a "change of heart" since June, 1871, and had concluded that the property-owners were right after all.

Leaving out side-issues, the great principles established by the court of errors are these: (1.) That the legislature has no constituional power arbitrarily to assess benefits for improvements, as they assumed to do in the act of 1868, by imposing on the property-owners two-thirds of the costs and expenses of a repaving, and that before any assessment for benefits can be levied, some approximation at least must be made to the extent of such benefits by the medium of a commission, or a jury, or in some other way. Or, as the chief justice illustrated it: Suppose the legislature had decreed that the whole cost of the wooden pavement should be borne by the properties on the corners of the streets, every one would exclaim against the law as an outrage. But it has done precisely the same thing in principle by decreeing that the property of these appellants is benefited to the extent of two-thirds of the costs of this repaving. The legislature has therefore exceeded its constitutional powers, and the act in question, so far as it assumes to fix benefits, is null and void.

(2.) That the legislature can not impose upon the owners of property adjacent to a public improvement any more of the cost of such improvement than is the measure of the benefit which such property derives therefrom, and that all the costs and expenses in excess of such benefit must be borne by the public at large. (3.) That the principles enunciated in the Tide Water case (3 C. E. Green, 518) are sound law.

Book Notice.

THE LAW OF SELF-DEFENCE—SELECT AMERICAN CASES ON THE LAW OF SELF-DEFENCE. By L. B. HORRIGAN and SEYMOUR D. THOMPSON. 1 vol. pp. 1006. Soule, Thomas & Wentworth: St. Louis.

This work covers the entire subject of the Defence of Person and Property. The subject is one which admits of separation from other branches of legal enquiry, and is therefore well adapted to distinct treatment. In view of the great multiplication of reports, well-prepared books on special topics are not only convenient and desirable, but almost an absolute necessity. Every lawyer who has a criminal case of assault or homicide, or a civil case of trespass, where the subject of the right of the defence of the person, or of the dwelling-house or other property, is involved, instead of having to examine scores of books, may find in this volume the entire body of the law, well arranged and critically discussed. The plan of the work is comprehensive. The sub-divisions of the subject, as treated, are as follows:

Part I. Defence of the Person.

Part II. Defence of the Habitation.

Part III. Defence of Property other than the Habitation.

Part IV. Of the Burden and Quantum of Proof where Self-Defence is Urged in Justification of Homicide.

In executing this plan the editors have selected not some but all of the principal cases, and published them, or such parts of them as relate to the subject in extenso, and then giving in the form of notes other cases, either in full or in an abbreviated form, by way of illustration or qualification. By this arrangement 174 cases have been given at length, and 300 more referred to with sufficient fullness to advise the reader of their general character. Theoretically viewed, the work would have been more artistic if the notes had contained only brief references to the cases therein referred to by way of illustration; but, practically estimated, this symmetry would have been gained at the expense of its real usefulness. It is to be remembered that works of this character are designed for the body of the profession, who mostly live in places where access to full libraries is not to be had, and therefore the more it is practicable to give them in the original and most authentic form, the better. This book is not a mere compilation of cases, but the annotations are so thorough and the editorial discussions so full as to make it in fact a treatise on the subject of self-defence. The work of the editors has been done with extraordinary care. They have even gone to the trouble of verifying and correcting the citations of authorities as given in the authorized publication of the reports. We take pleasure in assuring the profession that the work is one of real and great merits. The editorial work has been so done as to entitle the editors to the thanks of their brother lawyers throughout the country. An idea of the thoroughness of the book may best be had by a reference to the contents of a portion of it. For example:

Part I, includes the following heads: A.—Defence against Assaults and Demonstrations threatening Death or Great Bodily Harm. B.—Defence against Death or Great Bodily Harm, where the exigency arises in Mutual Combat. C.—Killing in Self-Defence, where the Necessity is Produced by the Wrongful Act of the Slayer. D.—Acting upon Appearances of Danger; and herein of the Imminence of the Danger, of previous Threats made by the Antagonist, and also of the Character of the Antagonist for Violence. E.—Defence against Unlawful Arrest. F.—Defence against Common Assaults. G.—Resistance to the Commission of Felonies. H.—Defence of other Persons. I.—Self-Preservation by the Destruction of Innocent Persons. J.—Concerning the Degree of Caution and Prudence which a Person must exercise in his Defence to avoid injuring Third Persons. K.—The Law of Self-Defence as applied to a State of Mixed War.

J. F. D.

Correspondence.

In transmitting the opinion in Kent v. Gray, elsewhere published, the excellent reporter of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire accompanied it with the following note to the editors, which, though not intended for publication, will, we are sure, interest our readers:

OFFICE OF THE STATE REPORTER,
ANDOVER, N. H., April 26, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I herewith send you the opinion of our supreme court in Kent v. Gray. It tells its own story. It will probably appear in Vol. 54 of our Reports. I shall be unable to commence Vol. 53 until about the first of May. I hope to send you during that month the first opinion, which will take from two to three hundred pages of the volume. The spirit of the case is this: Parish corporations (religious) came to us by inheritance. The parish was orthodox, but lapsed into Unitarianism. The pastor taught that Christ was the purest of men but was not divine. A majority of the parish sustained him. The minority brought a bill in chancery to eject him from the church, and a majority of the court granted the decree prayed for. Both opinions will appear. They cover the whole power of the court of chancery over such corporations. I am sure the opinion will interest you.

Very truly yours, JOHN M. SHIRLEY.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE legislature of California has passed a law giving juries power, where a prisoner is convicted of murder in the first degree, of commuting the punishment to imprisonment for life.

—THE subject of equalizing taxation is agitating the agricultural communities of the West. It is shown by statistics that in Illinois, while real estate is taxed at one-seventieth of its value, personal property is taxed at only one-twenty-sixth of its real value.

—Our correspondent at Little Rock apologizes for not sending more matter, by stating that it is almost impossible to obtain access to the records of the supreme court, and then only under the escort of a darky guard. We humbly implore Gov. Brooks to allow our correspondent to pass the "Strict sentinels and stations thick

Of darkies watching round"

without hindrance—assuring the governor that there is nothing treasonable in his intentions.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, MAY 21, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

WE print elsewhere an opinion of the United States Court of Claims denying the application of Mrs. Belva A. Lockwood, a married woman, to be admitted to practice as an attorney in that court. Mrs. Lockwood is a licensed attorney practicing in the other inferior courts at Washington. In view of the fact that women are applying for admittance to the bar in various parts of the country, and in many cases with success, the case will no doubt interest our readers.

JUDGE BLATCHFORD, of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, has recently delivered an opinion in the case of Hobbell and Chappell, bankrupts, holding that if an assignee in bankruptcy employs an attorney, who renders legal services for him, the bill of the attorney should be presented by the assignee as part of his accounts, at the meeting of creditors where the assignee's accounts are required to be presented by section 27 of the bankrupt law The opinion will be found in the Legal Gazette for May 8.

WE publish elsewhere in this number notes of some interesting questions ruled by Mr. Justice MILLER in the case of The National Bank of Omaha v. Douglass County. The right of the national banks to sue by reason of their character as such in the federal courts of the district in which they are located is affirmed. The same point was recently decided in the same way by the Circuit Court of the U. S. for the Eastern District of Missouri. The points ruled by the learned justice concerning the remedy in equity in the circuit court to restrain the collection of illegal taxes are important and in one respect new.

A Legal Objection to Cremation.

The New York Times touches upon the vital objection to cremation in the following sentences: "People who think upon the matter, instead of talking and writing about it, foresee the terrible advantage and protection that the general establishment of cremation would inevitably give to the poisoner. In nine cases out of ten the crime of poisoning is detected by a chemical analysis of the contents of the stomach after interment. The investigation may be made weeks, or months, or years after the death of the victim. So long as the body exists undecayed the poisoner is not safe. But let the corpse be burnt into a handful of white ashes, and the danger of detection immediately disappears, and the chances of impunity for the murderer are infinitely multiplied, and with them, of course, the incitement to the crime."

To this the Albany Law Journal adds: "And we are informed by the public prints that the life insurance companies strenuously object to the custom for the same reason. We hardly think that the legislature would forbid the relatives of a deceased person from burning his body, if they desired to adopt that course, or compel the survivors to obtain an order to show cause why the remains should not be burned, simply to accommodate a life insurance company. It would seem that in suspicious cases of death the ordinary coroner's enquiry would answer every purpose. But the objection has more force when raised on behalf of the public, and however fanciful it may at first appear, seems on mature consideration to be founded in reason. It way well be that the practice of burning rather than of burying human remains would increase the crime of poisoning. Anything that might add to the facilities of this crime should be jealously avoided, for, in spite of the boasted advances of chemical science, its detection is even now quite uncertain, as several recent murder trials evince."

Investments by Trustees.

The American Law Register for April contains an article on the investment of trust funds, written by A. S. B., whoever he is, at the conclusion of which the law in relation to the subjects discussed is summed up as follows:

"1. Where there is no express power of sale in the instrument creating a trust, and none is necessarily implied, and the discretion of the trustee is the sole restriction upon investments, he will generally be protected where he has acted bona fide and with reasonable diligence and prudence. But in a state where the trustee is protected from loss which may arise from certain specified and so-called legal investments, the rule is much more stringent, and extraordinary care and diligence is required of the trustee as well as bona fides, and it is dangerous to invest trust funds in any other securities than in those thus indicated.

"2. But where there is no express power of sale given, and where none such can necessarily be implied from the nature of the trustee's duties, the only safe means of changing an insecure investment, left so by the creator of the trust, is to make the change under the direction of the proper court, and if done without such authority the trustee will be liable to the cestui que trust for breach of trust.

"3. Where there is no such power of sale and the trustee leaves unchanged an investment made by the testator, and loss ensues, he will generally be protected if acting with bona fides, even in cases where if there had been a power of sale and he had neglected to sell, he would have been liable under rule 1, laid down above.

"4. Where a bank or other corporation permits a trustee holding certificates of its stock, transferable only by one of its officers, and on which the name of the legal owner appears as trustee for another, to part with that stock, and no remedy can be enforced against the trustee, the corporation is held to have constructive notice of the contents of the instrument creating the trust; and if the trustee has exceeded his powers, or in any way committed a breach of trust with the involuntary aid of the corporation, the latter will be held liable to the same extent as the trustee.

"5. Executors and administrators have, virtute officii, a power to sell the estate of the decedent, and unless they have become trustees by the length of time which has elapsed since the conclusion of all the duties of the office of executor, a corporation permitting a transfer at their instance would not, without notice and if acting with bona fides, be held liable therefor."

Digitized by Google

Compulsory Education.

The legislature of New York, which has just adjourned, passed a law making the education of children within certain ages compulsory. The Albany Law Journal comments upon it as follows:

"The compulsory education act, just passed by the legislature of this state, commands parents and guardians of children between eight and fifteen years of age to cause them to attend school at least fourteen weeks of each year, eight weeks of which shall be consecutive, or to cause them to be regularly instructed at home to the same extent, in spelling, reading, writing, English grammar, geography and arithmetic, unless the physical or mental condition of the child is such as to render such attendance or instruction inexpedient and impracticable, and affixes a penalty of one dollar per week for the first, and five dollars per week not exceeding thirteen weeks in any one year, for each subsequent infraction. The act also, in the second section, forbids the employment of any child under the age of fifteen years in any business during school hours of the public school in the school district where the child resides, unless the child shall have made the attendance or received the instruction above mentioned at least fourteen weeks of the fifty-two next preceding the year of such employment, and affixes a penalty of $50 for each infraction. If the parent or guardian is unable to furnish the requisite text-books, the same shall be furnished at the public expense. These are the main provisions. Machinery for their enforcement is provided. The wisdom of these provisions, especially of that of section 2, can scarcely be controverted. As a matter of public policy there can be no room for hesitation. It is best for society to have all its members intelligent. As to the matter of private right, it may be said that in a state of society no man has a right to be a dunce and a fool himself, nor to permit his children to grow up dunces and fools, unless nature is in the way. We regard the enactment as much more equitable and reasonable than the intelligence qualification required in some communities as a condition for the exercise of the elective franchise. The true way to get intelligent voters is to educate the masses from childhood. But we fear that the legislators have practically defeated the intent of the act by the permission to instruct at home. It must be observed also, that while in section two, relating to employment of children, there is a requirement that the attendance or instruction shall be upon or by a teacher qualified to instruct in the specified branches, there is no such requirement as to the home instruction in the first section. So we do not see why a child may not remain at home practically uninstructed, if he is only idle also. We think this point will bear looking into more closely by the law-makers."

End of the Arkansas Gubernatorial Contest.

We yield a small portion of our space in this number to publish the material part of the opinion of the federal attorney-general with reference to the armed contest for the governorship of the state of Arkansas. In the every-day practice of the lawyer questions of this kind will never occur, but viewed as a question of constitutional or public law, it is of unequalled importance. It relates to nothing less than whether the judiciary of a state will be tolerated in usurping a jurisdiction which the constitution of the state has expressly reposed in the legislative branch of the government, when the inevitable result of such usurpation is to create or attempt a political revolution in the state, and to overwhelm it with anarchy and bloodshed. In many of the United States political parties are so evenly balanced that the result of a gubernatorial election is not unfrequently determined by a few votes. It is manifest, then, that the peace and security of society require that contests for the possession of the executive offices of a state government should be speedily determined by one tribunal, without appeal, and to the exclusion of all others. When, therefore, such jurisdiction is clearly vested in the legislative department of a state government, to tolerate the exercise of it by the judiciary on the doubtful grounds which have been invoked in favor of it in this case, would be to set a precedent fraught with mischief and insecurity to the peace of every state in the Union. Happily the president, acting on the advice of his chief law-officer, has seen his duty clearly in this emergency, and, assuming the weight of responsibility which the constitution has laid upon him, has simply ignored the unwarranted and disgraceful exercise of judicial power by which Brooks for a time acquired and maintained possession of the capitol and archives of the state of Arkansas, and has issued his proclamation commanding him and his followers to disperse, designating them as "turbulent and disorderly persons."

The opinion of the attorney-general presents in clear language the only view which it would seem an unprejudiced and dispassionate lawyer could entertain of the question. Concerning the extraordinary usurpation of jurisdiction of the circuit judge of Pulaski county, he uses the following severe but just language: "That this circuit judge should have rendered judgment for Brooks, under these circumstances, is surprising; and it is not too much to say that it presents a case of judicial insubordination which deserves the reprehension of every one who does not wish to see public confidence an uncertainty and the good faith of judicial proceedings wholly destroyed." From his opinion it also appears that the extraordinary judgment of four of the judges of the Supreme Court of Arkansas sustaining the circuit judge in the exercise of this jurisdiction, and thereby overruling, but without noticing, their twice-pronounced decision to the contrary, was simply a judgment in a moot case, gotten up for the purpose of eliciting the opinion for public effect—the litigating defendant as well as three of the judges having previously sent a paper to the president informing him that they recognized Brooks as governor. The attorney-general "refrains from comment," but can not avoid declaring a conviction in which every honest lawyer must concur, that "a judgment obtained under such circumstances is not recognized as authority by any respectable tribunal." The full opinion will be found in the New York Herald of May 16.

Municipal Bonds—Mode of Collection.

The latest phase of the municipal bond controversy in the Supreme Court of the United States is presented by the case of Heine ——— v. Board of Levee Commissioners, decided on the 4th instant.

The suit was in chancery, brought in the U. S. Circuit Court for Louisiana by the holders of bonds issued by the board of levee commissioners for certain parishes (counties) in Louisiana. These boards are made by state of the statute quasi corporations with power to issue bonds and to provide for their payment by the levy of taxes upon the property within the district. The bill alleges a failure of the board to levy taxes to pay interest on the bonds; that the levee commissioners have pretended to resign their office for the purpose of evading this duty; that the plaintiffs have applied to the judge of the district court who was by statute authorized to levy the tax to pay the bonds if the levee commissioners failed to do so. The prayer for relief is that the levee commissioners be required to assess and collect the tax necessary to pay the bonds and interest, and if they fail, that the district judge be ordered to do the same. No suit at law had been brought or judgment recovered. A demurrer to the bill was sustained by the circuit court, and a decree thereon entered dismissing the bill, from which the plaintiffs appealed. The decree was affirmed by the supreme court, CLIFFORD and SWAYNE, JJ., dissenting. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the judgment of the court. In discussing the various grounds put forward to sustain the equity jurisdiction, the learned justice, with the concurrence of the other members of the court, except the two justices above named, lays down the following propositions:

Digitized by Google

1. There can be no jurisdiction in equity to enforce the payment of corporation bonds until the remedy at law has been exhausted.

2. Where the law has provided that a tax shall be levied to pay such bonds, a mandamus after judgment to compel the levy of the tax, in the nature of an execution or process to enforce the judgment, is the only remedy.

3. The fact that this remedy has been shown to be unavailing does not confer upon a court of equity the power to levy and collect taxes to pay the debt.

4. The power to levy and collect taxes is a legislative function in this country and does not belong to a court of equity, and can only be enforced by a court of law, through the officers authorized by the legislature to levy the tax, if a writ of mandamus is appropriate to that purpose.

5. Taxes are not liens unless declared so by the legislature under whose authority they are assessed. Still less can a lien be created by the mere duty to assess taxes, which has not been performed.

In concluding his opinion, Mr. Justice MILLER holds the following striking language: "There does not appear to be any authority founded on the recognized principles of a court of equity on which this bill can be sustained. If sustained at all it must (be) on the very broad ground that because the plaintiff finds himself unable to collect his debt by proceedings at law, it is the duty of a court of equity to devise some mode by which it can be done. It is, however, the experience of every day and of all men that debts are created which are never paid, though the creditor has exhausted all the resources of the law. It is a misfortune which, in the imperfection of human nature, often admits of no redress. The holder of a corporation bond must, in common with other men, submit to this calamity when the law affords no relief.

"The power we are here asked to exercise is the very delicate one of taxation. This power belongs in this country to the legislative sovereignty, state or national. In the case before us the national sovereignty has nothing to do with it. The power must be derived from the legislature of the state. So far as the present case is concerned, the state has delegated the power to the levee commissioners. If that body has ceased to exist, the remedy is in the legislature to assess the tax by special statute or to vest the power in some other tribunal. It certainly is not vested, as in the exercise of an original jurisdiction, in any federal court. It is unreasonable to suppose that the legislature would ever select a federal court for that purpose. It is not only not one of the inherent powers of the court to levy and collect taxes, but it is an invasion by the judiciary of the federal government of the legislative functions of the state government. It is a most extraordinary request, and a compliance with it would involve consequences no less out of the way of judicial procedure, the end of which no wisdom can foresee. In the case of Walkley v. Muscatine, and Rees v. Watertown, already cited, we have distinctly refused to enter on this course, and we see no reason in the present case to depart from the well-considered judgment of the court in those cases, especially the latter."

The Homestead Law and the Obligation of Contracts.

It will be remembered that we took occasion in a previous number (ante, p. 173) briefly to discuss the question whether homestead exemption laws are constitutional so far as they operate upon existing contracts. The force of the cases appeared to be that such laws were not unconstitutional, unless the amount exempted was so large as to withdraw the greater part of the property of the debtor communities from execution. The American Law Register for April contains a well-considered opinion of the Supreme Court of Mississippi, written by Mr. Justice SIMRALL, in which it is ruled that the right to seize and sell by judicial process a debtor's property in satisfaction of a judgment against him, is a material part of the remedy for the enforcement of the contract on which the judgment is founded; that any law of a state which materially increases the amount of property exempt by law from execution, over the amount allowed when the contract was made, impairs the remedy materially, and is therefore prohibited by the federal constitution; and that the exemption law of Mississippi, passed in 1865, which increased the homestead exemption from 160 acres of land, not exceeding $1500 in value, to 240 acres regardless of its value, is, when applied to debts created before its passage, in violation of that clause of the federal constitution which prohibits states from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts.

After reviewing the cases which bear on the question, the learned judge says:

"The lesson of the adjudications is, that the creditor may trust to the law as it is when he contracts, to know how much of the estate of the debtor he may look to for satisfaction. The existing law is in the contemplation of both parties. That furnishes approximately a safe basis of credit. If subsequent law may come in, and deny satisfaction out of half the property before liable, it is too plain for argument or illustration, that such a statute seriously impairs the right.

"There is hardly room for doubt that the greatly enlarged exemptions under the act of 1865 come within the range and condemnation of these principles. This will be manifest by comparing the law of 1857 with that of 1865. The former exempted the lands and building occupied as a residence, no exceeding one hundred and sixty acres in quantity, and $1500 in value, including the improvements. The latter exempted 240 acres regardless of its value, so laid off as to include the dwelling-house and other buildings and the farm. The homestead as thus defined would, in all probability, equal half the value of the larger landed estates. Upon a critical examination it might perhaps turn out that half of the land estates of the freeholders of the state were placed entirely beyond the reach of creditors. It would embrace both in in quantity and value more than half of the cultivated lands. The effect of the law, in many instances, is to free from debt property worth ten or twenty thousand dollars, to place many debtors in comparatively affluent circumstances beyond the reach of the smallest creditor. Credits predicated on the basis of the law of 1857 may be perfectly solvent, and yet by the act of 1865 rendered insolvent. Such would be the consequences if the statute shall be construed to apply to pre-existing debts."

Digitized by Google

It will be seen by referring to the article written by us, that the case of Stephenson v. Osborne, 41 Miss. 119, 130, was invoked in support of what we supposed to be the prevailing rule. That case the Supreme Court of Mississippi now overrule. The opinion proceeds as follows:

"We would have no doubt or hesitation in declaring this statute void as to pre-existing debts, because of the inhibition of the constitution, but for the embarrassment caused by the case of Stephenson v. Osborne, 41 Miss. 130. Mrs. Osborne, as widow, claimed the exempt personal property under the act of 1865, her husband having died since its passage. This claim was contested upon the ground, as stated in the answer to her petition, that she had by a deed of separation from her husband renounced all her rights and claims upon his estate. It does not appear from the report that a concession of her demand would have injured the creditors. It was conceded by her counsel in his brief, that the law was unconstitutional as to pre-existing creditors. Her right was predicated in argument on the fact that the estate was solvent, indebted not exceeding $500, and that her husband died after the law was in force. The question was not whether the law was void because it impaired the obligation of contracts; but rather whether the widow could take the personal property exempted by the statute in force at the death of the husband. It may not have been necessary to decide this question to pass upon the validity of the law as to prior creditors. What was said in argument by the court on the last point, entitled as it is to the highest respect and consideration, might be accepted as dicta. We are strongly inclined to the opinion that the enlarged homestead, as defined in the act of 1865, is prospective—allowable against after-incurred liabilities. By express words, the homestead, under the act of 1857, may be claimed against future debts. The act of 1865 imports by its title to be an amendment of the existing laws. That purpose is clearly set forth in the seventh section, 'that this act shall be construed as amendatory of the exemption laws of this state, and not intended to repeal the said laws, otherwise than that the amendments shall supersede the former acts, so herein revised and amended.' The amendments mainly are an increase and description of the property, and directions as to preferring the claim, and settling doubts as to the right claimed. The prospective feature of the former law is not repealed by express words. If accomplished at all, it is by implication. Such repeals are not favored nor tolerated except for inconsistency and repugnance. Courts ought to assume that the legislature have declared how far the repeal shall extend, and will not enlarge it by implication, unless there is plain inconsistency and incompatibility; moreover, a statute should be so construed as that it may have effect. It is never to be inferred that the legislature intended to transcend the limits of its power. Statutes should be so interpreted, if the language and subject-matter will admit of it, as to conform to the fundamental law. A rendering which will harmonize with the constitution should be adopted, rather than one which shall be repugnant to it. In Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall., the intimation is strong that the law of Georgia, which is much like our statute of 1865, was prospective in its effects; the state court, however, had decided otherwise.

"Accepting the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States as conclusive authority upon constitutional questions, we are constrained to the conclusion that the adjudications of that court condemn the increased exemptions of 1865, so far as prior creditors are affected, as violative of the constitution. It was observed by the court in Stephenson v. Osborne, 41 Miss., that it had not met with an authority in which the constitutionality of exemption laws was raised and decided. Since that decision the case reported in 15 Wall. has been adjudged, and also a very well considered case reported in 22 Grattan, 266.

"To dissent from a former judgment pronounced in this court is always attended with serious embarrassment. It should never be done until mature reflection had engendered the clearest conviction. But in cases like this we are subordinate to the Supreme Court of the United States, and must receive the expositions of the constitution by that tribunal as authoritative and binding upon us. As a court it is our duty to pronounce the law, we can not, however, close our eyes to the consequences of our judgments, as they may affect the business and social interests of the community. We believe with confidence, that the conclusion to which we have come will promote public good. The principle vindicated will give stability and uniformity to the business and industries of the people. Individuals in their dealings and transactions will be governed in their credits and liabilities by a surer and more permanent standard. It may serve to check somewhat the disposition to risky speculation, and inculcate a sterner morality to respect the inviolability of contracts. It plainly teaches the lesson of self-reliance and self-dependence as a rule of conduct in business, and a better means of extrication out of embarrassments than periodic appeals to legislative power to interpose for relief."

The Personal Liability of Bank Directors for the Conversion of Special Deposits.

Some time since we received, through the courtesy of Thomas H. Hines, Esq., of Bowling Green, Kentucky, a copy of the opinion of the court of appeals of that state in the cases of The United Society of Shakers v. Under, and Wm. Davenport v. Underwood, in which the above subject is considered. We have deferred publishing it from time to time, hoping to find time to write a note to it. In the meantime it has been published in several of the legal periodicals, including the American Law Register for April, where it is supplemented with a note by Judge REDFIELD.

Digitized by Google

The force of the ruling is that bank directors will be held responsible to the depositors for the loss or converson by the bank of special deposits in such bank whenever they know of such conversion, or might have known of it by the exercise of such care and diligence as the law requires of such officers in representing the affairs of the bank; and that bank directors must be considered as affected with the knowledge of such facts as appear upon the bank books. The question arose on demurrer to the plaintiffs' petitions, the substantial allegations of which were that certain special deposits were made, and that the officers of the bank converted them—not to the personal emolument of the directors—but to the use and emolument of the bank, and that of such wrongful conversion and appropriation the defendants had, or could have had, by the most ordinary diligence, ample notice. It was also substantially charged in each petition that the defendants, acting as directors, "did, on various occasions, declare dividends when the condition of the bank did not justify the same, and so appropriated to themselves, they being the largest stockholders, large sums of money actually realized from the conversion of the plaintiffs' property as aforesaid."

In the opinion delivered by LINDSAY, J., the court say that "the liability of the bank in these actions does not depend alone upon the averment of want of care and fidelity upon the part of the directors. It is specifically charged that the deposits were sold by its officers and the proceeds thereof converted to its use and emolument with the knowledge of the directors. The facts thus alleged imply the conversion by the bailee of the bailor's goods, for which, at the common law, an action of trover would lie. The question here presenting itself for our decision is, whether the directors, who had knowledge of these alleged wrongful sales, can be held to answer personally for the deposits so converted."

Further on, the conclusion of the court is put upon clearer ground. The court say: "These appellants allege that their bonds were sold by the officers of the bank, and the proceeds paid out in the satisfaction of claims against it, and in the payment of dividends to the stockholders, and that of all this appellees had notice. Having notice, it was their duty, and they had full power in the premises, to prevent the sales. Failing in this, their subsequent action in directing the proceeds, or some portion thereof, to be paid out in the shape of dividends to the stockholders, including themselves, was a ratification of the conversion which they had theretofore wrongfully permitted. Considering their alleged wilful failure to discharge a plain duty, their ratification of the unauthorized sale and the appropriation to themselves of portions of the proceeds arising therefrom, there seems to be no valid reason, even under the rules of pleading at the common law, why they might not be held liable with the bank in an action of trover and conversion; but if there be well-founded doubt as to this conclusion, an action on the case would undoubtedly lie to compel them to make good a loss resulting from a palpable failure upon their part to discharge a plain legal duty, the performance of which the complainants had the right to demand at their hands, and the non-performance of which was the direct and immediate cause of the loss. It follows, therefore, that each of the two petitions under consideration sets out facts constituting causes of action, and this being the case, under our rules of civil procedure the general demurrer should have been overruled."

In his note to the case, Judge REDFIELD, while appreciating the high sense of justice implied in holding not only the bank, but also the directors, responsible for all the wrongful acts of the subordinate officers and servants of the bank, does not concur in the result reached. He says:

"The case being tried on demurrer will rest upon the legal force of the averments in the complaint. And these, as stated in the opinion, are only that the appellees 'and each of them had, or could have had, by the use of the most ordinary diligence and investigation, ample notice.' As this is an averment in the pleadings of the appellants, it must receive the least favorable construction towards them. In that view it imports, not that the appellees had notice, but that they might have obtained notice by proper investigation. And by looking into the averment in one of the cases we find that this notice consisted in: 'had notice, as well as from the ledger, books and accounts of said bank, as from its correspondence, reconcilements and statements.' This imports, on the proper construction towards the pleader, that if the appellees had examined all these sources of information they would have discovered that the bank, by their tellers and cashier, had put these bonds to their own use. But this only implies a notice after the fact of conversion, since the avails would only appear upon the books, probably, when converted into money. But that is not important here.

"But upon the most favorable construction for the appellants, these averments can imply nothing more than that the appellees were deficient in the exercise of the proper degree of care and diligence in the matter. But if any principle in the law of business corporations is entirely well settled, it is that the creditors of such corporations have no right of action against the officers for mere omission of duty—mere nonfeasance. Such defaults are only breaches of obligation towards the corporation, in which its creditors have no actionable interest. In the case of special deposits in a bank, the corporation is the depositary and not the officer receiving the same. Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479. There is thus no privity by way of contract or duty created between the depositary and any of the officers of the bank. It is competent for banks to receive the special deposits of their customers, but they are not obliged to do so whenever requested. Thatcher v. State Bank, 5 Sandf. Ch. 121. The bank in the case of special deposits are only gratuitous bailees, owing the lowest degree of care. Such deposits are not usually entered upon the books or certified to the depositor, but there are probably different practices in regard to this. The directors of a bank would not ordinarily know much in regard to such deposits, and could scarcely be expected to keep any lookout in regard to them. The president might know more than the ordinary directors, but even he could scarcely be considered as owing any special duty, and if he did, it would be to the bank and not the depositor. The cashier and tellers would naturally have the entire charge of such deposits, and their duty to the bank would extend only to seeing that they were not needlessly exposed to loss or damage, and no duty from such officers would be due the depositor.

"But, as said in Foster v. Essex Bank, supra, it would be a breach of trust for the bank or any of its officers to open a package left on special deposit, and whoever did or counselled such act, would be responsible to the owner for such tort. And if done by an officer of the bank for its use and benefit, there can be no doubt the bank would be responsible, and we think the bank would now be held responsible in such case, whether the avails went to its own use or not. The contrary was held in Foster v. Essex Bank, but the old idea that corporations were not responsible for the wilful act of their servants is now nearly abondoned and the more sensible rule adopted that corporations are responsible for all acts of their servants within the range of their employment.

Digitized by Google

"We have reviewed the cases upon this question in 1 Railways, § 130, pp. 532–542. One of the latest English cases on the point is Burns v. Poulson, L. R. 8 C. P. 563. See also Ward v. London Omnibus Co., 27 L. T. N. S. 761. In the late case of Swift v. Winterbotham, L. R. 8 Q. B. 244, it is held that a bank is responsible for the wilfully wrong act of its servant committed in the course of his employment. But it is not important to discuss this point here. The books all show that such officers and servants are liable to the owner of such special deposits for their own wilful acts, but not for mere negligence in the discharge of their duty to the bank, although the depositor may suffer an incidental loss thereby. Bowlin v. Nye, 10 Cash. 416; Angell & Ames on Corp. §§ 241 et seq.; Story on Agency, chap. XII, §§ 308 et seq. Mr. Justice Story thus states the rule: 'He [the agent] is not in general (for there are exceptions) [referring to cases of maritime contracts] liable to third persons for his own nonfeasance or omissions of duty in the course of his employment. His liability in these latter cases is solely to his principal. The early cases of McManus v. Crickett, 1 East, 106; Ellis v. Turner, 8 T. R. 531; Foster v. Essex Bank, supra; and Mechanics' Bank v. The Bank of Columbia, 5 Wheat. 326, and some others, wherein it has been held that the master is not responsible for any wilful act of his servant, since that is, ipso facto, a departure from the employment, may be said to have a kind of a half-dying existence still. But the introduction of railways has compelled the courts to hold corporations responsible for all acts of their servants, however wilful, providing they come fairly within the range of the employment and are professedly done on behalf of such corporations. And negligence is not inferrable from the loss merely; the burden of proof of negligence rests on the plaintiff. Smith v. Bank, 99 Mass. 605.

"But here the persons performing the wrongful acts complained of were in no sense the servants of the appellees. They were the servants of the bank, as much as any servants employed under the supervision of a superintendent are the servants of the common master. It would present a novelty in jurisprudence to hold the general superintendent of works personally responsible for the acts of his subordinate to those dealing with the owner, upon the ground that he did not restrain such subordinates from dereliction of duty. But that, in principle, is this case. And we can not suppose, if the bank were still solvent, any one would dream of maintaining this action."

—Sir Edward Thornton, who acted as umpire between Mexico and the United States in Indian depredation claims, has decided that the Gadsden treaty of 1853 exonerates us from all liability for the acts of the Indians. This decision is most important, as something like thirty-one millions dollars were involved in the claims.

The New Jersey Pavement Case.

THE MAYOR & COMMON COUNCIL OF NEWARK v. THE STATE, AGENS et al., PROSECUTORS.

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, March Term, 1874.

1. Constitutional Law—Assessments for Street Paving.—A statute authorizing the expense of paving the road-bed of a city street, to be assessed in the proportion of two-thirds on the property abutting on the street, and the remaining third on the public at large, is unconstitutional.

2. ——. ——. Assessments to be Proportioned to Benefits.—Assessments for local improvements of this character may be made against the property peculiarly benefited, but such assessments must be made to the extent only of such peculiar benefits.

3. ——. ——. Improvements of Sidewalks.—This rule does not apply to the improvements of the sidewalk, which is to be regarded as subservient to the premises to which it is attached, and the expense of improving which may be charged wholly to the owner.

The seventh section of the charter of Newark (pamphlet laws 1849, pp. 206, 207) provides "That it shall be lawful for the common council, on the application of three-fourths of the owners of property in any street, to order the said street or section of the street to be graded, gravelled, paved, flagged or planked, either in whole or in part, in such manner as they shall deem most advisable," &c., and that after the said grading, gravelling, paving, &c., is once effected, then the city shall take charge of and keep the same in repair without further assessments. Acts 1849, pp. 206, 207.

A section of Broad street, between Market street and the Morris canal, was originally paved under the foregoing provision, and had been now repaved by virtue of the following section in the supplement to the charter passed 18th March, 1868, page 411, viz.: "That when more than one half of the owners of the frontage on the line of any street, or section thereof, which is now paved, shall apply to have such street or section repaved, it may be lawful for the common council to order and cause the repaving thereof, and they shall assess upon the owners of the lots fronting upon the line of such street or section thereof, two thirds of the cost and expenses of such repaving, and the city treasury shall bear the remaining one-third; and the city shall be entitled to all the old material, and said assessment to be made in all respects as were required by the act to which this is a supplement and the supplements thereto in cases of the original paving of streets."

Beasley, Ch J.—The writ in this case has brought before the court the proceedings in the assessment of the expenses incurred in repaving the road-bed of a portion of one of the public streets in the city of Newark. The cost of this work has been imposed in accordance with the directions of the legislative act authorizing their improvements in the proportion of two-thirds of such cost on the owners of the lots fronting on the line of the section of the street thus repaved, and the remaining third on the city treasury. It thus appears that the statute in question undertakes to fix at the mere will of the legislature the ratio of expenses to be put upon the owners of the property along the line of the improvement, and the question is whether such an act is valid.

This enquiry, thus involved, has of late been so exhaustively discussed in a crowd of judicial decisions, that I do not feel inclined to do more than to so far refer to general principles as may be necessary to explain clearly what I conceive to have been heretofore decided by this court.

The doctrine that it is competent for the legislature to direct the expense of opening, paving or improving a public street, or at least some part of such expense to be put as a special burthen upon the property in the neighborhood of such improvement, can not, at this day, be drawn in question. There is nothing in the constitution of this state that requires that all the property in the state, or in any particular subdivision of the state, must be embraced in the operation of every law laying a tax. That the effect of such laws may not extend beyond certain presented limits is perfectly indisputable.

Digitized by Google

It is upon this principle that taxes raised in counties, townships and cities are vindicable. But while it is thus clear that the burden of a particular tax may be placed exclusively upon any particular district to whose benefit such tax is to inure, it seems to me it is equally clear that when such burden is sought to be imposed on particular lands, not in themselves constituting a political subdivision of the state, that we at once approach the line which is the boundary between acts of taxation and acts of confiscation. I think it is impossible to assert, with the least show of reason, that the legislative right to select the subject of taxation is not a limited right; for it would seem much more in accordance with correct theory to maintain that the power of selection of the property to be taxed can not be contracted to narrower hands than the political district within which it is to operate, than that such power is entirely illimitable. If such prerogative has no trammel or circumscription, then it follows that the entire burden of one of these public improvements can be placed, by the force of the legislative will, on the property of a few enumerated citizens, or even on that of a single citizen. In a government in which the legislative power is not omnipotent, and in which it is a fundamental axiom that private property cannot be taken without just compensation, the existence of an unlimited right in the law-making power to concentrate the burden of a tax upon specified property does not exist. If a statute should direct a certain street in a city to be paved and the expense of such paving to be assessed on the houses standing at the four corners of such street, this would not be an act of taxation, and it is presumed that no one would assert it to be such. If this can not be maintained, then it follows that it is conceded that the legislative power in question is not completely arbitrary. It has its limits, and the only enquiry is where that limit is to be placed.

This question was considered, and as it was supposed, was definitely settled by this court in the case of The Tide-Water Company v. Coster, reported in 3 C. E. Green, 518. The principle mentioned by that decision was that the cost of a public improvement might be imposed on particularized property to the extent to which such property was exceptionally benefited, and that any special burden beyond that measure was illegal. It was upon this principle that the case was rested.

The rule thus adopted stands upon the idea that it establishes a standard by which, with at least an approach to precision, an act of taxation may be distinguished from an act of confiscation.

So far as the particularized property is specially benefited, an exaction to that extent will not be a condemnation of property to the public use, because an equivalent is returned. And this is the ground upon which the abnormal burthen put upon the land owners is justified. Speaking on this subject, Chief Justice GREEN says: "The theory upon which such assessments are sustained as a legitimate exercise of the taxing power is that the party assessed is locally and peculiarly benefited over and above the ordinary benefit which as one of the community he receives in all public improvements, the precise extent of the assessment." State v. City of Newark, 3 Dutcher, 190.

It follows, then, that these local assessments are justifiable on the ground above, that the locality is to be especially to be benefited by the outlay of the money to be raised.

Unless this is the case no reason can be assigned why the tax is not general.

An assessment laid on property along a city street, for an improvement made on another street in a distant part of the same city, would be universally condemned both on moral and legal grounds. And yet there is no difference between such an extortion and the requisition upon a land-owner to pay for a public improvement over and above the exception benefit received by him. It is true that the power of taxing is one of the high and indispensable prerogatives of the government, and it can be only in cases free from all doubts, that its exercise can be declared by the courts to be illegal. But such a case, if it can ever arise, is certainly presented when property is specified out of which a public improvement is to be paid for in excess of the value specially imparted to it by such improvement. As to such excess I can not distinguish an act exacting its payment from the exercise of the power of eminent domain. In case of taxation the citizen pays his quota of the common burthen; when his land is sequestered for the public use he contributes more than such quota; and this is the distinction between the effect of the exercise of the taxing power and that of eminent domain.

When, then, the overplus beyond benefits from these local improvements is laid upon a few land-owners, such citizens, with respect to such overplus, are required to defray more than their share of the public outlay, and the concise act is not within the proper scope of the power to tax. As it does not seem practicable to define the area upon which a tax can be legitimately laid, and beyond which it can not be legitimately extended, and as there is, as has been shown, necessarily a limit to the power of selection in such instance, the principle stated in the case cited is perhaps the only one that can be devised whereby to graduate the power. Consequently when the improvement, as in the present instance, is primarily for the public welfare, and is only incidentally for the benefit of the land-owner, the rule thus established ought to be originally applied and adhered to.

With the doctrine thus expounded the case of The State v. Fuller, 5 Vroom, 227, is not in harmony. This was an assessment for the improvement of a sidewalk, and in that feature differed from the present one, which is for the improvement of the road-bed. I think the difference is a substantial one. A sidewalk has always, in the laws and usages of this state, been regarded as an appendage to and part of the premises to which it is attached, and is so essential to the beneficial use of such premises, that the improvement may well be regarded as a burthen belonging to the ownership of the land, and the order or requisition for such improvement as a police regulation.

On this ground I conceive it to be quite legitimate to direct it to be put in order at the sole expense of the owner of the property to which it is subservient and indispensable.

But in the reported case there was another circumstance which illegalized the preceedings. A part of the expense of constructing the sidewalk on one side of the street was thrown on the owners of the other side of the same street. The portion of the burthen thus transferred was one-sixth of the expense, and it was directed to that extent to be imposed irrespective of the amount of any ascertained benefit conferred. This brought the case within the prohibition inherent in the rule laid down in the Tide-Water case, so that the proceedings should have been set aside. The suggestion that in this class of cases it will be presumed that the benefits equal the burthen imposed until the contrary is shown cannot prevail. If well founded, it would have led to a different result in the Tide-Water case. The only safe rule is, that the statute authorizing the assessment shall itself fix, either in terms or by fair implication, the legal standard to which such assessment must be made to conform. In no other way can property be adequately protected.

The other objections by the counsel for the plaintiff in error do not seem to me well founded. I can perceive no solid foundation for the position that the law under which the assessment in question has been made raises up a contract between the land-owner and the public. This statute declares that it shall be lawful for the common council, on the application of three-fourths of the owners of property in any street, to order, etc., and it then adds that after such grading, etc., is effected, then "the city shall take charge of and keep the same in repair without further assessment." The argument was that after the land-owners had petitioned and the work was done, a bargain was constituted, the essential stipulation of which is that the expense of keeping the street in order shall be borne by the public. But how is this language to be converted into that of contract? It is not so in form, for it makes no offer to the land-owner. Nor is the substance with which it deals the subject-matter of agreement. It does not purport to ask from the citizen anything which the state has not the right to demand. The purpose is to define the mode and the extent of the legislative power of the municipality. The power conceded might have been given in an unqualified form, but its exercise was restricted with the condition that it should not be used unless a certain proportion of the owners of property consented, and that the power should not be used a second time. But these limitations on the prerogative of local legislation are concessions to the citizens, and cannot with any show of reason be transformed into considerations moving from the citizen to the state on which a contract can be built up. The admission of such a doctrine would carry many mischiefs with it. Agreements could be inferred from a large number of the ordinary acts of legislature. Public roads are laid on the application of a certain number of freeholders, and the statute directs that after such roads are laid they shall be opened and maintained at the public expense. Why, under such circumstances, can not a contract be claimed as well as in the case now in hand? Numerous other examples of laws from which, by the same course of reasoning, contracts might be deduced will readily occur, if the mind is given to the subject.

Digitized by Google

Neither do the decisions which were cited lend, as it appears to me, the least countenance to the doctrine in question. These are all cases outside of the ordinary field of legislation, and in which the citizen was induced to do some act or yield up some right or property which could not be taken from him except by his voluntary cession. The true principle undoubtedly is, that when it is alleged that any part of the sovereign power has been parted with by force of an agreement, such agreement must be clearly manifested. The cases are largely collected in the excellent work of Justice Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, p. 280. The language of the present statute has not such an aspect, and the intendment that it was the intention to give up forever any part of the public control with respect of the mode of keeping in order the streets of a great city, is not entertained for an instant. This exception to the proceedings can not be sustained.

On the other points raised on the argument, I agree with the views expressed in the supreme court.

There are other legal difficulties in the mode of making assessments under the statutory provisions above criticised which were not stated on the argument, which I shall not further notice than to intimate that I am not to be understood as sanctioning them by my silence.

On the ground first above stated the judgment should be reversed.

JUDGMENT REVERSED.

NOTE.—We have heretofore adverted to this case (CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, p. 245) and now propose to add but a few words concerning it. One leading proposition decided is that, as respects assessments upon abutters, there is a distinction as to the extent of legislative power between paving streets, and sidewalks as distinguished from streets. It is affimed that the legislature has the power to order the sidewalks to be paved at the sole expense of the adjoining owner, while the same power as respects the grading and paving of streets (proper) is denied. We do not recall any case elsewhere in which the same distinction is judicially asserted, while in many cases it has, impliedly at least, been denied, and the improvement of streets and sidewalks placed upon the same grounds.

The power to make local improvements at the expense of the adjoining property is a branch of the taxing power. The power to tax includes, in the absence of special constitutional restriction, the power to apportion the tax. The power of the legislature to direct all or at least some portion of the expense of opening and improving streets to be put as a special burden on the property in the neighborhood is conceded in the opinion to admit of no question. It is denied, however, that the legislature can fix the proportion of the expense to be borne by the adjoining owner and by the municipality at large, and the principle is asserted that the cost of the improvement may be imposed on the abutter only to the extent that his property is specially or exceptionally benefited—all beyond this, says the court, is illegal. The equity of this principle is obvious. The question of doubt is, who or what tribunal is to decide upon the extent to which the property is benefited? In other words, is the extent to which property will be benefited by improvements of a given character a legislative or judicial question? We should have been glad to have seen a fuller discussion of this aspect of the subject by the able and learned chief justice. Such improvements as grading and paving streets must be made by a general tax or a special assessment, or both. It has generally been considered that it was for the legislature to determine whether the expense should be borne in the one way or the other, or by a union of both. Municipality v. Dunn, 10 La. An. 57; People v Mayor, &c., of Brooklyn (leading case), 4 N. Y. 419. But the subject is full of difficulties, and some courts have, as in the principal case, asserted limitations on the power of the legislature. Hammett v. Philadelphia, 65 Pa. St. 146; Woodbridge v. Detroit, 8 Mich. 274; Hoyt v. East Saginaw, 19 Mich. 39; Cooley Const. Lim. 508; Dillon Munic. Corp. secs. 596, 597.

Married Women as Lawyers.

In re BELVA A. LOCKWOOD.

United States Court of Claims, May 11, 1874.

Hon. CHARLES D. DRAKE, Chief Justice.
EDWARD G. LORING, CHARLES C. NOTT, EBENEZER PECK, } Judges.

Married Women can not be Attorneys.—Under the constitution and laws of the United States a married woman is without legal capacity to take the office of attorney, and no court has power to admit her to such office.

NOTT, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an application in effect, though not in purpose, to have the law declared to be that the wife of a judge of a United States court may appear at its bar, and being found duly qualified, be admitted to the practice of the law before her husband. This effect of the application has probably not entered the mind of the applicant, but it is, nevertheless, the duty of the court to survey the entire limits of the legal situation and foresee the effects which must necessarily follow the grant of her petition; for, if she be lawfully entitled to admission to this bar, no discrimination can be made between her and every other married woman, properly qualified, domiciled in the District of Columbia. If it be true that there is no law to prevent a woman from acquiring the office of an attorney, it is equally true that there is no law to forbid the wives of the judges and law officers of the government from acquiring the same privilege. Therefore, if we decide that this application should be granted, we must at the same time decide that two beings whom the common law regards, in every material interest, as nearly as possible, as one, can discharge, without detriment to the interests of public justice, the dissimilar duties of arbiter and advocate.

The applicant comes before us as a married woman, domiciled in the District of Columbia, where the common law, except as it may have been altered by statute, prevails. It is needless to say that a system of law which prohibited the husband and wife from occupying the legal relations of witnesses for or against each other, and which scrupulously assured to every suitor an impartial tribunal, never contemplated as a possibility that the rights of third persons might be confided to judges liable to be swayed by the most powerful influence known to the law or to humanity. That there has been no express provision by statute, and that there was no exceptional rule at common law, to prevent any such dangerous and scandalous practice, certainly indicates that the law has never been considered to authorize the admission of women to the bar. It is not to be understood that there is any immediate likelihood that the wives of the judges or law officers of the government will descend to any such impropriety. Nevertheless, two things may be said of the matter: First, that the administration of justice should not be left to depend upon any man or woman's sense of propriety; and, second, that whenever the wife of a judge or attorney-general is admitted to practice, she will speedily acquire a very lucrative practice, which may sufficiently piece out her husband's salary, but which will as quickly occasion suspicions of partiality and corruption on the part of that branch of the government whose power and usefulness peculiarly rest upon the respect and confidence of the community.

Digitized by Google

Before this application can be granted there are three questions which must be considerd: First, is there any statutory law allowing women to practice in the courts of the United States; second, if there be none, was there any precedent of the kind at the time when the court was established; third, if there is neither positive enactment nor established precedent to sustain this application, would a woman be entitled to admission at common law?

All of these questions, it is needless to say, must be answered in the negative. There is a statute relating to the separate property of the wife, but this is not a question of property. Admission to the bar constitutes an office. Its exercise is neither an ordinary avocation nor a natural right. It is an artificial employment created not to give idle persons occupation, nor needy persons subsistence, but its purpose is simply to aid in the administration of public justice. The question is not whether this and that person can make a living at the bar, but whether their admission to the bar will assist in carrying out the purposes of jurisprudence. Moreover, the statute which it was said, on argument, has "thoroughly exploded" the common-law notion that husband and wife are one, is copied from the New York married woman act (Session Laws 1849. p. 528), as to which it has been held by the highest court in the state that the act changes the common law only in the particulars specifically named; and hence, that while a married woman may convey or devise property under the act free from her husband's control, nevertheless, if she die intestate, her husband will take her personalty as heir at common law. Ransom v. Nichols, 22 N. Y. 110. The married woman act for the District of Columbia (16 Stat. L. 45) does nothing more than to allow a married woman to take and control "her sole and separate property;" to convey and devise it; to sue and be sued "in all matters having relation to it." The statute also expressly recognizes the fundamental principle of the common law that, husband and wife being one, can not traffic with each other, when it excepts from its enabling provision a "gift or conveyance from her husband."

The common law has always regarded the family as the unit of society; the civil law the individual. Hence, at the civil law marriage was little more than a partnership into which indivduals could enter at will, the terms of which they could vary by agreement, the profits of which were to be the property of each, and the bands of which they might dissolve at pleasure. At the common law the family has always been regarded as a sacred entirety, with regard to which the rights and freedom and convenience and wishes of every person connected with it must yield. Its bands were indissoluble, and the duties and obligations connected with it were to be scrupulously enforced. For an absolutely Christian and moral community, whose property consists chiefly of land, the common law in respect to marriage would still continue to be the perfection of human reason. But the unhappy recurrence of drunken or profligate or spendthrift husbands with patient and industrious wives, and the great accretions of personal over real property, in modern times, have rendered some changes in the common law desirable, which are, for the most part, concessions by the mass of society in favor of its unfortunate exceptions. The common law was not unmindful of the natural rights of women or of wives, but regarding the family as the unit of society, it was inevitable that it should cast the burdens and responsibilities of life upon its head. If the husband possessed land before marriage, the wife by marriage instantly acquired an inchoate estate in it for her future support. If he should acquire land after marriage, for the same reason it became in a measure subjected to her, and no conveyance to him could be devised which would elude her right to dower. If an injury was done to her inheritance he was compelled to unite with her in her suit and assume the responsibility of its expenses, but if he died before judgment the action survived to her alone. If an estate was given to both or was acquired by purchase, they took neither as joint tenants nor as tenants in common. For the common law regarding them as but one person, held that they could not take by moieties and be both seized of an entirety; that neither could sell without the consent of the other, and that the survivors would take the whole. He was liable for her debts before marriage, though they were concealed from him, and for them his goods might be sold and his body thrown into prison. He was bound to provide for her in a manner suitable to her condition in life, and if he abandoned her, or they separated by consent, he lost not the liability, and when he sent her away he was said "to send his credit with her." Nay, if she abandoned him and returned, and he refused to receive her, his liability nevertheless returned with her, and he might be sued for her support. Her frauds and torts committed during coverture were his jointly with her, though he were ignorant or absent when they were committed, and if they were done by her in his presence they were his alone. If the remedy sought was by imprisonment, though the wrong was exclusively hers, he only was liable to be imprisoned.

When we pass from the relations of husband and wife to the office of attorney we find several responsibilities inseparable from it which seem inconsistent with the holding of the office by a woman. In cases of misconduct by an attorney he may be attached by the court and imprisoned, but if the attorney were a married woman she might come in and say that the misconduct occurred in her husband's presence, and that at common law it was by his compulsion. She might misapply the funds of a client, or be guilty of gross neglect or fraud, and the husband be sued at common law for the wrong which she committed as attorney. In the case now before us it has been intimated that the admission of the party is sought with the husband's knowledge, and that she may be appointed by his consent. But a court can not make an exceptional rule which will apply to one party and not to another, nor can it change the existing law so as to hold a woman to the full responsibility of an attorney, nor can it change the legal relations of husband and wife "by consent" any more than it can grant divorces "by consent."

So far as the rule of this court is concerned it contemplates only the admission of men. Its language is that "no counsel will be permitted to practice in the court unless he is a man of good moral character." It can not be denied that the masculine gender, which is generally used in statutes, frequently embraces the feminine; but if a masculine word receives any such latitude of construction it is when it is applied to those cases where law and custom recognize men and women as standing upon the same ground of right or responsibility, the general rule being that words are to be construed according to their usual meaning. Certainly it is not obligatory on courts to construe them otherwise, unless that is made obligatory by legislation. There is no such legislation affecting this court or its rules, and certainly when our rules were made the word "man" was used in its usual and literal meaning, and, so used, expressed all that the court then intended.

If the statute require that the owner of a city lot shall remove the snow from his sidewalk, it will be held to extend to men, women and children; for the statute is directed indiscriminately to the owners of property, and pre-existing law and usage have regarded the owners of property as liable to certain charges upon it, without reference to their age or sex. But the word "man" in a statute exacting military service, would not be construed to include women, for the pre-existing law, that is to say, the established usages of society, have never regarded women as liable to render such service.

Digitized by Google

For the same reason the word in the rule can not be held to include women unless women have heretofore been regarded as capable of filling this office. If the word "man" in this rule can be enlarged, against all pre-existing usage, by the loose construction of a court, so as to include men and women, then the word man in a statute enforcing military service in like manner can be extended at the will of the judiciary. Where a statute provides that all able-bodied citizens between certain ages shall perform military service, and then, like the conscription act, 3d March, 1863 (12 Stat. at Large, 731, sec. 2), excepts a "father" in one case, a "son" in another, and a "brother" in a third, and finally declares "that no persons except such as are herein excepted shall be exempt," it would be within the discretion of a court to say that the statute included women in the term "persons." The rule of construction unquestionably is that a statute can never be extended to a new subject-matter, nor used to alter what under prevailing usage exists, by giving to its words a meaning which, so far as regards that statute or that subject-matter, they were never before supposed to possess. If a judge could at his fancy so construe this rule of the court as to hold that women may be attorneys, I do not see upon what legal ground he would be restrained from holding that they must be soldiers, for the difference between the two is simply a distinction of taste or sentiment as to which the opinions of mankind change and vary. Some persons who regard women as eligible for admission to the bar would recoil from exacting of them military service. Others would think that both were equally beyond their sphere. I have been at the bar and in the military service, and my experience leads me to the conclusion that women are as well fitted for the one as for the other. Another person having had similar experiences may reach an opposite result. It is said that modern ideas have brought down many occupations within the reach of women which were supposed to belong exclusively to men; but in nothing have modern ideas done so much of this leveling as in the art of war. In the hand-to-hand conflicts of antiquity women were manifestly unable to cope with the physical natures of men, and from necessity were exempt. But hand-to-hand conflicts are as obsolete as the wager of battle. The light breech-loading carbine demands activity rather than strength. Woman as a soldier would have little to do besides marching and shooting and being shot. It is said that a well-read, intelligent, honest woman will make a better attorney than an ignorant, vicious, unscrupulous man. This is true; but it is equally true that a healthy, active woman will make a better soldier than a decrepit man. Some considerations of public policy also intervene in favor of the latter course. There may be occasions when the conscription of women as soldiers, if permissible at law, will seem to verge on absolute necessity; but as to attorneys it can hardly be supposed that there will ever be a time when their scarcity will greatly endanger the public safety. These reflections I have indulged in, not from any serious apprehensions of their realization, but to illustrate how dangerously fallacious is the reasoning which invites a court to attempt the overthrow of existing law.

It is not for the judiciary to intermeddle with the question as to what is or what is not the "proper sphere of woman." It is enough for judges to know that her legal position is, by an unwritten law, interwoven with the very fabric of society, and that when society frames constitutions of government it places them upon a foundation of its own immemorial usages, which society can reconstruct, but as to which it may be doubted whether even the legislative power has authority to overturn.

It is said in the argument that the whole subject of the admission of attorneys is within the discretion of a court, but this is not strictly true. Admission to the bar constitutes an office. In the first days of attorneys of record the office existed only by appointment of the crown, and during our earlier history the power of appointment was exercised exclusively by the colonial governors. In both England and this country the power of appointment was conferred upon courts by statute. 4 Henry IV. chap. 18; New York constitution, 1777, sec. 27; in re Cooper, 22 N. Y. 80. The appointment to the office by a court is a judicial act. Ex parte Secombe, 19 How. 9. Refusal to admit a person conceded to be properly qualified is a judgment subject to the reversal of an appellate court. In re Cooper. Disbarring an attorney is likewise a judicial act, in like manner subject to be reversed. Ex parte Heyfron, 7 How. Miss. 127. Courts of the United States for convenience recognize admission to the bar of state courts as proof of qualifications, and accept the introduction by a member of their own bar as testimony of personal and professional good character; but these are merely evidence on which the court acts, and its action remains as before a judicial decision. Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333.

It is to be understood that the decision of this court does not rest upon those grounds which would make its judgment final. We do not, in legal effect, pass upon the individual application before us, but refuse to act upon it for want of jurisdiction. Our decision is not necessarily final, and there is express authority for saying that if we err the supreme court can review our error and give relief to the applicant by mandamus. Roberts' Case, 8 Court Claims, 118. The position which this court assumes is that under the laws and constitution of the United States a court is without power to grant such an application, and that a woman is without legal capacity to take the office of attorney.

MOTION DENIED.

NOTE.—The above case will no doubt interest many of our readers. While we are inclined to concur in the result reached, we cannot but regret that the legal obstacles which exist in the present state of the common law in this country to the admittance of married women to the bar, had not been more fully stated. When we began reading the opinion we supposed that Mrs. Lockwood was the wife of some federal judge, but on enquiry we learn that she is not the wife of any judge, but that her husband is a doctor of medicine. Form the outset of the opinion to its close, the reader can not fail to be impressed with the conclusion that the learned justice who pronounced the judgment of the court entertains very strong views upon the question. Indeed the opinion can scarcely be said to be couched in that calm and dispassionate language which should characterize judicial argument. Where the learned justice takes occasion to declare that "for an absolutely Christian community, whose property consists chiefly of land, the common law in respect to marriage would still continue to be the perfection of human reason," he utters an encomium upon the common law which eminent writers have uttered before him. But it is nevertheless true that there are lawyers quite as enlightened who, upon a comparison between the common and the civil law in their respective treatment of married women, believe the former to be a little better than an aggregation of barbarism. If we might resort to particular illustrations, as the learned justice has done, we could point to the fact that, upon the death of the husband, the wife is entitled, for her support, to a life estate in one-third of his realty; while upon the birth of a child capable of inheriting, the husband becomes vested with an interest in all of the wife's realty, which upon her death ripens into a freehold for life. How this can be pronounced the perfection of human reason, even as applicable to a purely Christian community, is more than we can see. On the contrary, it seems the very essence of barbaric injustice, unworthy of the jurisprudence of a nation which claims to be enlightened, but worthy only of the source from whence it derived its origin—worthy of the policy of the rude hordes which, from the frozen forests of Germany and of Scythia, descended like a curse upon the Roman world.

The learned justice descends into particulars to explain what the common law was with reference to the status of married women, but he does not explain with equal clearness what her status is, nor does he present in a satisfactory manner the disabilities under which she at present labors, which would prevent her from assuming the responsibilities of an attorney. If these had been fully developed and properly presented, they probably would have been found insuperable. But instead of clearly discussing this, the only legal question involved in the case, a considerable portion of the opinion is devoted to a discussion of the question of policy involved in it. Upon this question of policy the opinion of the great mass of the legal profession will no doubt accord with that of the learned justice, but there are some enlightened lawyers who think otherwise. But, however this may be, so long as the court profess to decide it, not as a question of policy or propriety, but as one of jurisdiction, this part of the opinion appears to be quite irrelevant. More especially would this remark seem to be applicable to that part of it which institutes a comparison between women as lawyers and women as soldiers. Indeed, that was little better than a sneer.

Digitized by Google

With reference to the doubt which the learned justice expresses whether even the legislative power has authority to overturn what society has established as the status of married women, we may be pardoned for suggesting that it is generally supposed among lawyers that the enacting of a measure by the legislature is the highest evidence that it is in accordance with public policy. State v. Clark, 54 Mo. We believe that it has never been supposed in this country that courts possess the power to declare a statute a nullity, unless it is found to conflict with the written constitution—the organic law. We may therefore indulge in the supposition that if congress should, in its wisdom or folly, see fit to pass a law making married women eligible to the office of attorney in the federal courts, even the Court of Claims might, on reflection, feel obliged to succumb.

It is to be observed that the opinion concludes that a woman is without legal capacity to take the office of attorney. It is perhaps to be regretted that the learned justice had not, in this concluding sentence, confined himself to the case in judgment—that of a married woman. Several courts, perhaps equally as respectable as the Court of Claims, have admitted single women to practice at their bar. This has been done by the federal court at St. Louis, and also by that at Chicago. In the later court, before his honor Judge BLODGETT, a lady attorney appeared a few days since and won her maiden case. From the report of the case in the Chicago Legal News, as well as our knowledge of the high standing of the court, we may presume that it was fairly won—not by overwhelming the learned judge with "the most powerful influence known to the law or humanity," but "by request and such fair [legal] question as soul to soul affordeth." S. D. T.

Right of National Banks to Sue in the Federal Courts where there is a Remedy in Equity to Restrain the Collection of Illegal Taxes—Jurisdiction of Federal Courts in Equity in such Cases.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF OMAHA, NEBRASKA, v. THE COUNTY OF DOUGLAS, NEBRASKA, AND EDWARD F. McSHANE, ITS TREASURER.

United States Circuit Court, District of Nebraska.

This was a bill in equity for an injunction to restrain the collection of taxes levied by the commissioners for the defendant county, on behalf of the state of Nebraska and of the county, upon the capital stock of the plaintiff.

At the May term, 1872, a motion was made by Mr. Woolworth, counsel for the bank, to the court, Mr. Justice MILLER presiding, for an injunction, which motion was opposed by Mr. Cowen, counsel for the county, on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

Mr. Justice MILLER held:—

1. National banks may, by reason of their character as such, sue in the federal courts.

2. A part of the taxes sought to be restrained being for the state of Nebraska, and the county treasurer being by the revenue law of the state required to pay the same into the state treasury when they are collected, and no provision being made by law for an action or other proceeding against the state for the recovery of them back if illegally exacted, the plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law, and equity will intervene by injunction to restrain their collection.

3. When a county treasurer holds one warrant in which he is commanded to enforce payment of both state and county taxes, which for a common reason are illegal, equity, having jurisdiction to restrain the treasurer from enforcing the payment of the state taxes, may proceed to the determination of the validity of the county taxes as well, and restrain them also.

4. The First National Bank of Omaha filed its bill against the county of Douglas and its treasurer, to have it declared that taxes for 1870 and 1871, levied by the state of Nebraska and the county of Douglas upon the capital stock of the bank were illegal, and to restrain that officer "from making distress upon the property of the plaintiff as he threatened to do, and from all other proceedings to enforce the payment" of the taxes. On motion for an injunction the defendant objected to the jurisdiction of the court as a federal court, and also as a court of equity. Held, that there was jurisdiction to entertain the bill and allow an injunction.

INJUNCTION ALLOWED.

The Arkansas Imbroglio—Opinion of the Attorney-General.

The attorney-general has submitted to the president his opinion in the Arkansas case, wherein Elisha Baxter and Joseph Brooks, each claiming to be governor of the state, had made application to the president for aid to suppress the insurrection. After quoting from the constitution of Arkansas the section providing for the opening of and publishing of election returns for state officers, under which Baxter was declared governor, and the clause providing for contested cases, under which the lower house of the assembly rejected Brooks' petition for contest by the decisive vote of 33 to 9, the attorney passes to proceedings of Brooks in the courts, he in substance says:

Subsequently to the vote in the lower house, the attorney-general of Arkansas, upon petition of Brooks, applied to the supreme court of the state for a quo warranto to try the validity of Baxter's title to the office of governor, in which it was alleged that Baxter was a usurper, &c. That court denied the application upon the ground that courts of the state had no right to try and determine the question presented, because exclusive jurisdiction in such cases had been conferred on the general assembly by the constitution and laws of the state. Brooks then brought suit against Baxter in the Pulaski Circuit Court under the civil code of Arkansas. Brooks states in his petition that he received more than 95,000 votes, and that Baxter received less than 30,000 votes for governor, and after declaring that Baxter has usurped the office, prays that it may be given to him by judgment of the court, and that he may recover $2000, the emoluments of the office. This presented to the courts the simple question of a contest for the office of governor. Baxter demurred to the petition on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the case, and afterwards, on the 15th of April, the court, in absence of defendant's counsel, overruled demurrer, and without further pleadings or any evidence in the case, rendered judgment for Brooks in accordance with the prayer and petition. Brooks, within a few minutes thereafter, without process to enforce execution, of said judgment, and with the aid of armed men, forcibly ejected Baxter and took possession of the governor's office. On the next day after the judgment was rendered Baxter's counsel moved to set aside, alleging among other things as grounds therefor, that they were absent when the demurrer was submitted and final judgment rendered; that the judgment of the court upon overruling the demurrer should have been that the defendant answer over, instead of which final judgment was rendered without giving any time or opportunity to answer the complaint upon its merits; that the court assessed damages without any jury or evidence; and, finally, that the court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the suit. But the next day this motion was overruled by the court, when the president, in pursuance of a provision of the constitution of the United States, was called upon by the executive of the state to protect it against domestic violence. It appears to be his duty to give the required aid, especially when there is no doubt about the existence of violence. But where two persons claim to be governor, and make calls upon the president under the constitution, it becomes necessary for him to determine which of the persons is the constitutional governor. The constitution of Arkansas is decisive of this question as between Baxter and Brooks. According to the constitution and laws of the state, the votes for governor were counted, and Baxter declared elected, and he at once was duly inaugurated.

Assuming that no greater effect is to be given to counting the votes in the presence of the general assembly than ought to be given to similar action by any board of canvassers, yet, when it comes to decide a question of contest, the general assembly is converted by the constitution into a judicial body; its judgment is as conclusive and final as is the judgment of the supreme court of the state on any matter within its jurisdiction. The parties to such contest plead and produce evidence according to practice provided in such cases, and the controversy is invested with the forms and effect of a judicial procedure.

Mr. Brooks appears to claim that when the contest for governor is decided by the general assembly, the defeated party may treat the decision as a nullity and proceed de novo in the courts. This makes the constitutional provision as to contest of no effect, and proceedings under it an empty form. Looking at the constitution alone, it appears perfectly clear that the courts of the state have no right to try the contest about the office of governor, but that exclusive jurisdiction over that question is invested in the general assembly.

There is a decision made by the supreme court upon the precise question presented in the case of Brooks v. Baxter. Berry was a candidate for state auditor on the same ticket with Brooks. Wheeler, his competitor, was declared elected by the general assembly. Berry then brought suit under § 525 of the code, in the Pulaski Circuit Court to recover the office. Wheeler applied to the supreme court for an order to restrain proceedings, and that court issued a writ of prohibition forbidding said court to proceed, on the ground that it had no jurisdiction in the case as to the questions of law involved.

Digitized by Google

The cases of Berry and Brooks are exactly alike. That this circuit court should have rendered judgment for Brooks, under these circumstances, is surprising, and it is not too much to say that it presents a case of judicial insubordination which deserves the reprehension of every one who does not wish to see public confidence an uncertainty, and the good faith of judicial proceedings wholly destroyed.

Taking the provision of the constitution which declares that contested elections about certain state officers, including governor, shall be determined by the general assembly, and that provision of law which says all contested elections of governor shall be decided by the legislature, and decisions of the supreme court affirming the exclusive jurisdiction of that body over the subject, and the conclusion irresistibly follows that said judgment of the circuit court is void. A void judgment binds nobody. Section 525 of the code, under which this judgment was rendered, is no doubt intended to apply to county and other inferior officers, for which no provision is elsewhere made.

Respecting the claim that Brooks received a majority of votes at the election, it must be said that the president has no way to verify that claim. If he had it would not, in my opinion, under the circumstances of this case, be a proper subject for his consideration. Perhaps, if everything about the election was in confusion and there had been no legal count of votes, the question of majorities might form an element of discussion. But where, as in this case, there has been a legal count of votes, and the tribunal organized by the constitution of the state for that purpose has declared the election, the president ought not to go behind that action to look into the state vote. Frauds may have been committed, but unhappily there are few elections where partisan zeal runs high in which the victorious party, with more or less of truth, is not charged with acts of fraud.

There must be an end to this controversy upon the subject. It would be disastrous to allow the proceedings by which Brooks obtained possession of the office to be drawn into precedent. There is not a state in the Union in which they would not produce conflict, and probably bloodshed. They cannot be upheld or justified upon any grounds, and, in my opinion, Baxter should be recognized as the lawful executive of the state of Arkansas.

Since the foregoing was written the attorney-general says:

I have received a telegraphic copy of what purports to be the decision of the supreme court of Arkansas, delivered on the 7th instant, from which it appears that the auditor of state, upon requisition of Brooks, drew his warrant on the treasurer for the sum of $1000, payment of which was refused. Brooks then applied to the supreme court for a writ of mandamus upon the treasurer, who set up by way of defence that Brooks was not governor of the state, to which Brooks demurred, and thereupon the court says:

"The only question that we deem it necessary to notice is, 'Did the circuit court have jurisdiction to render judgment in the case of Brooks v. Baxter?' We feel some delicacy about expressing an opinion upon the question propounded, but under the pleading it has to be passed upon incidentally if not absolutely determining whether the relator is entitled to the relief asked for. His right to the office, if established at all, is established by judgment of the circuit court of Pulaski county We are of opinion that the circuit court had jurisdiction on the subject-matter, and its judgment appears to be regular and valid. Having arrived at these conclusions, the demurrer is overruled and the writ of mandamus will be awarded as prayed for."

To show the value of this decision it is proper that I should make the following statement: On the 20th of April Brooks made formal application to the president for aid to suppress domestic violence, which was accompanied by a paper signed by Chief Justice McCLURE and Justices SEARLE and STEPHENSON, in which they stated that they recognized Brooks as governor; and to this paper is also appended the name of Page, the respondent in the above named proceedings for mandamus. Mr. Page, therefore, did not refuse to pay the warrant of the auditor because he did not recognize Brooks as governor, but the object of his refusal evidently was to create such facts as were necessary to make a case for the supreme court. Accordingly pleadings were made up by parties both of whom were on the same side in the controversy, and the issue so made was submitted to the judges virtually pledged to give the decision wanted; and there, within the military encampment of Brooks, they hurriedly but with delicacy, as they say, decided that he is governor—a decision in plain contravention of the constitution and laws of the state, and in direct conflict with two other recent decisions of the same court deliberately made.

I refrain from comment. More than once the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that it would not hear argument in a case made up in this way, and a decision obtained under such circumstances is not recognized as authority by any respectable tribunal. No doubt this decision will add to the complications and difficulties of the situation, but it does not affect my judgment as to the right of Baxter to the office of governor until it is otherwise decided upon.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE Supreme Court of Missouri adjourned its St. Louis term on Monday last after delivering opinions in forty-three cases. These we shall hereafter abstract or publish in full, according to their importance, as fast as our space will permit.

—JUDGE WOODRUFF, of the United States Circuit Court, and Judge WILLIAM E. CURTIS, of the Superior Court, have accepted an invitation of the faculty of Yale College to pass upon prize essays to be presented by the senior class of the law school of that college.

—WE have seen in the Nashville Republican Banner a letter of Hon. Philip Lindsley, of Nashville, taking strong grounds, and assigning his reasons at length, in favor of calling a convention to amend the constitution of that state. We understand that a erable portion of the public press are taking ground in favor of a ention. There are doubtless defects in the constitution of that state, but they relate to subjects political rather than legal in their character.

—THE Financier says that the attorney-general of Wisconsin has given the opinion that the new law regulating railroad charges is constitutional, and it is reported that measures will be instituted to enforce obedience to it. On the other hand, it is understood that Messrs. Evarts, Hoar, B. R. Curtis, and other eminent counsel, have advised the Milwaukee & St. Paul, and Chicago & Northwestern companies that the law cannot stand if brought before the courts. It is probable that a test case will be made with these companies, which will virtually decide the constitutionality of the tariff laws of Illinois and other Western states as well as that of Wisconsin.

—NEW ORLENS city bonds of 1854, originally issued in exchange for the stock of the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern R. R. Co., having recently fallen due, have been protested for non-payment. The city was authorized to offer in exchange for them a new issue of twenty-year bonds, or the new consolidated-loan seven-per-cent. gold bonds, but holders refused both these offers, and now the secondary liability of the railroad company—having received and sold the bonds—is being discussed. The company holds that in merely transferring these securities it did not become liable for them. So far as we know, the question of such liability has not been thoroughly determined, and this case, if brought before the courts, as now seems probable, will become of great interest to all holders and dealers in coupon bonds.—The Financier.

—THE fruits of repudiation are already becoming visible in the action of the foreign bondholders in attempting to divert capital from the development of the valuable coal and iron interests of Virginia. The commissioners sent to London for that purpose had succeeded in interesting not only English capital but English miners in the enterprise. But just as these projected arrangements were being completed, a circular was issued discouraging in every way such investment, and declaring it a measure of common prudence to abandon it because no private investment can be safe where the obligations of justice, morality and law are set at defiance by the community, as disclosed in the refusal of Virginia to pay the interest on her bonded indebtedness. Not only is the London council prepared to oppose the investment of English capital in states where unpaid principal and interest is claimed, but they have invoked the attention of their continental allies to the same.

—THE 54th volume of New Hampshire Reports promises to be one of the most valuable that has been published in this country for many years. It will contain four very important cases, respectively known as the "Church Case," the "Exemplary Damage Case," and the "Mortgage Trust Case." It is understood that the first will take at least 250 pages of the volume; the second, 50 pages; the third, 100 pages, and the fourth 50 pages. These will be followed by what is known as the "Mink Case"—a case arising in a comparatively trivial circumstance, but in which the court (DOE, J., delivering the opinion) discuss the law in relation to the defence of property, more exhaustively, perhaps, than it has ever been discussed in any other case. An idea of the thoroughness with which the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court of New Hampshire do their work may be inferred from the fact that Judge DOE consumed six solid months in the preparation of his dissenting opinion in the "Church Case," exhausting every authority he could find bearing upon the question.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, MAY 28, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

THE valuable note in this number to the case of The Dollar Savings Bank v. The United States, is from the pen of John N. Rogers, Esq., of the Davenport bar. It has been prepared at our request, and we hope occasionally to be favored in like manner by the pen of this accomplished lawyer.

The United States Supreme Court Reports.

The profession have long desired that CURTIS' Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which closed with the 17th volume of Howard, might be continued by some person equally competent. We were therefore gratified to receive recently from Messrs. Morrison, of Washington, an announcement that they had arranged with Mr. Justice MILLER to take up the work where Judge CURTIS left it. The title page of the first volume under the editorship of Justice MILLER is before us, and is as follows:

"Cases argued and adjudged in the Supreme Court of the United States, at the terms of December, 1855, 1856, 1857 and 1858; being the terms embraced in the 18th, 19th, 20th and 21st volumes of Howard's Reports. Reported by SAMUEL F. MILLER, LL.D., one of the justices of the said court."

We suppose that it is contemplated to bring this series down to the present time—at all events this ought to be done, so as to give the profession an uniform edition of the Reports of the highest judicial tribunal in the country. Judge MILLER's well-known faculty of extracting and stating the principles of cases will give to his labors in this direction an especial value.

The Brinkley Divorce Case—a Singular Suit.

Most of our readers are familiar with this celebrated case, which has now been in the courts for several years. The defendant, Hugh L. Brinkley, is a great-grandson of Judge Overton of Tennessee—a very able judge, whose decisions did much towards shaping the early jurisprudence of that state. If the writer's recollection serves him right, Overton, Jackson and Winchester were the founders of the city of Memphis—having purchased the land and laid out that city by a tripartite deed in the year 1818 or 1820. By large and judicious investments, Judge Overton left to his descendants an immense landed property, a large portion of which will descend, in right of his mother, to the defendant in this suit. The interesting question in the divorce case is, whether there was in fact any marriage, the complainant asserting that there was, though not solemnized according to the forms of law, and the defendant asserting that the complainant was simply a kept mistress. While the suit was pending in the Chancery Court of Memphis, an application for alimony pending the suit was made, and having been heard upon affidavits, was denied by the Chancellor. This interlocutory decree was considered decisive of his views on the merits of the case, and the suit was therefore dismissed in Tennessee, and a new action brought in the Supreme Court at New York city. Judge BARNARD, of that court, awarded alimony pending the suit, and his ruling was affirmed in the supreme court.

At the time of this writing the case is on trial in the Supreme Court at New York city, before Judge VAN BRUNT. Messrs. Beach & Brown representing the plaintiff, and W. H. Anthon the defendant. Subjoined is a synopsis of Mrs. Brinkley's testimony, as given in the Daily Register:

"Mrs. Elizabeth Brinkley was placed on the stand and gave evidence at great length. She is a lady of very prepossessing appearance, was elegantly dressed, and gave her evidence with great delicacy and decision. She stated that she had known the defendant in her youth, but had again renewed the acquaintance in the year 1864, when she was staying at a boarding-house in Twenty-fifth street. She was then twenty-one years of age, and Mr. Brinkley proposed matrimony to her, but he said he must be married without any form or the attendance of any witnesses, as his father, who was a Southerner, and upon whom he was dependent for future property, would object, as he was very proud and well connected. She at length entertained Mr. Brinkley's proposals, who promised on a certain day to bring her a ring and go through a form between themselves. In April, 1864, he came to the house where she was staying, but brought no ring, instead of which he made a vow by a gold cross which he took from his watch-guard and gave her, and which had been the property of his mother; that, as he hoped to meet that deceased relation in heaven, he would acknowledge and act towards her as a wife. His mother was possessed of considerable property to which his father then held the right, and which would come to him and his sister. Being thus married to him, he removed her to several first-class boarding-houses and hotels, and they traveled to many places in the states as man and wife, and went eventually to Memphis. They lived as man and wife together for five years, moved in good society, and were so recognized. In 1868, Mr. Brinkley, at his father's instigation, refused any longer to recognize her as his wife. She commenced proceedings against him in the courts at Memphis, and subsequently in the courts of this state. In 1870, before Judge BARNARD, she was awarded $1,000 to conduct her case, and $25 per week for maintenance, and her husband objecting to this allowance, it was confirmed on appeal to the supreme court. A diary, which she had kept since 1865, was put in evidence, which she stated was always open to her husband's view, and was constantly read by him. Defendant's attorney cross-examined her at great length about it, in reference to the certainty of her husband's having seen it, and particularly some marked passages; but she persistently maintained his perfect knowledge of its contents.

The Right to Keep and Bear Arms for Private and Public Defence.

The second amendment of the constitution of the United States recites that "a well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." Similar provisions will probably be found in the constitutions of most of the states. Thus the constitution of Texas declares that "every person shall have the right to keep and bear arms in the lawful defence of himself or the state, under such regulations as the legislature may prescribe." Art. 1, § 13. So the present constitution of Tennessee provides that "the citizens of this state have a right to keep and bear arms for their common defence; but the legislature shall have power by law to regulate the wearing of arms with a view to prevent crime." These and similar provisions in the constitutions of other states have been discussed in several cases, and with the apparently growing habit of legislatures to restrict the wearing of arms, their exposition assumes increasing importance. The provision in the federal constitution does not appear ever to have received exposition in the Supreme Court of the United States, but the state tribunals have furnished a series of interesting decisions upon the subject, referring either to the federal or to the state constitution.

Digitized by Google

1. The first of these appears to have been Bliss v. Commonwealth, 2 Littell, 90, determined in the Court of Appeals of Kentucky in 1822, and relates to the question we shall consider first—the manner of carrying weapons. The constitution of Kentucky provided "that the right of the citizens to bear arms in defence of themselves and the state shall not be questioned." It was held that a statute providing that "any person in this commonwealth, who shall hereafter wear a pocket-pistol, dirk, large knife, or sword in a cane, concealed as a weapon, unless when travelling on a journey, shall be fined in any sum not less than one hundred dollars," etc. This statute was held to be in conflict with the constitutional guaranty, and hence void—one of the three judges dissenting. The court said: "That the provisions of the act in question do not import an entire destruction of the right of the citizens to bear arms in defence of themselves and the state, will not be controverted by the court; for though the citizens are forbid wearing weapons concealed in the manner described in the act, they may nevertheless, bear arms in any other admissible form. But to be in conflict with the constitution it is not essential that the act should contain a prohibition against bearing arms in every possible form. It is the right to bear arms in defence of the citizens and the state that is secured by the constitution, and whatever restrains the full and complete exercise of that right, though not an entire destruction of it, is forbidden by the explicit language of the constitution. If, therefore, the act in question imposes any restraint upon the right, immaterial what appellation may be given to the act, whether it be an act regulating the manner of bearing arms or any other, the consequence, in reference to the constitution, is precisely the same, and its collision with that instrument equally obvious." And the court further on declare that "in principle there is no difference between a law prohibiting the wearing of concealed arms and a law forbidding the wearing of such as are exposed." And, therefore, the defendant having been convicted and fined for carrying a sword concealed in a cane, the judgment was reversed.

The next case in order of time appears to have been The State v. Mitchell, 3 Blackf. 229, determined in the Supreme Court of Indiana in 1833. The ruling is diametrically opposed to that in the Kentucky case. The report does no more than mention the point ruled in the briefest terms, but it would seem that the Indiana constitutional provision was simply "that the people have a right to bear arms for the defence of themselves and the state." And the statute (Laws of Ind., ed. of 1831, p. 192) which was held not in derogation of this provision provided that "every person, not being a traveller, who shall wear or carry any dirk, pistol, sword in a cane, or other dangerous weapon concealed, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not exceeding one hundred dollars."

This ruling was followed by the Supreme Court of Alabama in 1840, in The State v. Reid, 1 Ala. 612. The provision of the Alabama constitution was almost identical with that of Indiana. It provided that "every citizen has the right to bear arms in defence of himself and the state." And it was held that this provision was not infringed by a statute which provided that "if any person shall carry concealed about his person any species of fire-arms, or any bowie-knife, Arkansas tooth-pick, or any other knife of the like kind, dirk, or other concealed weapon, the person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, before any court having competent jurisdiction, pay a fine of not less than fifty nor more than five hundred dollars," etc. The statute was held not in conflict with the constitutional provision. And this ruling was reaffirmed in Owen v. The State, 31 Ala. 387. The Supreme Court of Alabama in the former case say: "The constitution, in declaring that 'every citizen has the right to bear arms in defence of himself and the state,' has neither expressly nor by implication denied the legislature the right to enact laws in regard to the manner in which arms shall be borne. The right guarantied to the citizen is not to bear arms upon all occasions and in all places, but merely 'in defence of himself and the state.' The terms in which this provision is phrased seem to us necessarily to leave with the legislature the authority to adopt such regulations of police as may be dictated by the safety of the people and the advancement of public morals." And further on they say: "We do not desire to be understood as maintaining that in regulating the manner of bearing arms, the authority of the legislature has no other limit than that of its own discretion. A statute which, under pretence of regulating, amounts to a destruction of the right, or which requires arms to be so borne as to render them wholly useless for the purpose of defence, would be clearly unconstitutional. But a law which is intended merely to promote personal security, and to put down lawless aggression and violence, and to that end inhibits the wearing of certain weapons in such a manner as is calculated to exert an unhappy influence upon the moral feelings of the wearer, by making him less regardful of the personal security of others, does not come in collision with the constitution." And the court also say: "Under the provision of our constitution, we incline to the opinion that the legislature cannot inhibit the citizen from bearing arms openly, because it authorizes him to bear them for the purpose of defending himself and the state, and it is only when carried openly that they can be effectively used for defence." 1 Ala. 616, 617, 619.

The distinction here taken in regard to the manner of carrying or wearing weapons, has been followed in several later cases. Thus in Nunn v. The State, 1 Kelly, 243, decided in 1846, the Supreme Court of Georgia held that a statute of that state, so far as it sought to suppress the practice of carrying certain weapons secretly, was valid, inasmuch as it did not deprive the citizen of his natural right of self-defence, or of his constitutional right to keep and bear arms; but that so much of it as prohibited the wearing of certain arms openly, was unconstitutional and void. To the same effect, see Stockdale v. The State, 32 Ga. 225, and the very thoroughly considered case of The State v. Buzzard, 4 Ark. 18. So it has been held in several cases in Louisiana, that a statute prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons did not infringe the right of the people to keep and bear arms, but was simply a measure of police, prohibiting only a particular mode of bearing arms which is found dangerous to the peace of society. The State v. Jumel, 13 La. An. 399; The State v. Smith, 11 La. An. 633; The State v. Chandler, 5 La. An. 489. The same conclusion was reached by the Supreme Court of Tennessee in 1840 in Aymette v. The State, 2 Humph. 154, but upon somewhat different grounds, as we shall see further on; and is also supported by Andrews v. The State, 3 Heiskell (Tenn.) 165.

Digitized by Google

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Taxation of Savings Banks—Remedy for Collection of Taxes by Action at Law.

THE DOLLAR SAVINGS BANK, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, v. THE UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 203, October Term, 1873.

1. Taxation of Savings Banks—Act of July 13, 1866.—The act of congress of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 138), authorizes the levy and collection of a tax upon the accumulated earnings carried to the contingent fund of a savings bank, although such bank is without stockholders or capital stock, and merely does the business of receiving deposits to be loaned and invested for the sole benefit of its depositors.

2. Internal Revenue Laws—Construction by Commissioner of Internal Revenue.—The rule that when a judicial construction has been given to a statute the re-enactment of the statute is in effect a legislative adoption of that construction, does not apply to the construction placed upon an internal revenue law by the commissioner of internal revenue. Such a construction is not a judicial construction within the meaning of this principle.

3. Remedy for Recovery of Tax—Debt in U. S. Circuit Court.—The United States may maintain an action of debt in one of its circuit courts for the recovery of such a tax.

4. ——. Government not Concluded by Remedies Enumerated in Statute.—The common-law rule that where a statute creates a right and provides a particular remedy for its enforcement, such remedy is generally exclusive of all common-law remedies, does not apply to the government. The king, in England, and in this country the state or government, is not bound by a statue unless named therein by express words. It is therefore held, arguendo, that the United States are not prohibited by the internal revenue law from adopting any remedy for the recovery of its revenue which is known to the laws of the state where the revenue accrues.

5. ——. Assessment.—In a suit by the United States to recover the tax imposed upon the contingent fund of a savings bank, it is not necessary that there should have been an assessment.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

The facts found by the special verdict are that the plaintiff in error is a banking institution, created by the laws of the state of Pennsylvania, without stockholders or capital stock, and doing the business of receiving deposits to be loaned or invested for the sole benefit of its depositors; that the charter authorizes the retention of a contingent fund, accumulated from the earnings, to the extent of ten per centum of its deposits, for the security of its depositors; that the bank has earned and added to the said contingent fund, or undistributed sum, from July 13, 1866, to Dec. 31, 1870, one hundred and seven thousand dollars; and that such earnings were carried to and added to said contingent or undistributed fund semi-annually, on the first days of January and July in each year.

Upon this state of facts, the first question presented is whether the act of Congress of July 13, 1866, which was an amendment to the internal revenue law, 14 Stat. 138, authorizes the levy and collection of a tax upon the accumulated earnings carried to the contingent fund. It is very plain that the first intent of the act was to impose a tax upon all the earnings, income or gains of the institutions mentioned therein. The language of its one hundred and twentieth section is, "there shall be levied and collected a tax of five per centum on all dividends in scrip or money thereafter declared due whenever and wherever the same shall be payable to stockholders, policy-holders, or depositors, or parties whatsoever, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, as part of the earnings, income or gains of any bank, trust company, savings institution, and of any fire, marine, life, or inland insurance company, either stock or mutual, under whatever name or style known or called in the United States or territories, whether specially incorporated or existing under general laws; and on all undistributed sum or sums made and added during the year to their surplus or contingent funds." This tax the banks, trust companies, savings institutions, and insurance companies are required to pay, and they are authorized to deduct it from all payments made on account of any dividends or sums of money that may be due and payable as aforesaid. It is, however, only so much of the tax as is levied upon dividends or sums of money due and payable to stockholders, policy-holders, or depositors, etc., which they are authorized to deduct. Thus it appears the tax is laid upon two subjects: the one dividends, or sums due and payable, and the other the undistributed surplus of gains and earnings carried to a surplus or contingent fund. These subjects, though together making up the entire net earnings, are distinct from each other; and they are thus treated throughout the section as well as throughout other sections of the act. If the portion of the act which we have quoted was all, it would not admit of a doubt that both these subjects—the dividends, or annual or semi-annual payments, and the sums added to the contingent fund—are made taxable.

It is argued, however, that savings institutions were relieved by the proviso to the section. That, of course, is to be construed in connection with the section of which it is a part, and it is substantially an exception. It takes out of the operation of the body of the enactment that which otherwise would be within it. It restrains the generality of the previous provisions. Its language is: "Provided, that the tax upon dividends of life insurance companies shall not be deemed due until such dividends are payable; nor shall the portion of premiums returned by mutual life insurance companies, nor the annual or semi-annual interest allowed or paid to the depositors in savings banks or savings institutions, be considered as dividends." But, so far as it relates to savings banks, the only subject of the proviso is the annual or semi-annual interest allowed or paid to the depositors. It makes no reference to the undistributed surplus which may be carried to a surplus fund. That it leaves as it was in the body of the section, subject to the tax therein imposed. And to us it appears quite plain that such was the intention of congress. Had it been the purpose to exempt savings banks from liability to pay the tax on both the interest paid to its depositors and on all undistributed sums carried to the surplus fund, the plain mode of expressing such a purpose was to say in the proviso that such banks should be excepted from the operation of the section. If such was the purpose, why except them expressly from the operation of a part of the section only? Why take out one subject of taxation specifically, and leave the other unmentioned? And still more. If, as the plaintiff in error contends, it was intended that savings banks should pay no tax on either of the two subjects mentioned in the body of the section, why were such banks mentioned in the section at all? The broad construction of the proviso contended for makes it plainly repugnant to the body of the act, and it is, therefore, inadmissible.

Our attention has been called to the fact that in 1867, and again in 1870, the commissioners of internal revenue construed the proviso as exempting savings institutions from the tax upon all sums added to their surplus or contingent funds, and that the act of congress of July 14, 1870, which reduced internal taxation, employed substantially the same language respecting savings banks as that contained in the act of 1866. In view of this the plaintiffs in error argue that congress required the commissioner to prescribe what returns savings banks should make; that this made it his duty to put a construction on the law; that he did so, and held that such institutions were not required to return undistributed earnings carried to a surplus fund, and that after this practical construction had been made and acted upon more than three years, congress re-enacted the tax, reduced in amount, in the same words. Hence, it is inferred, the construction given by the commissioner was adopted. It is doubtless a rule that when a judicial construction has been given to a statute, the re-enactment of the statute is generally held to be, in effect, a legislative adoption of that construction. This, however, can only be when the statute is capable of the construction given to it, and when that construction has become a settled rule of conduct. The rule, we think, is inapplicable to this case. In the first place, the decisions of the internal revenue commissioner can hardly be denominated judicial constructions. That officer was not required by the law to prescribe what returns savings banks were required to make. That was prescribed by the act of congress itself, and he had no power to dispense with the requisition. There is, therefore, no presumption that his decisions were brought to the knowledge of congress when the act of 1870 was passed. And again, the construction he gave is an impossible one, for, as we have seen, it makes the proviso plainly repugnant to the body of the section.

Digitized by Google

We are constrained, then, to hold that the act of congress does impose upon the plaintiffs in error the tax to recover which the present suit was brought.

The second error assigned is that the circuit court erred in holding that an action of debt is maintainable in that court for the recovery of taxes.

We do not perceive that the question presented by this assignment was raised or even mentioned in the court below, and it is not clear that it may first be raised here. But if it may, the answer must be that the taxes may be recovered in an action of debt brought in the circuit court.

The argument in support of the assignment of error is that the United States has no common law; that the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act enacts that the laws of the several states shall be the rules of decision in the trial of actions at common law, of which debt is one; that the act of congress which imposes the tax on savings banks, provides a special remedy for its assessment and collection, and that it is a principle of the common law of Pennsylvania, that when a statute creates a right and provides a particular remedy by which that right may be enforced, no other remedy than that afforded by the statute can be used.

It must be conceded that in the section of the act (act of 1866, sec. 120) which required savings banks to pay the tax, they are also required to render to the assessor or assistant assessor a list of the amount of taxes, with a declaration under oath attached thereto, on or before the tenth day of the month following that in which any dividends or sums of money may be due and payable, and for any default in rendering such a list they are liable to a penalty. The act also declares that "in case of any default in making or rendering said list or return, or any default in the payment of the tax as required, or any part thereof, the assessment and collection of the tax and penalty shall be in accordance with the general provisions of law in other cases of neglect and refusal." What those general provisions are may be seen in other sections of the act which prescribe assessments, delivery thereof to the collectors, and distraint if necessary.

It must also be conceded to be a rule of the common law in England, as it is in Pennsylvania and many of the other states, that where a statute creates a right and provides a particular remedy for its enforcement, the remedy is generally exclusive of all common-law remedies.

But it is important to notice upon what the rule is founded. The reason of the rule is that the statute, by providing a particular remedy, manifests an intention to prohibit other remedies, and the rule therefore rests upon a presumed statutory prohibition. It applies and is enforced when any one to whom the statute is a rule of conduct seeks redress for a civil wrong. He is confined to the remedy pointed out in the statute, for he is forbidden to make use of any other. But by the internal revenue law the United States are not prohibited from adopting any remedies for the recovery of a debt due to them which are known to the laws of Pennsylvania. The prohibitions, if any, either express or implied, contained in the enactment of 1866, are for others, not for the government. They may be obligatory upon tax-collectors. They may prevent any suit at law by such officers or agents. But they are not rules for the conduct of the state. It is a familiar principle that the king is not bound by any act of parliament unless he be named therein by special and particular words. The most general words that can be devised (for example, any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate) affect not him in the least, if they may tend to restrain or diminish any of his rights and interests. 11 Reps. 74; King v. Allen, 15 East, 333. He may even take the benefit of any particular act, though not named. 7 Reps. 32; Potter's Dwarris on Statutes, 151–2. The rule thus settled respecting the British crown is equally applicable to this government, and it has been applied frequently in the different states, and practically in the federal courts. It may be considered as settled that so much of the royal prerogative as belonged to the king in his capacity of parens patriæ, or universal trustee, enters as much into our political state as it does into the principles of the British constitution. Com. v. Baldwin, 1 Watts, 54; People v. Rossiter, 4 Cowan, 143; U. S. v. Davis, 3 McLean, 483; U. S. v. Williams, 5 McLean, 133; Com. v. Johnson, 6 Barr, 136; U. S. v. Green, 4 Mason, 427; U. S. v. Hoar, 2 Mason, 311; U. S. v. Hewes, Crabbe's Reps. 307.

It must, then, be concluded that the government is not prohibited by anything contained in the act of 1866 from employing any common-law remedy for the collection of its dues. The reason of the rule which denies to others the use of any other than the statutory remedy is wanting, therefore, in applicability to the government, and the rule itself must not be extended beyond its reason. And we do not find that either in England, or in Pennsylvania, it has been held to be applicable. On the contrary, in England, informations for debt, and exchequer informations for discovery and account, to recover duties on importations, have been of frequent occurrence, though the acts of parliament have provided a different remedy for enforcing the payment. Numerous such cases are reported in Bunbury's Reports, 155, 299, 300 and 339. See also Comyn Dig. Debt, A. 9; 1 Rolle, 383. And in United States v. Lyman, 1 Mason, 482, Judge STORY held that debt might be maintained in the circuit court for Massachusetts to recover duties upon imported goods, a doctrine reasserted by this court in Meredith v. The United States, 13 Peters, 486.

Nor is there anything in the objection that the taxes for which judgment has been recovered in this case had not been assessed. No other assessment than that made by the statute was necessary to determine the extent of the bank's liability. An assessment is only determining the value of the thing taxed, and the amount of the tax required of each individual. It may be made by designated officers, or by the law itself. In the present case the statute required every savings-bank to pay a tax of five per cent. on all undistributed earnings made or added during the year to their contingent funds. There was no occasion or room for any other assessment. This was a charge of a certain sum upon the bank [?] (Att'y Gen. v. ———, 2 Austruther, 553), and without more it made the bank a debtor. We think, therefore, the second assignment of error cannot be sustained.

Digitized by Google

The judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY, dissenting.—I dissent from the judgment of the court, on the ground that an action will not lie for a tax of the kind in question in this case, unless it be first entered on the assessment roll. The assessment roll should be regarded as conclusive as to the persons or things liable to taxation. If it is not—if the matter is left open so that any person or corporation may be prosecuted for taxes at any time—it leaves the citizen exposed to many hazards, and to the mercy of prying informers, when the evidence by which he could have shown his immunity or exemption has perished. If an action of debt without an assessment can be brought, what is the limit of time within which it must be brought? To what statute of limitations is the government subject? It seems to me that the decision introduces a new principle in the system of taxation, dangerous to the rights of the citizen and the peace and security of society.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice FIELD concurs in this dissent.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

NOTE.—On the question whether debt or assumpsit will lie in favor of the state or a municipal corporation to recover a tax when the statute provides another special mode of collection, and is silent as to the remedy by action, the American authorities are not entirely in accord.

In Maryland it is held that assumpsit will lie on the implied promise arising on the legal obligation to pay the tax (The Mayor, etc., of Baltimore v. Howard, 6 Har. & J. 383, 394), even though a special remedy is given by the statute, this being cumulative only. Dugan v. The Mayor, etc., 1 Gill. & J. 499, 502. See also Gordon's Ex'rs v. The Mayor, etc., 5 Gill. 231, 242; Clemens v. The Mayor, etc., 16 Md. 208. So in Illinois it has been held that debt will lie in favor of a county to recover a personal tax, though the tax act gave a summary remedy by distress and sale of personal property. Ryan, Assignee, v. Gallatin Co., 14 Ill. 78. TRUMBULL, J., says (p. 83): "The remedy by distress is not necessarily exclusive. It is a summary proceeding, and will ordinarily be resorted to out of choice by collectors; but there may be cases when it would be ineffectual, as in this instance, when there was no personal property to distrain. As has been already shown, a legal liability existed against the assignees to pay the taxes, and an action of debt is an appropriate remedy to enforce such a liability whenever the ordinary proceeding by distress would be ineffectual." To the same effect is the opinion of TREAT, C. J., in Dunlap v. Gallatin Co., 15 Ill. 9, a case which grew out of the preceding one.

The same rule, in substance, is held in California. The State v. Poulterer, 16 Cal. 514; City of Oakland v. Whipple, 39 Cal. 112.

See also Portland Dry Dock, etc., Co. v. Trustees of Portland, 12 B. Mon. 77, 80; Mayor, etc., of Jonesboro v. McKee, 2 Yerg. 167; City of New Orleans v. Graihle, 9 La. An. 561, in which cases it does not appear what special remedy, if any, was given by the statute.

To these should be added the principal case, above reported.

On the other hand, in City of Camden v. Allen, 2 Dutch. (N. J.) 398, it was directly held that an incorporated city could not maintain an action of debt for a tax assessed under its charter when the charter gave a summary remedy for non-payment by distress and sale of property and arrest of the person. The doctrine of the court appears to be, in substance, that a tax is not a debt for which an action will lie at common law, and that the statutory remedy is exclusive. This is the only express decision to that effect which has come under our notice, but in other cases there are dicta which more or less support it. Thus in Shaw v. Peckett, 26 Vt. 482, it was held that a tax does not carry interest unless given by the tax act; and it was further said (p. 486), "The assessment of taxes does not create a debt that can be enforced by suit, or upon which a promise to pay interest can be implied. It is a proceeding purely in invitum."

In Peirce v. City of Boston, 3 Met. 520, it was held that a tax was not the subject of set-off, under a statute limiting the right of set-off to demands founded in judgment or contract, express or implied. In the opinion it is said that for the collection of taxes "no right of action is given, with a few special exceptions, growing out of death of the parties," etc. And in Crapo v. Stetson, 8 Met. 393, holding that a tax collector cannot maintain an action in his own name to collect the tax, the opinion further states that "It is well settled that the law gives no remedy for the collection of taxes other than those provided by statute." And there is a similar dictum by PARSONS, C. J., in Andover, etc., Turnpike Co. v. Gould, 6 Mass. 40—a case relating to the right of a private corporation to maintain assumpsit against a shareholder for an assessment on his subscription for shares. In Packard v. Tisdale, 50 Me. 376, the same point was decided as in Crapo v. Stetson.

To sustain a personal action for a tax, of course there must be a personal obligation on the defendant to pay. Many taxes and assessments impose no such liability, but merely operate as liens or charges on the specific property assessed. In such case the remedy is against such property only. If an assessment is made a lien on the property, and no special mode of enforcing it is provided, a suit in equity may be maintained for that purpose. McInerny v. Reed, 23 Iowa, 410; Merriam v. Moody, 25 Iowa, 163.

As to when a tax will create a personal liability or charge upon the tax-payer, see United States v. Lyman, 1 Mason, 482; Meredith v. United States, 13 Pet. 486, 493; People v. Seymour, 16 Cal. 332, 342-4; Litchfield v. Vernon, 41 N. Y., 123, 135; Litchfield v. McComber, 42 Barb. 288, in which it is said (p. 295), "The personal obligation of the owner to pay is to be inferred from the authority to levy the tax by distress and sale of his goods and chattels, which is found in all or nearly all the assessment laws." J. N. R.

Railway-Aid Bonds — Charter Privilege of Receiving Subscriptions without a Vote of the People.

THOMAS J. FOSTER v. CALLAWAY COUNTY.

United States Circuit Court, Western District of Missouri, April Term, 1874.

Before DILLON and KREKEL, JJ.

1 Railway-Aid Bonds—Charter Privilege of Receiving Subscriptions not Repealable.—The power conferred upon counties along the route of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company by the charter of that company of March 10, 1859, to subscribe for its stock without a vote of the people, was not taken away, as respects Callaway county, by the amendatory act of March 24, 1868.

2. ——. Questions Discussed.—The provisions of the state constitution as to aid to railways, amendatory acts and titles to acts discussed.

This is an action upon coupons attached to bonds issued by the defendant to the Louisiana and Missouri River R. R. Co. or bearer, dated January 1, 1869.

The answer denies the authority of the County Court of Callaway county to issue the bonds, and this denial rests upon the grounds mentioned in the opinion of the court. The cause was submitted to the court upon the pleadings, an agreed statement of facts, and the record of the County Court of Callaway County in relation to the issue of the bonds. The plaintiff is admitted to be the owner of the bonds for value.

The defendant insists that the bonds were issued to the south branch of the Louisiana and Missouri River R. R. Co. under the act of the 24th of March, 1868, and not under the act of March 10, 1859, both of which are referred to in the opinion of the court; and the defendant further insists, as there was no vote of the people as required by the constitution of 1865, and as no part of what is claimed to be the "main line" of the road is within the county of Callaway, that the bonds were issued without authority of law, and are void.

It is admitted that the county has paid interest on the bonds for 1870 and 1871, and has also paid a small part of the principal.

It is also admitted that no vote of the people of the county was had authorizing the subscriptions by the county court.

The bonds were made payable to the Louisiana and Missouri River R. R. Co., or bearer, and contain the following recital:

"This bond is issued by Callaway county by authority of an act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri, approved March 10th, 1869, as amended by an act approved March 24th, 1868."

The other facts appear in the opinion.

J. D. Stevenson and Ewing & Smith, for plaintiff; O. Guitar, T. C. Reynolds, Lay & Belch, Jeff. Jones, Boulware & Flood, for the county.

PER CURIAM.

(DILLON and KREKEL, JJ., concurring.)

On the 10th day of March, 1859, the general assembly of the state of Missouri passed an act authorizing the organization of a railroad company under the name of the Louisiana and Missouri River R. R. Co., with a capital stock of three millions of dollars, and granting it power to "mark out, locate and construct a railroad from the city of Louisiana, in the county of Pike, by the way of Bowling Green in said county, to some suitable point on the North Missouri R. R., intersecting said road between the southern limits of the town of Wellsville in Montgomery county and the northern limits of the town of Mexico in Audrain county, thence to the Missouri river, at the most eligible point on the line the most suitable and advantageous as regards distance, grade, cost of road and permanent value of same."

Digitized by Google

In this act of incorporation power was given "The the county court of any county in which any part of the route of said railroad may be, to subscribe to the stock of said company, and to invest its funds in the stock of said company, and issue the bonds of such county to raise funds to pay the stock thus subscribed, and to take proper steps to protect the interests and credit of the county." No popular vote was required as a condition to the exercise of this power by the county courts. Before any subscription by Callaway county to the stock of the company, a number of the surveys of the route of the road had, according to the agreed statement of facts, been made, some of them running through Callaway county and others through Boone and Howard, and not touching any part of Callaway county. On the 16th day of January, 1868, the county court of Callaway county appointed Thomas B. Harris "commissioner and agent of the county of Callaway to take stock in and subscribe to the capital stock of the Louisiana and Missouri River R. R. Co. the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, being 5,000 shares of one hundred dollars each of said capital stock, said subscription to be paid by the issue of county bonds, * * as may be required by said company during the progress of the construction of said railroad from some point west or southwest of the North Missouri R. R., on either the Wellsville or Jefftown routes, as surveyed through said county through the city of Fulton [in said county], and by way of New Bloomfield [in said county] as near as practicable to the Missouri river." This subscription of $500,000 by the commissioner thus appointed by the county was made by him on the books of the company on the same day (January 16, 1868), as appears by a recital on the records of the county. Three smaller subscriptions were afterwards made by the order of the county court to the stock of the Louisiana and Missouri River R. R. Co. The Louisiana and Missouri River R. R. Co., it is agreed, subsequently to the said 16th day of January, 1868, "located and built the road now operated, running from Louisiana in Pike county to Mexico in Audrain county, and located and graded throughout and partially completed the road running from Mexico to Glasgow (in Howard county) on the Missouri river, and completed the road now running and operated from Mexico in Audrain county by way of Fulton in Callaway county, through Callaway county to a point therein on the Missouri river opposite Jefferson City."

The constitution of the state of Missouri in force at the time of the passage of the act of incorporation of the Louisiana and Missouri River R. R., on the 10th day of March, 1859, contained no provision restraining the legislature from authorizing subscriptions to railroads in any manner it saw fit, but the present constitution, which went into effect on the 4th day of July, 1865, contains this provision: "The general assembly shall not authorize any county, city or town to become a stockholder in or to loan its credit to any company, association or corporation, unless two-thirds of the qualified voters of such county, city or town, at a regular or special election to be held therein, shall consent thereto."

In reference to laws in force at the time of the going into effect of the present constitution of the state, it has this provision: "All statute laws of the state now in force, not inconsistent with the constitution, shall continue in force until they shall expire by their own limitations, or be amended or repealed by the general assembly."

In reference to the subject and title of laws, the present constitution has this provision: "No law enacted by the general assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title; but if any subject embraced in an act be not expressed in the title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as is not so expressed."

A further provision of the constitution is, "No act shall be revised or re-enacted by mere reference to the title thereof, nor shall any act be amended by providing that designated words thereof shall be struck out and others inserted in lieu thereof; but in every such case, the act revised or re-enacted, or the act or part of amended, shall be set forth and published at length as if it were an original act."

With these constitutional provisions in force, the legislature, on the 24th day of March, 1868 (laws 1868, p. 97), which was after the subscription of $500,000 by the defendant, undertook to amend the original act of incorporation of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Co., by increasing its capital stock, fixing the terminus of the road, authorizing the location and construction of a branch road, and granting power to carry into effect the provisions of the act. It may be proper, although not strictly necessary, to notice here one question discussed by counsel and by the state supreme court in the Saline county case (State v. Saline Co. Court, 51 Mo. 350), as to whether the act of March 24th, 1868, is an amendatory act; and as to this point it seems to us only necessary to state that the amendment of 1868, aside from the title, repeats nearly the whole of the original charter, verbatim, embodying in it new provisions only, thus literally complying with the constitutional provision cited, requiring an amendment to be "set forth and published at length as if it were an original act."

Looking thus at the amendatory act, it can not, as we think, be held that the legislature undertook thereby to create by special act a new corporation, which, under the constitution (art. 8, sec. 4), it was prohibited from doing.

As to the constitutional provision requiring that an act shall not relate to more than one subject and that expressed, in its title, our opinion is that the mischief sought to be provided against was the passing of acts having no title at all, a false title, or mixing up matters incongruous and having no relation to each other. The whole of the amendatory act embraces but one subject when viewed with reference to the matter in hand, viz.: the building of a railroad, and this is sufficiently expressed in the title. With the question of the validity of the amendatory act, so far as it relates to counties south of the Missouri river, we have no concern and pass no opinion, having to deal here with Callaway county, on the north side of the river, and in which a part of the Louisiana and Missouri River R. R. might, by the original charter of March 10, 1859, be located and built.

The question as to whether the legislature in 1868 had authority to amend the charter of 1859 would seem to be settled by the constitutional provision above cited in respect to amending statute laws as expounded by the Supreme Court of Missouri in the case of The Cape Girardeau and State Line R. R. Company (48 Mo. 468) and the late case of The State ex rel. etc., v. Greene County. [Not yet published.] But we do not mean to be understood as holding that the power of amendment of charters would exist to the extent of conferring by way of amendment powers prohibited by the express provisions of the constitution of 1865.

Callaway county is undoubtedly on the line of the railroad as contemplated in the original charter, and hence the county court had the right to subscribe, provided any part of the road was within it. At the time of the county's subscribing the $500,000 stock under the original charter and prior to its amendment, some of the lines of the route of the railroad had, in fact, been run through Callaway county, as admitted by the agreed statement of facts.

Digitized by Google

The order of subscription speaks of paying out the bonds as the work of construction progresses through the county.

The Supreme Court of Missouri has so repeatedly decided, under provisions such as those contained in the charter of the Louisana and Missouri River R. R., that the county courts had the right, unaffected by the constitution of 1865, to subscribe without submitting the question to the people, that it is not necessary to dwell upon the point, or do more than refer to the late case of Smith and Hall v. Clark County [1 Cent. Law Jour. 5; S. C. 54 Mo. —], in which the former decisions are cited and affirmed; and to the still more recent case of The State ex rel. etc., v. Greene County.

Another question discussed by counsel relates to the effect of the recital in the bonds, which were made payable to the "Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company" or bearer, that the same were issued in conformity to the act of the 10th day of March, 1859, and the amendatory act of March 24th, 1868. Under our view, the amendatory act did not create a new corporation, and we are inclined to think that it did not take away the power of the county court to subscribe for the stock as conferred in the original charter of the company, and that it should not be held to do so as respects the bona fide holder of bonds which purported on their face to be issued under the authority of the charter. And this view finds a very strong support in the decisions of the supreme court of the state affirming the power of the counties along both the main line and branches, to subscribe for the stock under the provisions of charters antedating the present constitution, in the Macon, Sullivan and Greene county cases.

As to the amendatory act calling the road running through Callaway county the "South Branch," after the main subscription had been made to the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad to aid in building a road surveyed and afterwards built through Callaway county, this cannot affect the bona fide holders of the bonds.

From the evidence and the original charter of 1859, it would appear as though the road, as now built through Callaway county, was the main line, or, at least, as much the main line as the line farther west, which does not touch Callaway county. The limitation in the charter of 1859 of the capital stock to three millions, scarcely sufficient to build a road of a hundred miles, the direction of the road from Louisiana by way of Bowling Green, crossing the North Missouri R. R. west of Wellsville and east of Mexico, thus narrowing down as it were the objective points, all indicate that the nearest place on the Missouri river was in the minds of the originators of the road, as well as of the legislature when it passed the charter.

We have adverted to the nature and effects of the amendatory act because these subjects have been largely discussed by counsel, and not because they are absolutely necessary to reach a conclusion in the present case.

We place our judgment on this ground: The plaintiff is a bona fide holder of the bonds issued by the county. These bonds recite that they are issued by virtue of the power conferred upon the county by the original charter of the company of March 10, 1859, as amended by the act of March 24th, 1868. The act of March 10, thus recited, did give the power, and that power is not taken away by the amendatory act of 1868, but according to the decisions of the supreme court of the state, above mentioned, remains unaffected by the provisions of the constitution of 1865, requiring a popular sanction to such subscriptions. All of the subscriptions were made to the "Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company," the original corporation, and not to the branch mentioned in the amendatory act.

As there was legislative power in the county to make the subscription and to issue the bonds, and as the county court has exercised this power and issued the bonds which have found their way into the hands of the plaintiff, a bona fide holder for value, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States conclude the county from making the defence here attempted, and this whether the amendatory act be or be not void, and whether the county was or was not authorized to transfer the subscription to what is called the South Branch, or to apply the money raised by the sale of the bonds to the building of that branch.

It may further be remarked that the record of the county court shows that the proceeds of the bonds issued by the county were applied to the building of a road substantially along the line to which the subscription was made on the 16th day of January, 1868; that the work progressed thereby and the bonds issued from time to time; that the minor changes in the line of the road were assented to by the county court; that the road passes through the entire body of the county, and is in full operation, and that the two years' interest and part of the principal of the bonds had been paid. Under these circumstances it seems to us that no one, familiar with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the general question, and of the Supreme Court of Missouri to the effect that the power of the county court to subscribe without a vote of the people survived, unaffected by the constitution of 1865, can reasonably anticipate any but one result.

The case, in the aspect in which it is viewed by the defendant's counsel, presents some new questions, and it is certainly one of great moment to the county, as it involves in its consequences a liability of over half a million of dollars.

We are relieved of much of the weight of responsibility we would feel by the consideration that our judgment is not final, and that the record can so easily be put in a shape to present the merits of the case for the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. In our opinion the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

JUDGMENT ACCORDINGLY.

NOTE.—In the case of San Antonio v. Gould, 34 Tex. 49, it was held that the charter of a railroad company, which contained a provision that the city of San Antonio might subscribe to the capital stock of the road, and issue its bonds in payment of the same, was obnoxious to that provision of the Texas constitution (art. 7, § 24) which provided that "every law enacted by the legislature shall embrace but one object, and that shall be expressed in the title." But this ruling is in direct conflict with San Antonio, v. Lane, 32 Texas, 405 — a suit upon the same securities — where the reverse was held in a well-considered opinion. And in order to reach the result arrived at, it was necessary to overrule not only San Antonio v. Lane, but also the still earlier case of San Antonio v. Jones, 28 Tex. 19, where the same securities were likewise sustained.

How far State Decisions are Binding upon the Federal Tribunals — The "Married Woman's Law" of Alabama.

NANNIE C. MITCHELL v. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

Circuit Court of the United States, Southern District o Alabama. In Equity, April 27, 1874.

1. State Decisions, how far Binding on the Federal Courts. — Where it became necessary for the federal court to determine whether a married woman had power, under the "married woman's law" of Alabama, to mortgage her separate estate to secure her husband's debts, it was held that the court would follow the present interpretation of that law by the Supreme Court of Alabama, and not a previous interpretation, the two being in conflict with each other.

2. ——. The adjudications of a state court construing the statutes of the state regulating the rights of married women and the validity of mortgages executed by them upon their real estate fall within that class of cases where the federal courts are bound to follow the state decisions.

3. —— The question in what cases the federal courts are under obligation to follow the decisions of state tribunals considered at length and the authorities collated.

Under the Married Woman's Law of Alabama (code of Alabama, §§ 2371, et seq.), a married woman has no power to mortgage her separate estate to secure a debt of her husband, and such a mortgage is void.

This cause was submitted for final decree upon the pleadings and an agreed statement of facts.

Digitized by Google

A. R. Manning and Percy Walker, for the complainant; T. N. Macartney and M. E. Macartney, for the defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge.—On the 19th of March, 1866, there was conveyed to the complainant, who was a feme covert, by deed of that date, certain real estate in the city of Mobile. The deed, in the granting clause, purported to convey the premises to the said Nannie C. Mitchell, her heirs and assigns forever. The habendum and tenendum clause is as follows: "To have and to hold the above granted and bargained premises unto the said Nannie C. Mitchell, her heirs and assigns, to the sole and proper use, benefit and behoof of the said Nannie C. Mitchell, her heirs and assigns forever."

On the 17th of February, 1869, the complainant, jointly with her husband, executed a mortgage on this property to the defendants. The mortgage was not to secure any debt of the complainant, but was, in part, to secure one for which her husband expected to become liable.

The mortgage contained a power of sale, and the debt secured thereby not having been paid in full, the defendants advertised the premises for sale.

This bill was filed for a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendants from selling the property under the mortgage.

The claim of the bill is that the premises were the separate property of the complainant as a married woman, and that under the laws and jurisprudence of this state she could not encumber her separate estate for her husband's debts, and that her mortgage for that purpose is absolutely void.

The "married woman's law," as it is called, was passed in 1850, and is found in the Revised Code, § 2,371, et seq. Section 2,371 declares that "all property of the wife, held by her previous to the marriage, or which she may become entitled to after the marriage in any manner, is the separate estate of the wife, and is not subject to the payment of the debts of the husband."

The complainant claims that under this provision of the law, as now construed by the supreme court of the state, the mortgage upon her said property was absolutely void, for want of power in her to encumber it for the debt of her husband.

The defendants claim that under the decision of the supreme court of the state, construing the "married woman's law," the estate a feme covert might acquire, as at common law, was not interfered with by this act. So that after the passage of this act a married woman in this state might hold two kinds of separate estate, each governed by different laws. One was called her separate estate under contract or deed, and the other her separate estate under statute, or statutory separate estate. That the distinction was that if she held by a deed which used words of such significance as to exclude the marital rights of the husband, the deed itself gave her a separate estate, and the rules of the common law governing such an estate applied; but if the conveyance under which she held used no such words, or the estate came to her by descent, then she held it as separate estate under the code, and the rules of law governing such an estate were laid down by the code. That when the estate was a separate estate by deed or contract, the wife might, as at common law, encumber it by mortgage properly executed for her husband's debts.

The defendants claim that this construction of the law was maintained by the supreme court of the state until after the execution of the mortgage to them by complainant; that, under the law as so construed, her estate was a separate estate by deed, and that she might well encumber it for her husband's debts. They cite Cowles v. Morgan, 34 Ala. 535; Paulk v. Wolfe, 34 Ala. 541; Gunter v. Williams, 40 Ala. 561; Nunn's ad'r v. Givhan, 45 Ala. 375.

It is, however, conceded by the defendants that since the date of this mortgage the supreme court of the state has adopted a different construction of sec. 2,371 of the Revised Code, and that they now hold that there is no distinction between the two sorts of separate estates; that both are governed by the code, and that in no case can a married woman mortgage her separate estate, however acquired or held, for her husband's debts.

But the defendants insist that this court is not bound to follow these later adjudications, but should adhere to the law as construed by the court at the time the contract was made.

In my judgment this claim of the defendants is not well founded.

The mortgage to the defendants, as above stated, bears date the 19th of February, 1869. In January, 1869, the supreme court of the state decided the case of Bibb v. Pope, reported in 43 Ala. 190. In this case it appeared that on August 10, 1860, there was conveyed to Mrs. Evelyn Pope, who was then intermarried with Augustus Pope, the premises in controversy, "to have and to hold the same to her, her heirs and assigns, to her use and behoof forever." On the 6th of April, 1866, Pope, the husband, borrowed 10,000 of the plaintiff Bibb, for which he gave his bill of exchange, and he and his wife executed to Bibb a mortgage, with power of sale on the said premises, to secure the payment of the same.

Pope failed to pay the bill at maturity, and Bibb advertised the property for sale. Thereupon Mrs. Pope, by her next friend, filed her bill for a perpetual injunction to enjoin the sale, claiming that the mortgage was void.

I have been thus particular in the statement of this case, that it may appear how nearly it resembles in its facts the case at bar.

In deciding the case the court said:

"The only question discussed at the bar was whether Mrs. Pope was bound by said mortgage, and whether her statutory separate estate was liable to be sold under it to pay her husband's debts. This question has not heretofore been settled by any decision of this court."

The court then decides that if the sale of the separate estate of the wife to pay the husband's debts was permitted, the whole purpose of the law, so far as it protects the wife's separate estate, would be defeated, and that the wife had no power to mortgage her separate estate for her husband's debts.

Conceding that the decisions of the supreme court of the state had been, as claimed by defendants, up to the case of Bibb v. Pope, it is clear that the rule was broken over by this case and a different one adopted. And this decision was made before the date of the mortgage.

The ruling in this case has since been adhered to by the court. Cowles v. Marks, 47 Ala. 620; Ellett v. Wade, 47 Ala. 464; Denechaud v. Berry (not yet reported).

But suppose, as claimed by the defendants, the rulings had been as stated by them until after the delivery of the mortgage to them, and the construction of the law had then been changed, which construction ought this court to follow?

The defendants say that we are bound to enforce the law according to the construction given it at the date of the mortgage.

In support of this position they cite the case of Gelpke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 206, in which the Supreme Court of the United States says: "The sound and true rule is that if the contract when made was valid by the laws of the state, as then expounded by all departments of the government and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent action of the legislature or decision of its courts altering the construction of the law.." Also Havemeyer v. Iowa City, 3 Wall. 303; Olcott v. Supervisors, 16 Wall. 678; Insurance Company v. Debolt, 16 Howard, 432.

It is to be observed that the case in 16th Howard was the case of a contract made by the state, and the court held that the rule of interpretation which required the federal to follow the state courts in the construction of the laws of the state "were confined to ordinary acts of legislation, and did not extend to the contracts of the state, although they should be made in the form of law."

The cases in 3 and 16 Wallace concerned the interpretation of laws upon which depended the validity of bonds issued by municipal and political corporations.

Digitized by Google

On the other hand, in the case of Suydam v. Williamson, 24 Howard, 427, the Supreme Court of the United States held that when any principle of law establishing a rule of real property has been settled in the state courts, the same rule will be applied by the supreme court that would be applied by the state tribunals.

In this case the supreme court, following a change in the decisions of the Supreme Court of New York, reversed its own decision in Williamson v. Berry and Howard, "although property had been bought and sold upon the faith of the opinion there delivered and the judgment pronounced by this court."

So in the earlier case of Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheaton, 162, the court said: "The enquiry is very much narrowed by applying the rule which has uniformly governed this court, that when any principle of law establishing a rule of real property has been settled in the state courts, the same rule will be applied by this court as by the state tribunals."

So also in Beauregard v. New Orleans, 18 Howard, 497, the court says: "The constitution of this court requires it to follow the laws of the several states whenever they properly apply, and the habit, of the court has been to defer to the decisions of their judicial tribunals upon questions arising out of the common law of the state, especially when applied to the title to lands. Upon cases like the present, the relation of courts of the United States to a state is the same as that of her own tribunals. They administer the laws of the state, and to fulfill that duty they must find them as they exist in the habits of the people and in their exposition of their constituted authorities. Without this, the peculiar organization of the judicial tribunals of the states and the Union would be productive of the greatest mischief and confusion."

In League v. Egery, 24 Howard, 264, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed its own decision made in Arquello v. United States, 18 Howard, 539, to the effect that the colonization regulations of Mexico of 1824 and 1828 did not prohibit the settlement of the littoral or coast leagues by natives under the authority of the governor of California, and without the consent of the central government of Mexico. This was done without re examining that opinion, or making any attempt to account for or reconcile the differences, because the supreme court had found that a contrary opinion had prevailed in the courts of Texas, and had become a rule of property there.

That the decisions of the state courts touching the title to lands are to be treated as binding authorities in the courts of the United States, is held in the following cases: Polk v. Wendell, 9 Cranch, 87; Rundle v. Canal Co., 14 Howard, 93; Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat. 119; Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. 152; Ross v. Borland, 1 Peters, 655; The Society v. Wheeler, 2 Gall. 128; McKeen v. Delancy, 5 Cranch, 22.

The settled construction of a state statute is considered as a part of the statute. Massingill v. Downs, 7 How. 767; Nesmith v. Sheldon, 7 How. 812; Van Rensalear v. Kearney, 11 How. 297; Webster v. Cooper, 14 How. 504; Greene v. James, 2 Curt. C. C 189; Woolsey v. Dood, 6 McLean, 180; Thompson v. Phillips. Baldwin, 246.

In construing the statutes of a state infinite mischief would ensue should the federal courts observe a different rule from that which has been long established in a state. McKeen v. Delancy, supra.

In cases depending upon the statutes of a state, and more especially those respecting the titles to land, the federal courts observe the construction of the state when that construction is settled or can be ascertained. Polk v. Wendell, supra.

The supreme court uniformly acts under a desire to conform its decisions to the state courts upon local laws forming rules of property. Society v. Watts, supra.

The supreme court holds in the highest respect the decisions of state courts upon local laws forming rules of property. Shipp v. Miller, 2 Wheat. 316.

When the construction of the statute of the state relates to real property, and has been settled by any judicial decision of the state where the land lies, the supreme court, upon the principles uniformly adopted by it, will recognize the decision as a part of the local law. Gardner v. Collins, 2 Pet. 58.

In construing local statutes respecting real property the courts of the Union are governed by the decisions of state tribunals. Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat. 119.

The question whether a mortgage of real estate is valid or not, is certainly a question touching real property. The case at bar, therefore, falls within the decision cited. This rule, established by the earlier decisions of the supreme court, is recognized in the case of Olcott v. The Supervisors, 16 Wall. 678, cited by the defendants, in which Mr. Justice STRONG, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is undoubtedly true, in general, that this court does follow the decisions of the highest courts of the states respecting local questions peculiar to themselves, or respecting the construction of their own constitution and laws. But it must be kept in mind that it is only decisions upon local questions, those which are peculiar to the several states, or adjudications upon the meaning of the constitution or statutes of a state which the federal courts adopt as rules for their judgments."

Do not the adjudications of the Supreme Court of Alabama construing the statutes of the state regulating the rights of married women, and the validity of mortgages executed by them upon their real estate, fall within the class of cases mentioned by Judge STRONG, where the federal courts are bound to follow the state decisions? If the rule is ever to be applied to any case, it seems to me the construction of the "married woman's law" is a proper case for its application.

The conclusion must therefore be that the mortgage of the complainant was void, and the defendants ought to be restrained from proceeding under it to subject the mortgage to sale under it.

INJUNCTION MADE PERPETUAL.

The Certainty Required in Assessing Real Property for Taxation—Injunction to Restrain Collection of Illegal Tax—Cloud upon Title.

CHARLES E. TILTON v. THE OREGON CENTRAL MILITARY ROAD CO. AND T. T. McKENZIE.

United States Circuit Court, District of Oregon, April 25, 1874.

1. Assessment of Real Property—Certainty Required.—An assessment of real property should substantially comply with the requirements of the statute (Or. Code, 893) which requires each tract or parcel of land to be designated according to the U. S. surveys, if it be a subdivision of the same, or otherwise by specific metes and bounds or other certain description. Therefore an assessment to the O. C. M R. Co. of 196,008 99-100 of acres of land in Jackson county, in gross, without any other designation or description of the same, is void from uncertainty.

2 ——. ——. Example of an Assessment Void for Uncertainty.—An assessment of real property which contains no valuation of the same except this: "Total value of taxable property, 245,011," there being no mark or sign to indicate whether such figures were intended to represent eagles, dollars, cents or mills, or other thing capable of being numbered, is void from uncertainty.

3. Cloud Upon Title—Injunction against Illegal Tax.—A court of equity will restrain the collection of an illegal tax upon real property where the enforcement of the same will result in a cloud being cast upon the title thereof.

4 ——. Tax Deed.—Under the laws of Oregon (Sess. Laws 1865, p. 10), a tax deed is primary evidence of title and the regularity of the prior proceedings, which evidence can only be overcome by the proof of certain facts dehors the deed—therefore the same casts a cloud upon the title of the property.

Cyrus Dolph and E C. Bronaugh, for complainant.

DEADY, J.—This is a motion for a provisional injunction. It was argued and submitted on April 18, 1874, upon the bill—no one appearing for the defendants.

It appears from the bill that the complainant is a citizen of New York; that the defendant, the O. C. M. R. Co., is a corporation formed under the laws of Oregon, with a capital stock of $100,000 divided into 400 shares of $250 each, and the defendant, McKenzie, is the sheriff of Jackson county, Oregon; that the O. C. M. R. Co. is the owner in fee of a large number of acres of land in said county, in 300 and odd distinct parcels, particularly described by township, section and range, and the plaintiff is the owner of thirty-one shares of the capital stock of said company; that said company is assessed upon the assessment roll of Jackson county for 1873, as the owner of 196,008 99 100 acres of land in said county, in gross, without any other designation or description thereof, and without any valuation of the same other than this—"Total value of taxable property 245,011;" that the taxes levied upon the lands so assessed to said county by the proper authorities of said county amount to $4.410.20, and the same will be collected by the defendant, McKenzie, by the sale of said lands, or so much thereof as may be necessary for that purpose, and a cloud be thereby cast upon the title of said company unless restrained by the order of this court; and that said assessment is illegal and void for want of certainty in the description and valuation of said lands.

Digitized by Google

That this assessment is illegal and void there is no room for doubt. The law prescribes that the assessor, in making an assessment of real property, shall set down in the assessment roll in separate columns the following:

1. A description of each tract or parcel of land to be taxed, specifying, under separate heads, the township, range and section in which the land lies; or, if divided into lots and blocks, then the number of the lot and block.

2. The number of acres and parts of an acre, as near as the same can be ascertained, unless the land be divided into blocks and lots.

3. The full cash value of each parcel of land taxed.

4. In case the land be other than a subdivision of the United States survey, or lots and blocks, it must be described by specific metes and bounds, or otherwise, so as to make the description certain. Or. Code, p. 898.

In the case under consideration the assessment roll contains no description of the land whatever, except that there is in all 196,008 99-100 acres, situate somewhere in Jackson county. Neither the township, range or section, or the metes and bounds of the tract, or any parcel or portion of it is given.

Neither is there any cash value given in this roll of the whole or any portion of this land.

It should have contained a valuation of each parcel and of the whole. The figures "245,011" entered in the column headed "Total valuation of taxable property," do not indicate any value. They are mere numerals signifying an abstract number.

In Hurlbutt v. Butenop, 27 Cal. 54, and People v. Savings Union, 31 Cal. 135, it was held that an assessment was void for want of a valuation of the property where the figures in the valuation column were entered without any mark or sign to indicate whether they were intended to represent eagles, dollars, cents, or mills. Say the court in the latter case: "In the assessment roll, in the column headed 'valuation,' there is nothing whatever to indicate what the figures are intended to represent, and, under the authorities cited, we are not authorized to say they mean dollars. They are simply numerals—'barren figures'—that are as often employed to indicate anything else that may be numbered, as dollars, or, if money is indicated, the denominations may be either eagles, dollars, cents or mills."

But this assessment is clearly void on account of the omission to describe the lands, and each separate parcel thereof, by legal subdivisions according to the United States survey, or by specific metes and bounds, or in such other manner as to make the description certain, as required by law.

The question has not been passed on by the supreme court of the state, but in Kelesy v. Abbott, 13 Cal. 616, an assessment was held void because the statute was not substantially complied with in the matter of the description of the property. This case has been followed by Lachman v. Clark, 14 Cal. 133; Moss v. Shear, 25 Cal. 44; People v. Sneath et al., 28 Cal. 615; Smith v. Davis, 30 Cal. 537; People v. Savings Union, 31 Cal. 135; and Taylor v. Donner, ib. 481.

The ruling in these cases was recently followed in Huntington v. The Central Pacific R. R. Co. et al., in the U. S. C. C., Dis. of Cal. (see Pacific L. R., vol. 7, No. 4), where an assessment of the defendant's railway in several counties of the state was held void and the collection of the tax thereon restrained, because the same was "not made in accordance with the provisions of the statute" in the matter of the description of the land or lands upon which the ties or rails were laid.

But although the assessment is illegal and void, that fact alone is not sufficient to authorize the interference of a court of equity to restrain the collection of the tax.

It must appear that the enforcement of the tax would lead to a multiplicity of suits or produce irreparable injury, or, where the property is real estate, throw a cloud upon the title of the complainant, before the aid of a court of equity can be invoked. Dows v. City of Chicago, 11 Wall. 110; Ewing v. St. Louis, 5 Wall. 418; Hannewinkle v. Georgetown, 15 Wall. 548; Coulson v. Portland, 1 Deady, 487; Movers v. Smedley, 6 John. Ch. 30.

According to the allegations of the bill and the course of proceedings prescribed by the law of this state, the defendant, McKenzie, if not restrained, will proceed to levy upon and sell the lands of the O. C. M. R. Co., or sufficient thereof to pay this tax and the costs of the proceedings, and in due time thereafter will make and deliver a deed therefor to the purchaser, which upon its face will pass the title and carry wtih it the presumption that all the proceedings preliminary thereto were done and had in accordance with law, which presumption can only be overcome by proof of either:

"1. Fraud in the assessment or collection of the tax;

"2. Payment of the tax before sale or redemption after sale;

"3. That the property was sold for taxes for which the owner of the property at the time of the sale was not liable, and that no part of the tax was levied or assessed upon the property sold." Sess. Laws, 1865, p. 10.

The deed must contain a description of the property sold, but of the preliminary proceedings it need only state the amount bid; the year in which the tax was levied; that it was unpaid at the time of sale, and that two years had since elapsed and no redemption had.

The description required to be inserted in the deed is of the property sold; and although the description on the assessment roll may be so insufficient as to render the assessment void, it does not follow that that fact will appear in the deed. The collector may levy upon any one or more of the 300 and odd distinct parcels of real property belonging to the O. C. M. R. Co., in Jackson county, and sell and convey the same by proper and sufficient description on account of the non-payment of this tax. A warrant for the collection of delinquent taxes is to be deemed an execution against property, and executed as such. Or. Code, 909.

It is not clear that the legal effect of such a deed could be avoided, unless it was held that the tax for which the land was sold was not "levied or assessed" thereon, because of the insufficiency of the description and valuation in the assessment roll. The assessment could not be held fraudulent because simply insufficient or erroneous. A mistake or omission is not necessarily a fraud.

But, however this may be, this deed would a least cast a cloud upon the title. As was said by the court in Huntington v. The Central Pacific R. R. Co. et al., supra, "It would only be necessary for the plaintiff to produce his deed to show title. It would then devolve upon the defendant to show affirmatively, by evidence dehors the deed, such fatal defects in the assessment as it is admissible to show under the provisions cited, the deed itself being conclusive as to other particulars; and this brings it within the test by which the question is determined whether a deed would be a cloud upon a title established in this state by the decisions of the supreme court."

Digitized by Google

In Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 133, the rule by which to determine whether a deed would cast a cloud upon the title or not, was stated as follows: "Would the owner of the property in an action of ejectment brought by the adverse party, founded on the deed, be required to offer evidence to defeat the recovery? If such proof would be necessary, the cloud would exist; if no proof would be necessary, no shade would be cast by the presence of the deed."

It appearing, then, that the assessment and tax are invalid, and that if the collection of the tax is enforced, it will necessarily result in a deed being made to the property or some portion of it, which will cast a cloud upon the title thereof, the complainant is entitled to an injunction.

Let a writ of injunction issue according to the prayer of the bill until the further order of this court.

INJUNCTION GRANTED.

United States Supreme Court—Recent Decisions.

Infringement of Patent.—No. 259. Metropolitan Washing Company v. Providence Tool Company. Appeal from the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island. The appellants sought by their bill to enjoin an alleged infringement of a reissued patent for an improvement in clothes wringers. The court below found that there had been no infringement and dismissed the bill, and that decree is here affirmed, the conclusion being that while the tool company have used a portable support for a wringing machine which has some of the features of that claimed by complainants, it has not the yoke (formed like the letter U) which is essential to the patented combination. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion.

Lost Instrument—Deposition — Copy.—No. 284. Burton v. Hord. Error to the Circuit Court of Vermont. The main question in this case was whether a certain deposition, taken at instance of the plaintiff in the suit, having been lost, the court below erred in admitting in evidence a copy of such deposition under the rule as to other written instruments. It is said that the party entitled to the benefit of the contents of the lost instrument was not bound to supply its place with another and a different deposition which might or might not be the same in effect, and that there was no error in receiving the copy. Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion.

Arkansas Treasury Certificates—Legal Tender to State Officer in Payment of Fees.

Our correspondent at Little Rock, Frank M. Parsons, Esq., sends us the following memorandum of a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Arkansas in the case of Ramsey v. Cox:

William K. Ramsey was indebted to Norval W. Cox, clerk of the supreme court, for fees accrued in a case lately pending in said court, and tendered treasury certificates of the state in payment of said debt. Cox refused to receive the certificates as payment, and thereupon Ramsey asked for a rule requiring Cox to accept the tender of the certificates.

The cause coming on upon a demurrer "in short" on the record, the court granted the rule.

In the opinion the court said that such certificates are funds within the meaning of the acts of the general assembly, which provide that the compensation of all officers "shall be payable in such funds as may by law be receivable in payment of taxes." Since the obvious intention of the legislature in the provision quoted was that "whatever should be receivable in payment of state taxes, whether technically denominated funds or not, should also be receivable for salary, fees, etc., of officers."

To the suggestion that these certificates were issued in violation of the constitution the court held that such certificates are not bills of credit, because they were not issued to circulate through the community for its ordinary purposes as money, but in every case were issued as evidences of indebtedness on the part of the state to those to whom they were issued" (citing 4 Kent's Com. 408; 2 Story Con. §§ 1358—70, and Craig v. Mo., 4 Peters, 410); the fact that their circulation has become general on account of their value in paying taxes not having the effect to give them that character; and that such certificates are not legal tenders, since "they are made receivable merely in satisfaction of salaries, fees, etc., of officers."

Book Notice.

THE 23D OHIO STATE REPORTS. Reports of Cases Argued and Determined in the Supreme Court of Ohio. By MOSES M. GRANGER. New Series. Vol. 23. Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co. 1874. pp. 696.

This volume of Reports, comprising in round numbers 700 pages of printed matter, printed in good style (much better than the average of the state reports) on good, substantial paper, and well bound, is furnished at the low price of $2 50. Compared with the Missouri Reports, which sell at $4 00 per volume, this is furnished at half the cost. We do not know under what contract with the state these reports are afforded at so low a price, but one thing is certain, the amount of money which the great mass of lawyers can afford to spend in the purchase of books is limited, and the cheapness alone of these Reports, did they possess no other merit, would have a tendency to diffuse them very widely throughout the Union, and to give the Supreme Court of Ohio a very large influence in shaping the growth of American jurisprudence. If we mistake not, the reports of the Court of Appeals of New York, and the official series of the reports of the Supreme Court of New York, are the only other American reports which are published at the same price per volume. We say at the same price per volume, for the series of New York Supreme Court reports edited by Messrs. Thompson & Cook, while much more ably reported than either of the other two, are perhaps cheaper when the actual amount of printed matter per volume is measured and the respective prices compared.

We believe the Ohio state reports have always stood well. We have always been accustomed to use them with confidence and to hear them quoted with respect. We have no means of knowing the manner in which the judges consult, and hence cannot conjecture the weight which is to be given to the arguments by which the conclusions of the court are supported—whether they represent the views of the whole court, or merely those of the judge who writes the opinion. We may, from another circumstance, presume, however, that the judges consult before the opinions are written, and in such consultation agree not only upon the result, but also upon the grounds upon which their conclusions are based. The circumstance to which we allude, and which indicates the painstaking habits of the court, will be explained by the following rule, which has been adhered to since 1858: "A syllabus of the points decided by the court in each case shall be stated in writing by the judge assigned to deliver the opinion of the court, which shall be confined to the points of law arising from the facts of the case that have been determined by the court. And the syllabus shall be submitted to the judges concurring therein for revisal before publication thereof; and it shall be inserted in the book of reports without alteration, unless by consent of the judges concurring therein." It is to be inferred from this rule that the judges determine upon the facts of the case in consultation, before the opinion is written. This is done by the Supreme Court of Iowa, as appears by an article in the May number of the Western Jurist, which we shall publish next week. If we are right in our conjectures, the full weight of the concurring judges is given, not only to the points adjudged as stated in the syllabus, but also to the grounds as stated in the opinion on which the judgment is based.

The reporter's work is exceedingly well done. A separate statement of the facts is made in each case, so far as it is necessary to an understanding of the opinion, and the arguments of counsel are given with adequate fullness. The making of statements of the facts of each case, and the condensing of the briefs of counsel, involve in the preparation of a volume of reports a very great amount of labor. Considering what human nature is, it is not surprising, then, that some reporters have fallen into the habit of omitting to make separate statements of the cases which they report, putting the reader off with the stereotyped statement, which is frequently not true, that "the case is stated in the opinion." There are cases in the late Illinois and Missouri Reports in which no one can state with certainty what the case decides, because the reporter has omitted to make a statement of the case.

We regret that our space will not permit us to notice any of the interesting decisions of this volume. We have already noticed some of them from advanced sheets sent us by the publishers.

Notes and Queries.

CAIRO, May 18, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—There is a habit among the jailors in some of the counties of this state, whenever one is committed to their custody upon some criminal charge, of taking forcible possession of whatever moneys or valuables the accused may have about his person, and breaking open and examining all of his correspondence. Is there anything in the law, where there is no statutory provision on the subject, to warrant this course of procedure on the part of jailors?

Digitized by Google

ENQUIRER.

ANSWER.—The law holds a prison-keeper to a very strict accountability with reference to the custody of his prisoner. It is a felony at common law for the keeper of a prison voluntarily to suffer a prisoner, charged with felony, to escape, and a misdemeanor to suffer a person charged with a misdemeanor, to escape. 2 Whart. Crim. Law, § 2607, 7th ed. And so jealous is the law upon this subject that it is not necessary to prove negligence in the prison-keeper, for the law implies it from the fact of the escape. Ibid, 2608. And so severe is the policy of the law in this regard, that it has been held that nothing but the act of God, or of irresistible adverse force, will be an excuse. Ibid. If Dr. Wharton is accurate in these statements of doctrine, and if the rule is as stringent where the liability for an escape is regulated by statute, the law would clearly permit very stringent measures on the part of a jailer, compatible with the health and proper treatment of his prisoner, to protect himself against the consequences of an escape. We presume that he would have a right to deprive a prisoner, charged with an atrocious crime, of any money or other valuables by which he might purchase outside assistance; but we presume he would not ordinarily be justified in retaining possession of the prisoner's money and valuables, if he were properly directed by the prisoner to turn them over to his friends or to his counsel. For like reasons the jailer would ordinarily have the right to examine all letters passing to or from the prisoner. This might be necessary to prevent the formation of a conspiracy between the prisoner and outside persons for his rescue. There is, however, a class of communications which would clearly be excepted from this rule. We allude to the case of communications between the prisoner and his counsel. It is a rule of public policy, than which none is more familiar, or more rigidly enforced by the courts, that confidential communications between an attorney and his client are inviolable. So stringent is this principle in criminal cases that it has lately been held by a court of very high standing, that where it is doubtful in a criminal case whether a communication is privileged or not, it is the duty of the court, of its own motion, to exclude evidence of it. People v. Atkinson, 40 Cal. 284. The same rule of public policy would operate to preserve inviolable against the intermeddling of an officious jailer, the written communications between a prisoner and his counsel. Assuming, of course, that the counsel is an attorney in good standing of the court where the prisoner is to be tried, there would seem to be no principle which could tolerate such intermeddling. The attorney being a sworn officer of the court and of the law, there can be no presumption that any communication which might pass unexamined between him and his client would endanger the safe custody of the latter. There is no principle or policy of the law which makes a jailer a censor of communications which pass between a prisoner and his counsel; and we suppose any respectable judge would, on a proper application, put a stop to such an unwarranted interference. Imagine the case of a prisoner about to be tried for his life; his counsel residing at a distance, and unable to communicate with him orally; his confidential letters addressed to his client broken open by a prying jailer, and their contents perhaps communicated to the prosecuting witness. Could anything be a greater outrage upon the rights of the prisoner, or more prejudicial to that fair trial which the law endeavors by every safeguard to secure for him?

These, however, are simply the views of one lawyer answering another's question. We have been unable to find any decision in point.

Legal News and Notes.

—IN New Hampshire there are about 60 men who give character to the whole bar. They are hard thinkers and indefatigable workers. In preparing an opinion the court must convince the beaten counsel that he is wrong. If they do not, he "enlists for the war," and keeps getting the question up in one form or another until the court gets down to the bed-rock. It took 40 years to reverse an erroneous opinion of the late Chief Justice RICHARDSON, but it had to go.

—A MOVEMENT is on foot in Alabama looking to the holding of a convention of the lawyers throughout the state, its objects being to suggest changes in existing laws; to suggest the enactment of such laws as may afford better protection to person and property; to suggest rules of practice in the several courts better calculated to reduce the expenses of litigation and more speedily attain the ends of justice; to declare a code of legal ethics, and to adopt measures for the purpose of enforcing the same.—Albany Law Journal.

—THEY have in England some sort of a compulsory education law called the elementary education act. The following will give a vague idea of its workings: One Jennings, a costermonger, was summoned before Mr. Bushby (whoever he was) for not sending his child to school. He pleaded that his wife was dead, and that he was obliged to leave his child (twelve years old) at home to tend the baby, not being able to hire a nurse. This was not one of the excuses mentioned in the act, but Mr. Bushby dismissed the summons and granted a case to the Queen's Bench to determine whether the excuses mentioned in the act were alone to be considered as "reasonable" ones.

—HON. JOSHUA TRACY, judge of the first judicial district of Iowa, has resigned and returned to the practice of the law. Inadequacy of the salary is said to be the cause. It is a very great misfortune to the state to lose the valuable services of Judge Tracy upon the bench. He had large experience, and was universally recognized as one of the best district judges the state has ever had. Governor Carpenter has appointed the Hon. P. Henry Smythe to the vacancy. Judge Smythe has an enviable reputation as a lawyer, and will no doubt make an excellent judge. He received the cordial and unanimous endorsement for the position from the members of the bar of that district.—Western Jurist.

—APROPOS of the subject of judicial salaries, it appears that the London police magistrates get £1200 a year, and an effort is being made to have their salaries increased. In this country, Mr. Justice COOLEY, for instance, performs the drudgery incident to a seat on the supreme bench of Michigan, and gives the public the benefit of his great learning, for less than half that sum. We do not believe that high salaries comport with public policy in such a country as ours; but the miserable allowance doled out to our judges is a standing evidence of the ingratitude of republics. Here is a man who is doing as much for the cause of jurisprudence as any judge or chancellor on the English bench, working for less than half the salary of a London police magistrate. Is it matter of surprise that the standard of the judiciary is low in many of the United States, and that, as a rule, the most successful lawyers do not seek to become judges?

—CRIMINAL justice in Scotland is sometimes administered in a manner that would put to shame the farces enacted in some of the rudest districts of America. Recently an ex-member of parliament, named Alexander Stuart, indulged in the little pleasantry of discharging a loaded gun at a farm laborer. He missed the laborer, but killed a horse. Alternative charges of assault and malicious mischief in killing the horse were preferred against him. The case was heard at the Aberdeen Spring Circuit, before Lord DEAS. The defendant pleaded guilty to malicious mischief, and after some severe comments by his lordship, he was sentenced to one month's imprisonment. Shooting with intent to murder shuffled into malicious mischief, and punished by one month's imprisonment! This would have been worthy of that district of Arkansas where a lawyer the other day so far lost control of his temper as to kill a judge of one of the courts, and the bar, with owl-like gravity, voted his conduct unprofessional.

—WE learn from a correspondent that Mr. Justice DOE, of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, is only about forty-four years of age, but has exhibited great ability in his present position. It is said that he works from thirteen to twenty hours a day. This must certainly be a mistake. Nobody but a shoemaker can work at that rate and hold out. Our correspondent regrets that Judge DOE could not have been appointed Chief Justice of the United States. We think it better for his fame that he is where he is. With the comparative leisure which the limited litigation of a small state affords, he will build for himself a much more solid and enduring monument than he could build on the over-worked bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. Besides, there is something strikingly invigorating in the mountain air of New Hampshire, when compared with the Goose Creek malaria of the national capital. It may well be doubted whether any of the present able justices of the Supreme Court of the United States will acquire a fame as solid and enduring as that of Judge REDFIELD, who laid the foundation of his greatness on the supreme bench of Vermont.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JUNE 4, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

☞ Those of our subscribers who have not already done so will please note that in our issue of May 7, by an omission, the date on the outside cover was not changed. This will obviate the mistake of sending that number back to us as a duplicate.

Negligence Causing Fires — Proximate and Remote Cause.

WE publish in this number a most interesting and important charge of Mr. Justice MILLER, in the U. S. Circuit Court for Iowa, respecting the liability of owners of steamboats on the Mississippi river for damages to property on the shore by fire caused by sparks emitted from smoke-stacks, and upon the question of remote and proximate cause.

Connected with the question what is the proximate and what the remote cause of losses which happen by the communication of fires, we note an interesting decision by the Queen's Bench of Lower Canada, sitting in review, in The Commercial Union Insurance Co. v. The Canada Iron Mining and Manufacturing Co., 18 L. C. Jurist, 80. The action was upon a policy of insurance on which was endorsed the following condition: "The company will not be answerable for any loss or damage by fire occasioned by earthquakes or hurricanes, or by burning of forests; and this policy shall remain suspended and of no effect in respect of any loss or damage (however caused) which shall happen or arise, during the existence of any of the contingencies aforesaid." Under proper allegations it was proved that a forest or growth of trees ran down the sides of a creek directly on to the respondent's property; that it and all the other woods in the surrounding country were on fire, and that the fire was communicated from these fires to a group of 18 or 20 houses named Rafting Village, and thence through the lumber on Gilmour's piling ground to respondents' property. It was proved that the fire also came from Donnelly's woods, three-quarters of a mile distant, and perhaps from other woods, as the whole of the neighboring forests were on fire; the wind was high; sparks and ashes were flying about in all directions, and, as one witness said, "the fire seemed to be in all the air."

The line of argument adopted by respondent's counsel was, 1st, that by the word "forests" was meant primeval forests; 2nd, that there were no primeval forests in the neighborhood, and that the condition of the policy had no reference to this case.

But the court held that the facts proved brought the case within the exception of the policy; that the forest fires were the proximate cause of the loss, and that the plaintiffs could not recover.

BADGLEY, J., said: "As matter of fact, fires had been burning in the forests at some distance from the scene of this loss, but there was no forest fire for two or three days before the accident, although a day or two before, some timber trees on the banks at a mile distant had been burned. There were no trees or forest on the respondent's property, but the forest was more or less connected with it by trees on the bank, which in one part were near Messrs. Gilmour's lumber yard. And it is quite clearly proved that the respondents' property took fire from the lumber yard, which, in its turn, took fire, not from actual 'forest fires,' but from the fires from the forest fire, which reached the trees on the stream. It is a rule well established that, in the absence of all fraud, as in this case, the proximate cause of loss only is to be looked at. The rule is a just one, because otherwise the most remote and unconnected cause of the fire would govern the insurance. But in this case, tracing the cause of the fire from the appellants' buildings to their neighbors, the wooden ratting village, and from that to the Gilmours' immense lumber yard, which took fire from the burning of the trees on the stream, which trees could only have been ignited from the burning forest, it appears that the respondents' property was burnt from the cause excluded from the protection of the policy. The appellants must, therefore, be relieved from payment of the loss."

Railroad Taxation in Missouri.

We published in our issue for May 9 (ante, p. 228) the case of The Pacific Railroad Company v. Maguire, involving a question as to the right of the legislature of Missouri to levy a tax or contribution upon the gross earnings of this road, for the purpose of liquidating its indebtedness to the state, before the expiration of the time during which such road had by a previous legislative act been exempted from taxation. We also called attention editorially (p. 224) to the nature of the decision, and took occasion to correct a gross misstatement, which occurred in the St. Louis Democrat of May 5, as to the effect of the decision. In doing so we called attention to the case of The North Missouri R. R. Co. v. Maguire, determined in the Supreme Court of the United States (opinion by Mr. Justice CLIFFORD), which affirms the decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri, holding that the Missouri constitutional ordinance of 1865 imposing a tax of ten per cent. until the year 1868, and thereafter of fifteen per cent. upon the gross earnings of the North Missouri R. R. Co., was valid. We now publish the full text of this opinion. Being unable to procure, at the time, a complete copy of the case of The Pacific R. R. Co. v. Maguire, we published what purported to be the "substance" of it as given in two of the St. Louis papers. We now publish the omitted portion. By tacking the following words to the end of the opinion of Mr. Justice HUNT, as previously published by us (ante, p. 228), the reader will have the full opinion:

"A suggestion is made that the imposition in question is not a tax, for the reason that the ordinance imposing it provides that the same shall be appropriated by the general assembly in payment of the principal and interest due and to become due upon the bonds issued to the company by the state. The purpose to which the state shall apply the proceeds of a tax is not material so long as it is a public purpose, and that the payment of the debts of a state is a public purpose, does not admit of a doubt. It is called a tax both in the agreed statement of facts before us and in the ordinance imposing it. Thus, 'there shall be levied and collected an annual tax of ten per cent. of all their gross receipts,' etc., 'which tax shall be assessed and collected in the county of St. Louis in the same manner as other state taxes are assessed and collected.' * * * 'The tax in this ordinance specified shall be collected from each company,' etc. * * * 'Should either of said companies refuse or neglect to pay said tax as herein required,' etc. A tax upon receipts is one of the recognized modes of taxing corporations, as well under state laws as under the laws of the general government. The ordinance of 1865 was either the imposition of a tax or it was an act of high-handed violence, a forcible seizure of private property, without law or authority, an act which, if committed by an individual, would amount to robbery. The case before us will justify no such imputation upon the state of Missouri. The result of these views is the reversal of the judgment below, and in accordance with the stipulation in the record, judgment is ordered in favor of the plaintiff in error for six cents damages and for costs, and the case is remanded, with directions that a judgment be entered accordingly.

"Judge STRONG did not sit in this case."

It will be seen that the portion which we have italicised puts a very different face upon the opinion, as it would strike the ordinary non-professional reader unacquainted with the decision in the North Missouri R. R. case, which the St. Louis papers have not published. Did both of the St. Louis papers which published the "substance" of the opinion in the Pacific R. R. case accidentally omit the same important paragraph? Another circumstance connected with this Pacific R. R. case is that it was argued and decided simultaneously with the North Missouri R. R. case reported in 49 Mo. 490, but it was not reported until a year afterward, when it appeared in 51 Mo. 142. Was this also accidental? Was it also accidental that in speaking of the effect of the final decision of the Pacific R. R. case by the Supreme Court of the United States, the St. Louis Democrat used in its issue of May 5th the following language, the very contrary of which is true: "The supreme court now holds that the ordinance was void from the first, as being a violation of the contract of the state with the corporations?" Instead of this being true, the power of the state of Missouri to tax the three leading railroads centering in St. Louis, namely, the St. Louis and Iron Mountain R. R., the Pacific R. R., and the North Missouri R. R., has been decisively affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Iron Mountain R. R. case (ante, p. 175); in the language of Mr. Justice HUNT in the Pacific R. R. case, as above quoted, and which two of the St. Louis papers suppressed, and also in the North Missouri R. R. case which we elsewhere publish. And the Supreme Court of the United States, instead of holding that the railroad tax provision of the constitutional ordinance of 1865 was "void from the first"—not only in the North Missouri R. R. case, which we elsewhere publish, but also in the above language of Mr. Justice HUNT, holds that it was a valid exercise of the taxing power. The supreme court, however, in the Pacific R. R. case made an exception as to the two years elapsing from the completion of that road, during which it was exempt from taxation by the act of 1852.

In view of the foregoing, we think we may fairly ask whether the omissions and misstatements we have noted above were simply the result of a concatenation of accidents, or whether they show a deliberate attempt to suppress from the people the true facts in regard to this Pacific R. R. litigation. If the latter hypothesis be true, every one is at liberty to suggest whatever reason for it he sees fit, in accordance with the spirit of the maxim, contra spoliatorem omnia præsumuntur.

The Brinkley Divorce Case.

The Brinkley divorce case, which has been on trial for some days in the Supreme Court at New York city, before Judge VAN BRUNT, has resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff on all the issues submitted to the jury. This verdict will no doubt satisfy the feelings of the better class of the people who have followed the testimony as it has appeared from day to day in the New York papers. It will be remembered that the substantial question in the case was whether there had been in fact a marriage. The plaintiff claimed that there had, although, to conceal the fact from the defendant's father, it was never publicly or formally solemnized. The defendant simply asserted that the plaintiff had been nothing more than his kept mistress. The evidence was that they "took up" with each other (to borrow a plantation phrase) at a boarding-house in New York city. But as there was no formal ceremony of marriage and no witnesses, the solution of the question whether they mutually agreed to be man and wife, or anything more than man and mistress, depended entirely upon the testimony of the parties. But so far as their relations to each other could be discerned from their external conduct it was in evidence that they cohabited together as man and wife, registering themselves as such at hotels and passing themselves off as such in public, and even in society, for the space of about five years, although their relation as such appears to have been frequently questioned.

A notable feature of the case consisted in an attempt on the part of the defendant to introduce evidence of the plaintiff's bad reputation for chastity. This Judge VAN BRUNT would have been prompted by his own views to admit, but he was obliged, in obedience to a decision of the court of appeals, to exclude it. Whatever may be thought of the rule of evidence thus followed (perhaps akin to the exclusionary rules denounced by Bentham), its application in this particular case will, no doubt, meet with general approval. With what eyes could the defendant face a court of justice and attempt to blacken her character by loose evidence of general reputation, when his whole defence consisted in an accusation against himself of a misdemeanor against public morals and decency, punished in some of the states by fine and imprisonment—the offence of lascivious cohabitation? (See State v. Cagle, 2 Humph. Tenn. 414; State v. Moore, 1 Swan, Tenn. 136; State v. Marion 12 Iowa, 499; Iowa Revision, 1860, § 4351; Ibid 1873 § 4012.) What chance would she have stood in a contest with his wealth and influence, if such evidence had been admitted? Was ever an instance known of perjury being successfully assigned on false testimony as to general reputation? But the difficulty of disproving or counteracting the effect of such evidence seems the chief objection to its admission. If a number of apparently credible witnesses swear that a woman's reputation for chastity is bad, you may pile rebutting proof as high as Pelion upon Ossa, and you cannot wholly efface the prejudice created in the minds of the jury. There would seem in this particular case to be no more sense or justice in allowing him to prove that her reputation for chastity was bad, in order to show that there had been no marriage, than to allow her to prove that his reputation for chastity was good, in order to show that there had been a marriage.

Digitized by Google

Recurring again to the general features of the case, we may note as a specimen of the stuff of which the defence was composed, that a witness—we forbear to mention his name, he may have honorable connections—who claimed to have been a broker, was not ashamed to testify that he had acted the part of a pimp in procuring the services of the plaintiff for the defendant; and in order to emphasize the character of the transaction, and to enhance the value of his own testimony, he swore that he himself had had immoral relations with the plaintiff. We think no right-minded man can read much of this testimony without heartily concurring in the result. There are perhaps few men who have not, at one time or another, yielded to temptation; but every high-minded man will pay sufficient respect to virtue to lament any dereliction from her precepts of which he may, in some weak hour, have been guilty; and his sense of decency will lead him to conceal from the public eye what he cannot banish from his own consciousness. But this defendant, when by a noble and self-sacrificing act he might have greatly raised himself in the estimation of good men and women, and done much toward effacing the stain brought upon his name by a course of folly, by recognizing the plaintiff, his equal in morals and his superior in intellect, as his honorable wife, preferred voluntarily to publish to the world his shame, and to write it upon the ineffaceable records of a court of justice. Her case, even though his defence were true, cannot fail to command sympathy in every honorable and generous breast. She was poor; and most of the avenues by which pinching poverty is avoided were closed against her sex. She therefore may have felt under some necessity to part with her honor, or at least to hazard her reputation, in order to promote her comfort. No such necessity lay upon him. He had wherewith to support a wife and rear a family in luxury. The policy of the law and the requirements of good morals demanded that he should marry and not substitute in its place lascivious cohabitation.

We could sincerely wish that this case may establish the precedent, where it has not already been established, that when a man cohabits with a woman and holds her out to the public as his wife, the law will not tolerate him in denying the existence of that relation; but as marriage is in the United States a subject of statutory regulation, this result cannot be expected.

The Right to Keep and Bear Arms for Private and Public Defence.

[CONTINUED.]

2. A second branch of the question relates to the kind of weapon, the carrying of which is within the constitutional guaranty. By far the most instructive case on this branch of the question is Aymette v. State, 2 Humph. 154. The constitution of Tennessee in force at that time provided that "the free white men of this state shall have a right to keep and bear arms for their common defence." And the question considered by the court was whether this constitutional provision was violated by a statute which provided "that if any person shall wear any bowie-knife, or Arkansas tooth-pick, or other knife or weapon that shall in form, shape or size resemble a bowie-knife, or Arkansas tooth-pick, under his clothes, or keep the same concealed about his person, such person shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall be find," etc. GREEN, J., in an able opinion traces the constitutional provision to its origin in the English Bill of Rights, Stat. 1 W. & M., ch. st. 2, ch. 2, cl. and then makes the following observations upon its policy and scope: "As the object for which the right to keep and bear arms is secured, is of a general and public nature, to be exercised by the people in a body for their common defence, so the arms, the right to keep which is secured, are those which are usually employed in civilized warfare, and that constitute the ordinary military equipment. If the citizens have these arms in their hands, they are prepared in the best possible manner to repel any encroachments upon their rights by those in authority. They need not, for such a purpose, the use of those weapons which are usually employed in private broils, and which are efficient only in the hands of the robber and the assassin. These weapons would be useless in war. They could not be employed advantageously in the common defence of the citizens. The right to keep and bear them is not, therefore, secured by the constitution." It was accordingly held that the statute was not in derogation of the state constitution.

But by far the most elaborate discussion of the question will be found in Andrews v. The State, 3 Heiskell, 165, determined in the Supreme Court of Tennessee in 1871. The state was ably represented, and the synopsis of the argument of the attorney-general should not be overlooked. The court possessed the weight of being composed of six judges; but unfortunately they were by no means unanimous, either as to the result, or as to the reasoning by which the result was reached. The provision of the present constitution of Tennessee is that "the citizens of this state have a right to keep and bear arms for their common defence; but the legislature shall have power by law to regulate the wearing of arms with a view to prevent crime." Const. of Tenn., art. 1, § 26. The material provision of the statute whose validity was disputed was that "it shall not be lawful for any person to publicly or privately carry and dirk, sword-cane, Spanish stiletto, belt or pocket pistol or revolver." Act of Tenn., June 11, 1870; 2 Tho. & S. Code, § 4756 a. It was held that this statute was not in derogation of the constitution of the state, except so far as it restrained the keeping of arms "in the ordinary mode known to the court." In this result four of the judges concurred. FREEMAN, J., delivered the opinion of the court, in which the question is discussed at great length. NICHOLSON, Ch. J., and DEADERICK, J., concurred in the general views expressed by him; but SNEED, J., dissented from so much of the opinion as questioned the right of the legislature to prohibit the wearing of arms of any description, or sought to limit the operation of the act of 1870. On the other hand, NELSON, J., dissented with much force, holding that the act was in derogation of the constitutional right to bear arms, and in derogation of the natural and inalienable right of self-defence. While it is difficult to say precisely what this long case does decide, it may be fairly said to be an affirmance of Aymette v. State, supra; and no doubt the following sentences represent the views of all of the four concurring judges, except SNEED, J., who goes further in support of the power of the legislature to regulate the wearing of arms: "What, then, is he [the citizen] protected in the right to keep and thus use? Not everything that may be useful for offence or defence; but what may properly be understood or included under the title of arms, taken in connection with the fact that the citizen is to keep them as a citizen. Such, then, as are found to make up the usual arms of the citizen of the country, and the use of which will properly train and render him efficient in defence of his own liberties, as well as of the state. Under this head, with a knowledge of the habits of our people, and of the arms in the use of which a soldier should he trained, we would hold that the rifle of all descriptions, the shot-gun, the musket and repeater are such arms; and under the constitution, the right to keep such arms cannot be infringed or forbidden by the legislature. Their use, however, may be subordinated to such regulations and limitations as are or may be authorized by the laws of the land, passed to subserve the general good, so as not to infringe the right secured, and the necessary incidents to the exercise of such right." * * * "We hold, then, that the act of the legislature in question, so far as it prohibts the citizen, either publicly or privately, to carry a dirk, sword-cane, Spanish stilletto, belt or pocket pistol, is constitutional. As to the pistol designated as a revolver, we hold this may or may not be such a weapon as is adapted to the usual equipment of the soldier, or the use of which may render him more efficient as such; and therefore hold this to be a matter to be settled by evidence, as to what character of weapon is included in the designation 'revolver.'" * * * * "We know there is a pistol of that name [revolver] which is not adapted to the equipment of the soldier, yet we also know that the pistol known as the 'repeater' is a soldiers' weapon—skill in the use of which will add to the efficiency of the soldier. If such is the character of the weapon here designated, then the prohibition of the statute is too broad to be allowed to stand consistently with the views herein expressed. * * * As we have said, the statute amounts to a prohibition to keep and use such weapon for any and all purposes. It therefore, in this respect, violates the constitutional right to keep arms, and the incidental right to use them, in the ordinary mode of using such arms, and is inoperative."

Digitized by Google

We must not here overlook the early Tennessee case of Simpson v. The State, decided by the Supreme Court of Tennessee in 1833, and reported in 5 Yerger, 356. The only question in that case was the sufficiency of an indictment for an affray which charged that the defendant, "with force and arms, at, etc., being arrayed in a warlike manner, then and there, in a certain public street and highway situate, unlawfully, and to the great terror of divers good citizens of the state, then and there being, an affray did make," etc. It was held that this indictment did not sufficiently charge an affray. The court consisted of four judges, among them Judge GREEN, who delivered the opinion of the court in Aymette v. The State, supra, and also Judge CATRON, afterwards one of justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, who, two years before, had delivered the opinion of the court in the famous Grainger case (5 Yerg. 459) expounding the law of self-defence; and with these were associated Judges WHYTE and PECK. WHYTE, J., delivered the opinion of the court, PECK, J., dissenting. Two reasons were given for holding the indictment insufficient. The first was that in order to constitute an affray there must be, 1st, fighting; 2d, and between two or more persons; 3d, and in some public place so as to cause terror to the people. Now the indictment did not charge fighting, nor fighting between two or more persons. It was therefore held insufficient. It is difficult to conceive how there can be fighting, unless there be at least two persons, unless it be between a man and a beast; but we are stating accurately the reasoning of the court. The second reason, and the one with which we have to do, is embodied in the following language of Judge WHYTE: "But suppose it to be assumed on any ground that our ancestors adopted and brought over with them this English statute [2 Edw. III.] or portion of the common law, our constitution [of 1796] has completely abrogated it. It says 'that the freemen of this state have a right to keep and to bear arms for their common defence.' (Art 11, § 29.) It is submitted that this clause of our constitution fully meets and opposes the passage or clause in Hawkins of 'a man's arming himself with dangerous and unusual weapons,' as being an independent ground of affray, so as of itself to constitute the offense cognizable by indictment. By this clause of the constitution an express power is given and secured to all the free citizens of the state to keep and bear arms for their defence, without any qualification whatever as to their kind or nature; and it is conceived that it would be going much too far to impair by construction or abridgment a constitutional privilege which is so declared. Neither, after so solemn an instrument hath said the people may carry arms, can we be permitted to impute to the acts thus licensed such a necessarily consequent operation as terror to the people to be incurred thereby. We must attribute to the framers of it the absence of such a view." In Aymette's case, supra, Judge GREEN characterized the above language as "only an incidental remark of the judge who delivered the opinion, and therefore entitled to no weight." To enable the reader to judge how far this declaration of law by Judge WHYTE was necessary to the determination of the question in the case, it should be remarked that it is an argument put forth to obviate the force of the following language of Sergeant Hawkins: "But granting that no bare words in the judgment of law carry with them so much terror as to amount to an affray, yet it seems certain that in some cases there may be an affray where there is no actual violence; as where a man arms himself with dangerous and unusual weapons, in such a manner as will naturally cause terror to the people, which is said always to have been an offence at common law, and is strictly prohibited by many statutes." (Hawk. P. C. Book 1, ch. 28, § 4, Leach's ed.)

The latest case upon this branch of the subject appears to be English v. The State, 35 Tex. 473. The statute considered in that case (Act of 12 April, 1871, 2 Pasch. Dig. Laws, art. 6512) provides with certain exceptions that "any person carrying on or about his person, saddle, or in his saddle-bags, any pistol, dirk, dagger, slung-shot, sword-cane, spear, brass-knuckles, bowie-knife, or any other kind of knife manufactured or sold for the purpose of offence or defence, unless he has reasonable grounds for fearing an unlawful attack on his person, and that such grounds of attack shall be immediate and pressing; or unless having or carrying the same on or about his person for the lawful defence of the state, as a militia-man in actual service, or as a peace officer or policeman, shall be guilty of misdemeanor," etc. The second section provides that "any person charged under the first section of this act who may offer to prove by way of defence that he was in danger of an attack on his person, or unlawful interference with his property, shall be required to show that such danger was immediate and pressing, and was of such a nature as to alarm a person of ordinary courage; and that the weapon so carried was borne openly and not concealed beneath his clothing; and if it shall appear that this danger had its origin in a difficulty first commenced by the accused, it shall not be considered a legal defence." Section 3 provides that the governor may, by proclamation, exempt the frontier counties from the operation of the act. The remaining sections contain provisions which it is not necessary to notice. It will be seen that this statute is much stronger than any which we have previously cited. With certain restricted exceptions, it effectually prohibits the bearing of all small arms, whether openly or concealed, on horseback or on foot. It is doubtful whether so sweeping a statute can be sustained in the light of any of the adjudications already quoted. But the late Supreme Court of Texas nevertheless did, in English v. The State, supra, declare that it is neither in conflict with the second amendment of the federal constitution, nor with the provision of the constitution of that state quoted at the beginning of this article. The court (WALKER, J.) say: "The word 'arms,' in the connection we find it in the constitution of the United States, refers to the arms of a militia-man or soldier, and the word is used in its military sense. The arms of the infantry soldier are the musket and bayonet; of cavalry and dragoons, the sabre, holster-pistol and carbine; of the artillery, the field-piece, siege gun and mortar, with side-arms. The terms dirks, daggers, slung-shots, sword-canes, brass-knuckles and bowie-knives belong to no military vocabulary. Were a soldier on duty found with one of these things about his person he would be punished for an offence against discipline. The act referred to makes all necessary exceptions, and points out the place, the time and manner in which certain deadly weapons may be carried as a means of self-defence; and these exceptional cases, in our judgment, fully cover all the wants of society. There is no abridgment of the personal rights, such as may be regarded as inherent and inalienable to man, nor do we think his political rights are the least infringed by any part of this law." The court also understand the word "arms" in the Texas constitution as having the same import and meaning which it has in the second amendment of the federal constitution; and they hold that the legislature may regulate the right to bear arms without taking it away, and that this has been done by the act under consideration.

Digitized by Google

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Constitutional Law—Taxation of Railroads.

THE NORTH MISSOURI RAILROAD COMPANY AND MORRIS K. JESSUP, PLAINTIFFS IN ERROR, v. CONSTANTINE MAGUIRE.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 281, October Term, 1873.

1. Constitutional Law—Power to Tax Railroads.—The first section of a constitutional ordinance adopted by the people of Missouri, in 1865, provides that "there shall be levied and collected from the Pacific Railroad, the North Missouri Railroad, and the St. Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad companies, an annual tax of ten per centum of all their gross receipts for the transportation of freight and passengers (not including amounts received from and taxes paid to the United States), from the first of October, 1866, to the first of October, 1868, and fifteen per centum thereafter; which tax shall be assessed and collected in the county of St. Louis, in the same manner as other state taxes are assessed and collected, and shall be appropriated by the general assembly to the payment of the principal and interest now due, or hereafter to become due, upon the bonds of the state, and the bonds guaranteed by the state issued to the aforesaid railroad companies." Held, that this ordinance does not impair the obligation of any contract between the state of Missouri and the North Missouri Railroad Company, and is constitutional and valid. [Affirming North Mo. R. R. Co. v. Maguire, 49 Mo. 490. Acc. Pacific R. R. Co. v. Maguire, 51 Mo. 142. And see Trask v. Maguire, ante, 175; Pacific R. R. Co. v. Maguire, ante, 228.]

2. ——. ——. Effect of the Act of February 16, 1865.—On the 16th day of February, 1865, prior to the adoption of the above ordinance, the legislature of Missouri passed "An act to provide for the completion of the North Missouri Railroad and its west branch, and for the construction of a bridge over the Missouri river," whereby the state, to enable said company to negotiate bonds for the purposes named, relinquished its first lien, which it previously had upon the said road and its appurtenances to secure the indebtedness of the said company to the state, and accepted a second lien in lieu thereof, and by which act a fund commissioner was appointed to receive all moneys belonging to the railroad company, and to disburse and distribute the same in a certain specified mode. Held, that there is nothing in this act creating a contract exempting the railroad company from taxation. [Affirming North Mo. R. R. Co. v. Maguire, 49 Mo. 490.]

3. Power of Taxation.—The nature and extent of the power of taxation discussed by Mr. Justice CLIFFORD.

In error to the Supreme Court of the state of Missouri.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court.

Much discussion of the evidence in the case will be unnecessary, as the principal facts are embodied in an agreed statement, which is made a part of the record.

By the agreed statement it appears that the plaintiff company is a corporation established by the laws of the state, and that the other plaintiff claims to be the legal owner of all the property lately owned by the corporation. Said company was incorporated on the 3d of March, 1851, with a capital stock of six millions of dollars, divided into shares of one hundred dollars each.

Pecuniary aid in large amounts was furnished to the company by the state, as appears from several legislative acts. Such aid was granted by the act of the 23d of December, 1851, in terms as follows: that when evidence is produced satisfactory to the governor that the company has collected fifty thousand dollars on their capital stock, and that they have expended the same in the survey, location, and construction of the railroad, the governor shall cause to be issued and delivered to the company special bonds of the state to the same amount, as a loan of public credit, bearing interest and payable as therein provided. Provision is also made in the same section that, upon like proof that the company have expended the whole of the sum realized from these bonds, and that they have also expended a further sum of the same amount of their own moneys, the governor shall, in like manner, cause to be issued and delivered to the company further like bonds to the same amount, and so on in like manner as often as the company shall, from time to time, furnish like evidence that they have expended from their own moneys further sums, of not less than fifty thousand dollars, for the construction of the railroad, and that they have expended for the purpose the whole of the proceeds of the bonds previously issued by the state, the governor shall cause to be issued and delivered to the company further like bonds in installments of the same amount, not exceeding in all the sum of two millions of dollars.

Bonds of the kind were forbidden to be delivered until the acceptance thereof should be signified to the secretary of state by the filing in his office of a certificate of such acceptance under the corporate seal of the company with the signature of the president, and the provision was that the certificate of acceptance so executed and filed should be recorded in the office of the secretary of state, and that it shall become and be, to all intents and purposes, a mortgage of said road and every part and section thereof, and its appurtenances, to the people of the state, for securing the payment of the principal and interest of the sums of money for which such bonds shall from time to time be issued and accepted.

Legislative aid was also furnished in like form to certain other railroad companies of the state to expedite their construction and the completion of the same, amounting in the whole to the sum of nine millions of dollars, including the amount furnished to the plaintiff company, all of which was secured as a first lien on the respective railroads in like manner.

Digitized by Google

None of the companies, however, were able to complete their railroads without further aid from the state, and on the 10th of December, 1855, the legislature, by an act entitled "An act to secure the completion of certain railroads in the state," enacted that it shall be the duty of the governor, upon the application of any of said companies, with the proof of the investment of any sum in the actual construction and equipment of the trunk line of the railroad, from sources other than the proceeds of the bonds of the state, and not secured upon the road by a lien prior to that of the state, and verified as therein required, to sign and deliver to such company an amount in the bonds of the state equal to twice the amount so proven to have been invested in the construction and equipment of the said railroad since the last application and issue of bonds to such company, and successively, from time to time, upon the application for bonds and proof of such investment, the governor shall issue and deliver, in like manner, bonds to such company until the aggregate amount to the plaintiff company shall be two millions of dollars, one million of which shall be exclusively applied to the construction of a portion of said road therein described; and it is made the duty of the governor to expend the other million of dollars for the purchase of the railroad iron necessary to lay the track of said road from one described point to another, and to purchase the rolling stock for the same, and the provision is that the said iron and rolling stock so purchased shall belong to the state until placed upon the track for use, after which time the state shall have a first lien on said iron and rolling stock, together with all the road and its equipments, constructed and to be constructed, for the security of the payment of the principal and interest of said bonds, and all bonds issued or that may be issued to said company, under this or any former act of the legislature granting the credit of the state to the company.

Power is also reserved to the state to enforce the lien on the railroad for the failure on its part to pay punctually principal and interest on the bonds issued for its benefit, as herein and heretofore provided for in such cases; and the company shall pay at the times herein specified, "to the treasurer of the state one and a quarter per cent., in addition, in each year, on each thirty-year bond, and two and a half per cent., in each year, on each twenty-year bond so sold or hypothecated, to be invested at not less than seven per cent. interest, in such securities as are provided in the act."

By the same section it is also provided that from the net profits arising from the road after the same shall be completed and in operation, a sum equal to not less than ten per cent. per annum upon the net earnings of the railroad shall be paid by the company to the treasurer of the state as a sinking fund, for the purpose of paying at maturity the bonds of the state so issued and to be issued to the company.

Special provision is also made that the treasurer of the company and the treasurer of the state shall be the commissioners of the sinking fund, and that it shall be the duty of the company to pay or remit the semi-yearly interest to the designated place, as therein provided, and in case the company shall fail to pay such interest or to remit the amount to the designated place, it is made the duty of the treasurer of the state to supply the amount and remit the same, in which event he is required to refund the amount from the sinking fund and charge the same to the defaulting company. In that event the provision is that the defaulting company shall not draw any further state bonds. Moneys, funds and securities, belonging to the sinking fund, are declared to be subject to the control, care, and management of the fund commissioners, and the provision is that from time to time they may invest the same in the bonds of the state under the conditions therein provided.

All funds derived from the sale of state bonds were expended, but still the railroad was not completed, and on the third of March, 1857, the legislature made a further loan of credit to the company of one and a half millions of dollars, to be issued in bonds and to be expended upon the railroad south of the junction therein described, which bonds were to be issued in installments of two hundred thousand dollars, upon proof furnished to the governor of the expenditure for the same purpose of a sum equal to their par value in the construction of the railroad, and the company was authorized by the same act to establish and keep a ferry across the Missouri river, where its road strikes the same, for all purposes connected with the company, and for general purposes, by paying the usual license-tax provided by law in such cases.

Bonds could not be lawfully issued under that act until the company accepted the act, and it was provided that the failure to pay any part of the principal or interest of the bonds should be a forfeiture of all right in such company to demand or receive any further issue of bonds, and in that event it was made the duty of the governor to foreclose the mortgage of the state and to enforce her lien on the property of the company.

Before the year expired, to-wit, on the 19th of November following, the legislature authorized the governor to issue to the plaintiff company a further amount of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars in the bonds of the state, to complete a described portion of the road, and the same act provided that the act should not be construed to release the railroad from any penalty or forfeiture to which the company may be liable under such prior laws.

Authority was conferred upon the company by the act of the 16th of February, 1865, to issue their own bonds to the amount of six millions of dollars, and to secure the same by a first mortgage of their railroad appurtenances, as more fully set forth in the act. Such bonds were to be issued in three classes, and were to be applied as therein provived, and to facilitate the sale of the bonds the state relinquished her first lien and mortgage upon the main line of the railroad, retaining only a second lien and mortgage thereon until the principal and interest of said bonds are paid in full. By the same act the legislature created a fund commissioner, and enacted that whenever any portion of said bonds shall be issued that they shall be placed in the hands of the fund commissioner to be negotiated, and the proceeds paid over to the corporation for the purposes and under the regulations and restrictions provided in the same act, but the act was not to be operative unless accepted by the company in the mode therein provided. Prior inconsistent provisions in relation to the plaintiff company were repealed by the twelfth section of the act, and the provision is that the work on the west branch should not be expedited to the exclusion of the construction of the main line of the railroad.

These several acts were duly accepted by the company and were in force on the 8th of April following. Interest was paid by the company on the bonds issued until the year 1860, when the company made default, and such interest has never been paid. On the said 8th of April [1865] the people of the state adopted an ordinance as a part of their constitution, which provides to the effect that an annual tax of ten per cent. of all their gross receipts, with an immaterial exception, shall be levied and collected of the company and two other companies therein named, for the period of two years, as therein described, and fifteen per cent. thereafter, which tax shall be assessed and collected in the county of St. Louis in the same manner as other state taxes are assessed and collected, and shall be appropriated by the legislature to the payment of the principal and interest now due or hereafter to become due upon the bonds of the state issued to the copany.

Such receipts for the transportation of freight and passengers for the first of the two years, not including any sum received from the expected source, amounted to six hundred and eighty-two thousand five hundred and seventy dollars, and the agreed statement shows that a tax of ten per cent., amounting to sixty-eight thousand two hundred and fifty-seven dollars, was assessed in the proper county on the gross receipts of the railroad for that year, under the provisions of the said ordinance. None of the principal of the bonds was due at the time the tax was assessed, but the interest on the same, to an amount greater than the amount of the tax, was due at that time.

Digitized by Google

Payment of the tax being refused, the defendant, as the collector, seized the property of the company to satisfy the same, and the plaintiffs here brought an action of trespass against the collector to test the validity of the tax, in the state circuit court for the county where the tax was assessed. Service was made and the defendant appeared, when the parties waived a jury and submitted the case to the court upon an agreed statement of facts. Hearing was had and the court rendered judgment for the plaintiffs' and the defendant excepted and appealed to the supreme court of the state, where the judgment of the state circuit court was reversed and a judgment rendered for the defendant. Whereupon the plaintiffs sued out a writ of error and removed the cause into this court.

Corporate powers were conferred upon the company by the act of the third of March, 1851, but the act of incorporation contains no provision whatever exempting the property of the company from taxation. Three years later the charter was amended, and the sixth section of the amendatory act provided that the capital stock, with all machines, wagons, carts, engines or carriages belonging to the company, with all their works or other property, and all profits which shall arise from the same, shall be vested in the shareholders in proportion to their shares, and that the same shall be deemed personal estate and shall be exempt from any public charge or tax whatsoever for the period of five years from and after the passage of the act, which period has long since elapsed.

Attempt is made in argument to show that an exemption from taxation may be implied from some of the provisions of the act to provide for the compleiion of the railroad and its west branch. Based solely on that theory the error assigned is that the ordinance of the state imposing the tax is in violation of that provision of the constitution which prohibits the states from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Pursuant to that theory the plaintiffs contend that the legislative act to complete the railroad enacted a mode of making payments by the company to the state, which, when the act was accepted by the company, became a binding contract between the parties, within the protection of that provision of the constitution, and that as such it could not be rescinded by any subsequent legislation, and that the ordinance does not impair the obligation of that contract by providing another and a differentamode of enforcing the payments without the consent of the company.

Serious difficulty would arise in sustaining the judgment of the state court if the view assumed in the proposition was correct, that the ordinance was a mere change of the order of disbursing the receipts and earnings of the company, instead of being what it purports to be on its face, an expression of the sovereign will of the people of the state levying taxes to pay and discharge the indebtedness of the state.

Power to tax is granted for the benefit of the whole people, and none have any right to complain if the power is fairly exercised and the proceeds are properly applied to discharge the obligations for which the taxes were imposed. Such a power resides in the state government as a part of itself, and need not be reserved when property of any description is granted to individuals or corporate bodies. Cooley on Const. 127–280.

Unless exempted in terms which amount to a contract not to tax, the property, privileges and franchises of a corporation are as much the legitimate subjects of taxation as any other property of the citizens which is within the sovereign power of the state. Repeated decisions of this court have held, in respect to such corporations, that the taxing power of the state is never presumed to be relinquished, and consequently that it exists unless the intention to relinquish it is declared in clear and unambiguous terms. Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 606; P. & W. R. R. Co. v. Maryland, 10 How. 393; Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 561; Jefferson Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 36; Ohio L. I. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 416.

Express exemption is not pretended, nor does the act to provide for the completion of the railroad contain any provision which, when properly construed, affords any support to the proposition that any such contract exists between the company and the state, either express or implied, even if it could be admitted that mere implication is sufficient, which may well be questioned, as the current of the decisions of this court warrant the conclusion that if such an exemption be claimed it must be made to appear in clear, explicit, and unequivocal terms.

Authorities from numerous sources are cited by the plaintiffs, but none of them show that a lawful tax on a new subject, or an increased tax on an old one, interferes with a contract or impairs its obligation, within the meaning of the constitution, even though such taxation may affect particular contracts, as it may increase the debt of one person and lessen the security of another, or may impose additional burdens upon one class and release the burdens of another, still the tax must be paid unless prohibited by the constitution, nor can it be said that it impairs the obligation of any existing contract in its true legal sense. Blackwell on Tax Titles, (2d ed.) 408.

Properties of every kind over which the sovereign power of a state extends are objects of taxation outside of the means and instruments of the federal government. Hamilton Co. v. Mass., 6 Wall. 639.

Unrestricted by constitutional limitations, the only restraint upon the taxing power of the states is the responsibility of those in whom the power is lodged, and the power of appropriation of the proceeds, when not so restrained, is equally unlimited. Griffin v. The Mayor, 4 Comst. 419; Crowell v. Lawrence, 41 N. Y. 141.

Questions not involved in the assignment of errors will not be examined, nor is it necessary, as all agree that the main question in the case is whether the ordinance impairs the obligation of any contract made and concluded between the state and the company before the ordinance was adopted.

Unless the power of the state to tax the company was surrendered by the antecedent act to provide for the completion of the railroad, it must be conceded that the power exists, as it is plain that none of the other acts referred to afford any support whatever to such a proposition.

Five years before that act was passed the company made default in the payment of the interest falling due on the bonds which the state issued for their benefit, and by that act the legislature postponed and released the lien of the state, which was a first lien on all their property to the amount of four millions three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and accepted in its stead a second lien upon the same property, in order that the company might issue six millions of dollars of bonds of their own and be able to secure their payment, principal and interest, by a first mortgage upon the same property, to complete the main line of the road and its west branch and the bridge therein described.

Moneys belonging to the company from that time were to be placed in the hands of the fund commissioner created by the act, and were to be disbursed by him as follows: (1) Amounts required for the actual current expenditures in operating the railroad and carrying on the ordinary business of the corporation, including all sums that may be necessary for keeping the same in a good state of repair, and for such additions to the rolling-stock, &c., as may be requtred to enable the company to transact the business of the railroad. (2) Amounts sufficient to pay the salary of the fund commissioner. (3) Amounts sufficient to pay the interest upon said first mortgage bonds, as the same shall fall due. (4) Amounts necessary to pay the cost of the construction and equipment of the railroad. (5) Amounts sufficient to pay accruing dividends on preferred stock, not exceeding six per cent. per annum thereon, as provided in the act. (6) Amounts sufficient to pay the interest due on the outstanding bonds of the state previously loaned to the company. (Lastly) He shall disburse the surplus to the payment of the principal of said first mortgage bonds until the same shall be fully paid off, or if none of such bonds shall have become due, then to the payment of the principal of the bonds of the state, if any are still outstanding, and the balance shall be paid over to the company.

Digitized by Google

Further examination of those provisions is certainly unnecessary, as it is too plain for argument that they do not afford the slightest support to the views of the plaintiffs. On the contrary they are entirely silent on the subject of taxation, and fully justify the remarks of the state court when they say that the subject of taxation forms no part of the contract contained in the act under consideration. Ins. Co. v. Trust Co., 47 Mo. 155.

Nothing is said about taxation, and it does not seem to have entered into the contract between the parties, but was obviously left where the law had placed it before the act was passed, nor was any provision made for the payment of taxes, unless it may be held that the disbursements for that purpose may fairly be included in such as are required to pay the current expenditures in carrying on the ordinary business of the corporation. Railroad v. Maguire, 49 Mo. 490; Pacific R. R. v. Maguire, 51 id. 142.

Reference is also made to some other sections of the act as supporting the proposition submitted by the plaintiffs, but it is so obvious that they cannot be so regarded without departing from the established rules of law applicable in such cases, that it is not necessary to pursue the discussion.

Like controversy exists between the state and another of the railroads mentioned in the ordinance, in which case it is contended that the ten per cent. charge imposed by that instrument is not a tax within any correct meaning of that word, that it is an appropriation of the property of the company without due process of law, or the taking of the property of the company without just compensation, but no such questions are open for examination in this case, and no such error are assigned in the record.

Dissenting, Mr. Chief Justice WAITE.

Mr. Justice STRONG did not sit.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

Negligence Causing Fire—Remote and Proximate Cause—Construction of Steam Engine as Respects Damages Caused by Sparks—Duty of Steamboats as Respects Spark-Arresters—Duty of Guarding Elevators.

TIMOTHY KELLOGG v. MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILWAY COMPANY.

United States Circuit Court, District of Iowa, May Term, 1874.

Before MILLER and DILLON, JJ.

Negligence—Proximate and Remote Cause.—The defendant was the owner of an elevator built on the bank of the Mississippi river, and also of a steamboat used in transferring cars and barges to and from it. The steamboat had no spark-arrester, and the exhausted steam was allowed to escape through its chimney. The plaintiff was the owner of a mill and a lumber yard, the former 528 and the latter 388 feet from the elevator, and the space between these and the elevator was vacant; the elevator being unused, its spouts left open and without a watchman; the steamboat, being in the necessary course of its occupation, moved alongside the elevator; and the weather being very dry and the wind high and blowing in the direction of the plaintiff's mill and lumber, the elevator, by reason of sparks communicated from the chimney of the steamboat (as the evidence tends to show) caught fire, and from it fire was communicated to the defendant's mill and lumber, so that these latter were consumed. Upon these facts it is held.

(1.) That the defendant was not liable in any event, unless the fire was communicated to the elevator through the defendant's negligence or the negligence of its servants in the construction and use of the boat.

(2.) That the defendant would not be liable unless the burning of the elevator was the proximate and not merely the remote cause of the burning of the mill and lumber.

(3.) That whether the burning of the elevator was the proximate or the remote cause of the burning of the mill and lumber was a question of fact for the jury.

(4.) That the jury were therefore to determine whether the burning of the mill and lumber was the result naturally and reasonably to be expected from the burning of the elevator, and whether the burning of the elevator was the result of sparks communicated from the steamer.

(5.) That there was nothing in the fact of the steam being emitted through the chimney of the steamboat from which the jury should infer negligence.

(6.) That the leaving of the elevator unused, without a watchman and with its spouts open, did not constitute such negligence as would make the defendant responsible to the plaintiff.

(7.) That the question whether the defendant was guilty of negligence, in failing to make use of spark-arresters on his steamboat, was a question of fact for the jury.

(8.) That the true test of negligence in this and other cases is, what would an ordinaryly prudent man have done under the precise circumstances.

It appears from the pleadings and the undisputed evidence in the cause that the plaintiff, on the 3d day of October, 1871, was in the possession of a saw-mill on the bank of the Mississippi river, situate on certain lots in an addition to the town of McGregor, in Iowa, upon which there was a large quantity of lumber. At the same time the defendant was the owner of a large grain-elevator building, also situate on the bank of the river, 528 feet above the mill of the plaintiff. The intervening property was vacant or unoccupied. This elevator was built before the plaintiff's mill, and was constructed of pine, and was from 100 to 120 feet in height. It seems to have been built after the usual model of elevators, and had spouts or openings on the east or river side thereof for the purpose of discharging grain into boats or barges. The lumber on the plaintiff's premises was distant from the elevator 388 feet.

At the date above named the defendant was also the owner of a steamboat called the "Jennie Brown," which was employed by it in transferring cars and barges back and forth between the end of its road at North McGregor on the Iowa, and Prairie du Chien on the Wisconsin side of the river.

On this 3d day of October, 1871, the elevator caught fire and was entirely consumed, and the fire therefrom extended to and also entirely consumed the plaintiff's lumber and his mill building and machinery. There was at the time an unusually high wind blowing from the elevator in the direction of the plaintiff's lumber and mill. The evidence tended to show that sparks and burning brands were carried directly from the elevator to the lumber and mill, and that the trees on the bluffs, 600 feet distant from the elevator, were scorched and killed by the flames and heat from the elevator.

The plaintiff now brings this action against the railroad company to recover the value of the mill, machinery, lumber and property thus consumed. The ground of his action is the defendant's alleged negligence, which the plaintiff claims was the cause of his loss, and was so directly the cause of it as to involve an actionable liability on the part of the defendant. There are several specific grounds of complaint in the petition against the defendant, in connection with this fire.

1. It is claimed that the defendant is at fault because it negligently omitted to provide the Jennie Brown with spark-arresters.

2. Because the exhausted steam was admitted into the smoke-stack, thereby intensifying the force of the draught, and that by reason thereof, and by reason of the absence of spark-arresters, the boat emitted or threw off large quantities of sparks and coals.

3. That the spouts or openings in the elevator on the river side were carelessly left open; and

4. That the elevator at the time was unoccupied, and negligently left without a watchman or other person to look out for or prevent fire.

The substantial charge in the petition is that in one of her trips the defendant "negligently permitted the steamboat to approach and lie alongside of, or in close proximity to, said grain elevator, and negligently allowed and caused long and strong draughts of escaped or exhausted steam to pass and rush into the smoke-stack of the boat, whereby large quantities of cinders, sparks or coals of fire were forced up through and emitted from the smoke-stack against the elevator and openings in it, in consequence of which, and of the negligence of the defendant in not providing the proper and necessary spark-arresters, and of their negligence in not keeping some person in charge thereof, and of their negligence in not keeping the openings in said elevator closed, the same took fire from said sparks, and from thence the fire extended to and burned the plaintiff's mill and property.

Digitized by Google

The defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that if "they believed from the evidence that the sparks from the Jennie Brown set fire to the elevator through the negligence of the defendant, and the distance from the elevator to the nearest lumber pile was 388 feet, and to the mill 528, then the proximate cause of the burning of the mill and lumber was the burning of the elevator, and the injury to the plaintiff is too remote from the negligence to afford a ground for recovery." This was refused.

Beach & Murdock, for the plaintiff; Cary & Upedegraff, for the defendant.

Mr. Justice MILLER orally charged the jury in substance as follows:

These three questions you are called upon to determine:

First. Whether the elevator was burned by sparks from the Jennie Brown?

Second. If it was so burned, was it in consequence of the negligence of the officers or men in charge of the Jennie Brown?

Thirdly. Whether the burning of the mill and lumber was the natural and probable result of the burning of the elevator?

As to the first—whether or not the elevator caught fire from the sparks of the Jennie Brown—you can determine as well as I can, and the decision of that question I leave with you without comment. In considering the other two propositions, I will commence with the last first. Supposing, for the present, that the elevator was burned down through the carelessness of the defendant, was the burning of the mill and lumber so connected with the burning of the elevator that the defendant would be responsible for it? On that point I have been asked by counsel to instruct, as a matter of law, that by reason of the space intervening between the elevator and the mill of plaintiff, the burning of the elevator would not make them responsible. The authorities are in conflict upon that subject—that is, upon what is called remote consequences. Now, in the case before us, it is said that while the burning of the elevator was the direct consequence of the sparks from the Jennie Brown, the burning of the mill and lumber was the remote consequence of the negligence of the defendant. I am not prepared to say this. I do not believe it is the duty of the court to take that question away from the jury, and I leave it with you, as was done at the former trial, to determine whether, under all the circumstances of the case—with the wind blowing; the inflammable character of the elevator; the combustible material of which it was composed; and on the other hand, the distance between the elevator and the mill and lumber, and from all the evidence and circumstances before you—whether the burning of the mill and the lumber by the fire from the elevator was a consequence usually and naturally to be expected; whether the burning of the mill and lumber was the result naturally and reasonably to be expected from the burning of the elevator, and whether the burning of the elevator was the result of the sparks from the Jennie Brown. If you find that the officers of the boat were not guilty of negligence or carelessness, then the defendant is not liable to the plaintiff; but if you find the contrary to be true, then it may be responsible for the loss of the mill and the lumber. The main point upon which this case turns, in my judgment, is whether the parties who had charge of that boat were guilty of such negligence within the meaning of the law as would make them liable for causing fire to the mill and lumber of the plaintiff. If you find that the elevator was set on fire by the sparks from the boat (and I will so suppose for the purpose of illustration), then was the conduct of the parties in charge of the boat at the time of the fire characterized by such want of care, or want of skill in her management, as to make the owners of the boat (this railroad company) liable for the burning? In the first place, I observe that the railroad company in this case stands precisely in the same position as if the boat was owned by an individual. There is no additional responsibility attaching because it was a railroad company, nor are they any less responsible because of that fact.

Two or three circumstances apart from the transactions of that day have been proved to you as showing, or tending to show, negligence or carelessness on the part of the officers in charge of the boat on the day in question. The first of these to which I call your attention is the fact of the steam of the boat being emitted through the smoke-stack. As Judge DILLON instructed the jury before, so I instruct you now. There is nothing to presume any negligence on the part of the railroad company in that regard. It is one of the usual, if not necessary, means for increasing the locomotive power of the vessel—for increasing the amount of steam. It is almost universal, and, I presume necessary, and no charge of negligence can be made against the owners of the boat because they permitted the steam to be emitted through the smoke-stack.

Another ground of carelessness alleged against the defendant not connected with the boat, is that the elevator (which was also their property) was not being used, and that it was a season of the year when it was uncommonly dry; that it was made of inflammable material, was left without a watchman, and that it was left with certain openings—places where the grain was taken in—called spouts; that these spouts for the discharge of grain were left open. Supposing this to be so, there is no negligence in this respect upon which the defendants are responsible to the plaintiff. Because they were not using the elevator at the time is no reason why they should be called upon to keep a watchman, nor is the fact that these spouts are left open a ground of negligence.

A more interesting question on the subject of negligence grows out of the question discussed here in regard to the use of the spark-arrester, which is an apparatus on the chimney to arrest the sparks. On that subject I hesitated a good while whether I should have to say to you that there was no negligence in that regard; that is to say, that the owners of the boat were not bound to use these spark-extinguishers or arresters. But upon further reflection I do not think upon the evidence I am authorized to declare, as a matter of law, that that is so; but I must leave you to say from the testimony whether in this respect the owners of the boat were guilty of negligence. Upon this subject it is proper for me to remark that the true test of care and diligence on one side and of negligence, which is the absence of diligence, on the other—a test which juries should apply, and which the law applies—is, what would an ordinarily prudent man have done under the precise circumstances which are here presented to you? The best test you can bring to bear is, what would an ordinarily prudent and careful man, who owned a boat like this, or any other boat like it, have done in regard to employing the use of a spark-arrester or spark-extinguisher? If prudent and careful men do not think it necessary, and have found it impracticable to use them, the defendants are not bound to use them. That is one test. Another consideration upon this subject is that in this day and time, with the elements of transportation used in commercial transactions and with the great bulk of material transported to and from this country, from the East to the West and from the West to the East, the use of steam power has become not only necessary but indispensable to the interests of the whole country. Steam is now used as the old Conestoga wagon, with six horses, used to be. The expense of using steam power is taxed upon the products of the country transported. Motive power, bringing it down to the last principle, is the generation of steam, which is the main item of expense in transportation. Therefore, you are to consider how far the interests of the public require those using this great power to be restricted, and how far the good of the people require those making use of it to adopt means of safety and protection. If steamboats must adopt various apparatus, thereby increasing their expenses, they must charge them upon the products of the country transported by them. On the other hand, if they can dispense with such things without too great danger, it is to the interest of the people for them to do it. But they should adopt such means as may be useful for the protection of property and persons. Under all the circumstances, you are to consider what has been found to be generally used by prudent and careful men, in the management of vessels and steam power; the general usage; the experiments made, and the opinions of those who have used the spark-extinguisher; and you are to say, under all the circumstances, whether there was any duty imposed upon the defendants to have a spark-extinguisher on their vessel at the time this fire occurred.

Digitized by Google

Now, gentlemen, you come to the main question, whether, in point of fact, in the management of that vessel on that day, and under the circumstances, there was any negligence on the part of the officers having charge of the boat? Upon that subject I do not know of any test better than that I have already given you. If you find the defendant was using such care as ordinarily prudent men would have used under like circumstances, then there would be no negligence on their part. You are to consider all the evidence upon the subject, and also the entire situation; the violence of the wind; the inflammable material of the elevator; the nearness of the vessel to the elevator. You are to remember that these men had a right to go there; that it was one of their landing places; that they could not go directly up to their other landing place because another vessel was there. You are then to consider whether, in their attempt to get away from there, they increased the fire in their engines so that the sparks were unusually dangerous; whether it was prudent in them to use as much power and force as they did, or whether they used any force; whether the steam was got up in such a way that prudent men would have said: "We will stop this rather than go on; the danger is too great." You can consider that, or you can consider, on the other hand, whether they were doing only what was necessary to get off their barge. All this is for your determination, and there is no other rule but this simple rule, that while they had a right to use their vessel to get the barge away, to get up to the proper landing place, or up to the island, yet they were bound to have a due regard to the risk, to the danger that they might possibly set fire to the elevator and burn it, and not only burn the elevator but other men's property. If the elevator was burned on account of their carelessness and negligence, then they are responsible for the burning of this man's property as well as of the elevator, if you believe they were so connected as I have already explained. If they used due diligence and due care, then they are not responsible, although the sparks from the boat may have set fire to the elevator, and from that fire the mill and lumber were burned. Steam is a dangerous element; fire is a dangerous element; but people must use steam, and although defendants had a right to use this vessel there, they were required to exercise due care and prudence, such as an ordinarily prudent and sensible man would have exercised. Was there anything to put them upon their guard? Did they exercise due care and prudence, such as a careful and prudent man would have done? This is the gist of your enquiry.

The jury found the following verdict:

1st. We, the jury, find that the elevator was burned from sparks emitted from the steamer Jennie Brown.

2d. That such burning was caused by not using ordinary care and prudence in landing at the elevator, under circumstances existing at that particular time.

3d. That the burning of the mill and lumber was the unavoidable consequence of burning of said elevator.

We, the jury, therefore find for the plaintiff, and assess the damages at twelve thousand five hundred and two dollars and fifty cents. ($12,502.50.)

And the court rendered

JUDGMENT UPON THE VERDICT.

Power of a Federal Court to Disbar an Attorney for Contempt—Disbarring without a Hearing—The Remedy.

EX-PARTE JAMES S. ROBINSON, PETITIONER.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 14 (original), October Term, 1873.

1. Inherent Power to Punish for Contempts.—The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts; its existence is essential to the preservation of order in judicial proceedings, and to the enforcement of the judgments, orders and writs of the courts, and consequently to the due administration of justice. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject, they became possessed of this power.

2. ——. The Act of Congress of March 2d, 1831, entitled "An act declaratory of the law concerning contempts of court," limits the power of the circuit and district courts of the United States to three classes of cases: 1st, where there has been misbehavior of a person in the presence of the courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice; 2d, where there has been misbehavior of any officer of the courts in his official transactions; and 3d, where there has been disobedience or resistance by any officer, party, juror, witness or other person, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the courts.

3. ——. The 17th Section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, in prescribing fine or imprisonment as the punishment which may be inflicted by the courts of the United States for contempts, operates as a limitation upon the manner in which their power in this respect may be exercised, and is a negation of all other modes of punishment.

4. Power to Disbar Attorney.—The power to disbar an attorney is possessed by all courts which have authority to admit attorneys to practice. But the power can only be exercised where there has been such conduct on the part of the party complained of as shows him to be unfit to be a member of the profession, and before judgment disbarring him can be rendered he should have notice of the grounds of complaint against him and ample opportunity of explanation and defence.

5. ——. The Remedy.—Mandamus is the appropriate remedy to restore an attorney disbarred where the court below has exceeded its jurisdiction in the matter.

Petition for mandamus to the judge of the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Arkansas.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

On the 16th day of July, 1873, the grand jury of the western district of Arkansas reported to the district court of the United States for the district, then in session at Fort Smith, that they had made every effort in their power to have a witness by the name of Stephenson summoned to appear before them; that for this purpose a subpœna for the witness had been placed the day previous in the hands of a deputy marshal by the name of Sheldon, for service; that the deputy marshal, on the same day, went to the town of Van Buren, as he said, to make the service; that after he had left the witness was seen on the streets at Fort Smith, and the subpœna was, on that morning, returned unserved; that they had learned from evidence before them that the witness knew that a subpœna was issued for him, and had for that reason come to Fort Smith, "but," continues the report, "after seeing the attorney, J. S. Robinson, in the Nash case, very suddenly absented himself." The jury, therefore, prayed the court to issue an order that the witness, Stephenson, he brought before them.

Upon this report, without other complaint, the court ordered that Sheldon, the deputy marshal, Stephenson, the witness, and Robinson, the attorney, "show cause why they should not be punished as for a contempt."

Two days afterwards, on the 18th of July, the petitioner filed the response to the order of the deputy marshal. The judge than reminded the petitioner that there was also a rule against him, to which he replied; "Yes, sir; I know it and I am here to respond; I don't know what there is for me to answer. It," referring to the report of the grand jury, "says I saw Silas R. Stephenson. I do not know what the grand jury has to do with my private business in my law office," and was proceeding to reflect upon the action of the grand jury, when the judge said, "You must answer in writing, Mr. Robinson;" to which the petitioner replied, "The rule itself does not require me to respond in writing." Upon this the judge said, turning to the clerk, "It should have done so; you will amend the order if it does, Mr. Clerk." The petitioner declined to answer the rule until it was amended. The judge then said, Well, I will make the order for you to respond in writing now. Mr. Clerk, you will enter an order requiring Mr. Robinson to answer the rule in writing." Upon which the petitioner said, "I shall answer nothing;" and thereupon immediately, without time for another word, the judge ordered the clerk to strike the petitioner's name from the roll of attorneys, and the marshal to remove him from the bar.

Digitized by Google

This account of the language used by the petitioner and the judge is taken from the latter's response to the alternative writ issued by this court. The judge states at the same time that the tone and manner of the petitioner were angry, disrespectful,and defiant; and that, regarding the words "I shall answer nothing," and the tone in which they were uttered, as in themselves grossly and intentionally disrespectful, as an expression of an intention to disobey and treat with contempt an order of the court, and believing that the petitioner intended to intimidate him in the discharge of his duties, he felt it due to himself and his office to inflict summary and severe punishment upon the petitioner.

The order of the court disbarring the petition, made at the time and entered in the minutes of the court kept by the clerk, was declared by the judge to be erroneous in form, and afterwards, on the 28th of July, a more formal order was entered nunc pro tunc. This latter order recites the report of the grand jury mentioned above, the rule to show cause issued thereon why the parties should not be punished as for a contempt, amended from the original order by the insertion of the words "forthwith in writing and under oath;" and that the petitioner, having notice at the time that he was required to respond to the rule, "in a grossly contemptuous, contumacious, and defiant manner," in open court, refused to respond in writing; and then proceeds to decree that, for his contempt committed in open court, as well as for his contempt committed in refusing to respond to the rule, the license of the petitioner as an attorney and counsellor at law and solicitor in chancery be vacated; that the petitioner be disbarred from further practice in the court, and that his name be stricken from the roll of attorneys, counsellors, and solicitors of the court.

Before this amended order was entered, the petitioner, through counsel, filed a motion to vacate the judgment disbarring him upon various grounds, which were specified. After its entry a motion to set aside the order as amended was made, in which the petitioner adopted the grounds of the original motion and added others. The substance of the more important of these was, that no charges had been previously preferred in writing and filed against him; that he had had no notice of any charges; that the report of the grand jury contained no charge which he could be required to answer; that no rule had been served upon him to show cause why he should not be disbarred; that he had had no trial previous thereto, and had been denied the right of being heard in his defence, and that the court had no jurisdiction under the circumstances to render the judgment disbarring him.

The petitioner also set up, among the grounds upon which he would rely, that the sentence he uttered, "I shall answer nothing," was incomplete, and that he was prevented from finishing it by the action of the judge in interrupting him with the judgment disbarring him; that the sentence completed would have been, "I shall answer nothing until the order to answer the rule in writing shall be served upon me."

The petitioner also disclaimed any intention to commit a contempt of the court, or to act in defiance of its orders or authority at the time, and averred that he was not conscious of the conduct attributed to him towards the court. This statement was verified by his oath; but the motion was denied.

The petitioner now asks from this court for a mandamus upon the judge to vacate the order disbarring him, and to restore him to the roll of attorneys and counsellors. In his petition, which is verified, he refers to the proceedings of the court below, the record of which he produces, and states that in the interview which the grand jury mentioned there was no allusion made to the Nash case or to the grand jury, and that the consultation related to a totally different matter.

The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts; its existence is essential to the preservation of order in judicial proceedings, and to the enforcement of the judgments, orders, and writs of the courts, and consequently to the due administration of justice. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject, they became possessed of this power. But the power has been limited and defined by the act of congress of March 2d, 1831, 4 Stat. at Large, 487. The act, in terms, applies to all courts; whether it can be held to limit the authority of the supreme court, which derives its existence and powers from the constitution, may, perhaps, be a matter of doubt. But that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question. These courts were created by act of congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence, or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is, therefore, to them, the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted. It limits the power of these courts in this respect to three classes of cases: first, where there has been misbehavior of a person in the presence of the courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice; second, where there has been misbehavior of any officer of the courts in his official transactions; and third, where there has been disobedience or resistance by any officer, party, juror, witness, or other person, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the courts. As thus seen, the power of these courts in the punishment of contempts can only be exercised to insure order and decorum in their presence, to secure faithfulness on the part of their officers in their official transactions, and to enforce obedience to their lawful orders, judgments and processes.

If we now test the report of the grand jury by this statute, we find nothing in it which justified any proceeding whatever as for a contempt on the part of the court below against Robinson. No act of his is mentioned which could constitute within the statute a contempt either of the court or of its judge. The allegation that the witness Stephenson, after seeing Robinson, had suddenly absented himself, amounted to nothing more than an insinuation that possibly he may have been advised to that course by Robinson. There was no averment of any fact which the court could notice or the attorney was bound to explain.

Whatever contempt was committed by the petitioner consisted in the tone and manner in which his language to the court was uttered. On this hearing we are bound to take the statements in that respect of the judge embodied in his order as true, for the question before us is not whether the court erred, but whether it had any jurisdiction to disbar the petitioner for the alleged contempt.

The law happily prescribes the punishment which the court can impose for contempts. The 17th section of the judiciary act of 1789 declares that the courts shall have power to punish contempts of their authority in any cause or hearing before them, by fine or imprisonment, at their discretion. The enactment is a limitation upon the manner in which the power shall be exercised, and must be held to be a negation of all other modes of punishment. The judgment of the court disbarring the petitioner, treated as a punishment for a contempt, was, therefore, unauthorized and void.

The power to disbar an attorney proceeds upon very different grounds. This power is possessed by all courts which have authority to admit attorneys to practice. But the power can only be exercised where there has been such conduct on the part of the parties complained of as shows them to be unfit to be members of the profession. Parties are admitted to the profession only upon satisfactory evidence that they possess fair private character and sufficient legal learning to conduct causes in court for suitors. The order of admission is the judgment of the court that they possess the requisite qualifications both in character and learning. They become by such admission officers of the court, and, as said in ex parte Garland (4 Wallace, 378,), "they hold their office during good behavior, and can only be deprived of it for misconduct ascertained and declared by the judgment of the court after opportunity to be heard has been afforded." Before a judgment disbarring an attorney is rendered he should have notice of the grounds of complaint against him and ample opportunity of explanation and defence. This is a rule of natural justice, and is as applicable to proceedings taken to deprive an attorney of his right to practice his profession, as it is to proceedings taken to reach his property. And such has been the general, if not the uniform, practice of the courts of this country and of England. There may be cases, undoubtedly, of such gross and outrageous conduct in open court on the part of the attorney as to justify very summary proceedings for his suspension or removal from office; but even then he should be heard before he is condemned. (Ex parte Heyfron, 7 How. Miss Rep. 127; People v. Turner, 1 Cal., 148; Fletcher v. Dangerfield, 20 id. 230; Beene v. State, 22 Ark., 157; Ex parte Bradley, 7 Wallace, 364; Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Id.. 354. The principle that there must be citation before hearing, and hearing or opportunity of being heard before judgment, is essential to the security of all private rights. Without its observance no one would be safe from oppression wherever power may be lodged.

Digitized by Google

That mandamus is the appropriate remedy in a case like this to restore an attorney disbarred, where the court below has exceeded its jurisdiction in the matter, was descided in ex parte Bradley, reported in the 7th of Wallace. It would serve no useful purposes to repeat the reasons by which this conclusion was reached, as they are fully and clearly stated in that case, and are entirely satisfactory.

A peremptory mandamus must issue, requi ring the judge of the court below to vacate the order disbarring the petitioner, and to restore him to his office; and it is so ordered.

Mr. Justice MILLER dissented.

MANDAMUS AWARDED.

NOTE.—The federal statute of March 2, 1831, relating to contempts, was substantially re-enacted in Tennessee, and will be found, together with a long exposition by the supreme court of that state, in Thompson & Steger's Code vol. 2, § 4601.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE following statement is vouched for by a trustworthy correspondent: One of the circuit judges of Florida, while sojourning at a certain town in his circuit, became so inebriated that the authorities locked him up in the calaboose. Mindful of the high dignity of his official position, and with intent to support the same in a becoming manner, the learned judge issued a writ of habeas corpus, returnable before himself, directing the sheriff to take and produce his body, etc. The sheriff failed to execute the process, and the mayor having voluntarily released the prisoner, the judge imposed a fine upon the sheriff for failing to execute the writ.

—WHILE on this subject we may state that our valued Boston contributor, Mr. Sheldon, has just sent us the very interesting New Hampshire case of Gordon v. The Manchester and Lawrence Railroad. As the question is one of interest, involving the liability of railroad companies for failing to run trains according to their published time-table, Mr. Sheldon intended to make a somewhat exhaustive note to it; but he was agreeably disappointed in finding that the court (SMITH, J.) had so nearly exhausted the important cases on the question, as to leave him little to add. We may also state in this connection that we have received, through the courtesy of Mr. Shirley, the industrious and obliging New Hampshire reporter, advance sheets containing the head-notes of the great church case, which want of space obliges us to withhold until next week.

—APROPOS of the way the judges of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire write their opinions, we learn that in the great "partnership case," which will appear in volume 54 of the New Hampshire Reports, the opinion of Judge DOE alone was 284 pages in length; but that the learned judge, feeling that it is too long, is cutting it down. The pith of it is that as between partners themselves, sharing the profit and loss is no test of partnership; that as between themselves the partnership is merely a mutual agency, and the vital question is, what did they agree to do? We supposed that Judge EMMONS, of the 6th federal circuit, possessed more patience in exhausting important questions than any judge in the country; but since the advent of Judge DOE, we think he may fairly be said to be outdone. Perhaps it would be different if the immense business pressing upon the former allowed him equal leisure.

—WE learn with pleasure that Dr. Hammond, of the University of Iowa, is writing a work on the relation between the civil and the common law. We feel confident that no scholar in the United States is better fitted for the performance of such a task. The doctor has been "living wisdom with each studious year," until he has treasured up such a store-house of learning on this interesting subject that his book will be a rich treat to the scholar and lawyer when it appears. We hope the doctor will not think us guilty of an attempt to flatter, if we pronounce him one of the civilist lawyers in the country. He has diligently culled and gathered together one of the finest collections of works on the civil law to be found in the Union; and these he will no doubt diligently "press into service" in the preparation of his forthcoming book.

—THE following interesting question has come before the house of lords: "Whether, under the statute 20 and 21 Victoria, ch. 85, proceedings for the dissolution of a marriage can be instituted or proceeded with on behalf of or against a husband or wife who, before the proceedings were instituted, had become incurably lunatic?" The six law judges who sat as assessors to the lords were agreed that such a proceeding could be instituted; because, until inquiry and the verdict of a jury, the fact of insanity could not be judicially known; as to whether it could be continued, they were divided, four (one of whom has since resigned) being of opinion that it could, andthe remaining two taking the contrary view, and holding that while the insanity continued it operated a perpetual bar and stay of proceedings. The judgment of the lords will probably, though not necessarily, conform to the views of the majority of the judges.

—JUDGE WAGNER, of the Supreme Court of Missouri, is the fortunate possessor of a very remarkable memory. He never commences writing an opinion until he has entirely organized in his mind what he is going to write; and then the sentences crowd upon him in their appropriate order as rapidly as he can commit them to paper. He has been on the supreme bench of Missouri for ten years, and has never rewritten an opinion. So accurate are his mental operations that he seldom makes an interlineation, and those which he does make are generally slight verbal changes. Judge WAGNER'S mental characteristics afford a strong illustration of the fact that what is usually called breadth of intellect or comprehensiveness of thought consists simply in two things—first, ability to acquire a clear and well-defined mental image of any proposition, and secondly, the force of memory which enables one to grasp and hold in the mind's eye, at one and the same time, the united image of a number of distinct but connected and dependent propositions. This clearness of mental image and grasp of memory, favored by an abundant courage and an active temperament, have given to Judge WAGNER a style of judicial argument which has always reminded us strongly of that of Lord MANSFIELD. Right or wrong (and he is generally right), we never have any difficulty in seeing a thing clearly as he sees it. The boundaries of every question are distinctly drawn; the outlines of the image are clearly cut. The subject is not picked into fragments by attenuated doubts; and although he is no doubt sometimes wrong, as every man and every judge must sometimes be, yet his opinions possess this high merit—that they never can be twisted into the support of different doctrines or shades of doctrine. Whenever Judge WAGNER writes an opinion it means one thing, and that is clearly and unmistakably stated.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JUNE 11, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

For the case of N. A. Life Ins. Co. v. Wilson, which we publish in this number, and the interesting note appended thereto, we are indebted to our Boston contributor, Henry N. Sheldon, Esq.

The Prejudice against Lawyers.

The Albany Law Journal says: "The Milwaukee Journal of Commerce, having published a double-leaded editorial on the subject of 'too much lawyer' element in the government, in which the lawyer was represented as an embodiment of corruptibility, self-debasement and cupidity, Mr. J. A. Cartright, of Nashville, writes to that journal a very vigorous and straight forward letter, calling attention, among other things, to the fact that lawyers have occupied more positions of honor and emolument in our government than any other class of people, and, taking into consideration the advantage and opportunities for fraud and dishonesty, have, as a class, come out with clean hands and less money. It might be an interesting and profitable task for some of these editors, who are so fond of assailing the legal profession, to make a list of the embezzlers of public and private moneys and the defrauders of the government during the past few years, and note how many of them are lawyers."

Although the prejudice against lawyers has seized upon minds eminent in other walks of life, yet it is in truth a vulgar and ignorant prejudice; and the fact that learned men (we do not speak of the Wisconsin editor) have sometimes fallen into it, serves only to show that learning has its bigotry no less than ignorance. Those of the masses whom this prejudice possesses most intensely have generally the justest foundation for it; for, following the natural disposition of the human mind to generalize, they naturally judge all lawyers by those with whom necessity has generally thrown them in contact—by the pettifogger and police-court shyster who have generally represented them in the transaction of their legal business. On the other hand, it may be claimed, to the eternal honor of our profession, that it has never been held in as great abhorrence by any class of men as by the military tyrants who, by the wanton exercise of arbitrary power, have subdued at once the liberties and the laws of mankind. Gibbon has shown us two striking examples of this in the fate of those two great fathers of the civil law, Papinian and Ulpian. "During the last seven years of Severus," says the great historian, "he [Papinian] had exercised the most important offices of the state, and, by his salutary influence, guided the emperor's steps in the paths of justice and moderation. In full assurance of his virtues and abilities, Severus, on his death-bed, had conjured him to watch over the prosperity and unity of the imperial family. The honest labors of Papinian served only to inflame the hatred which Caracalla had already conceived against his father's minister. After the murder of Geta, the præfect was commanded to exert the powers of his skill and eloquence in a studious apology for that atrocious deed. The philosophic Seneca had condescended to compose a similar epistle to the senate, in the name of the son and assassin of Agrippina. 'That it was easier to commit than to justify parricide,' was the glorious reply of Papinian, who did not hesitate between the loss of life and that of honor. Such intrepid virtue, which had escaped pure and unsullied from the intrigues of courts, the habits of business, and the arts of his profession, reflects more lustre on the memory of Papinian than all his great employments, his numerous writings, and the superior reputation as a lawyer which he has preserved through every age of the Roman jurisprudence." The assassination by the the Prætorian rabble of the great Ulpian, whose only crime had been upholding the laws against the encroachments of a licentious soldiery, is thus related (though perhaps with some inaccuracy) by the same hand: "Their præfect, the wise Ulpian, was the friend of the laws and of the people; he was considered as the enemy of the soldiers, and to his pernicious counsel every scheme of reformation was imputed. Some trifling accident blew up their discontent into a furious mutiny; and a civil war raged during three days in Rome, whilst the life of that excellent minister was defended by the grateful people. Terrified at length by the sight of some houses in flames, and by the threats of a general conflagration, the people yielded with a sigh, and left the virtuous but unfortunate Ulpian to his fate. He was pursued into the imperial palace and massacred at the feet of his master, who vainly strove to cover him with the purple and to obtain his pardon from the inexorable soldiers."

Whilst the members of that other great profession, divinity, can claim no such honor; whilst the priest has been in every age the willing tool and coadjutor of the tyrant; whilst the terrors of superstition and the power of the sword have gone hand in hand in the enslavement and degradation of mankind; and whilst it must be confessed that lawyers have often been the subservient tools of tyrants, yet in the main the legal profession has exerted its great influence on the side of liberty and civil order. The judges of England have so hedged about with barriers and restrictions the prerogatives of the British crown, that the sovereign of those islands is a sovereign only in name. And in our own time and country, although there have been instances where the judiciary has been prostituted to base and partisan purposes, yet in the main the influence of the bar and the functions of the bench have been exerted to alleviate the miseries consequent upon a great civil war; to prevent any judicial massacres for treason; to allay an impending threat of wholesale confiscation; to arrest the operation of ex post facto laws passed by heated and partisan legislatures; to uphold the guaranties of the constitution, and to stay the encroachments of the military power.

It scarcely needs arguments to prove that neither civilization nor public order can exist without lawyers. The old saw about the jack of all trades being good in none, is familiar to every one. No science, no system of knowledge—not even the knowledge of a trade—can be perpetuated without the existence of a separate class of minds devoted exclusively to the study and cultivation of that science or trade. Law being necessary to society, lawyers are equally so; for without lawyers the law must perish, as the Roman jurisprudence perished during the night of the middle ages. The talk of dis-establishing lawyers, then, is the idlest gabble. If it were possible to turn all the lawyers out of the legislatures and send the last one down from the judgment-seat, and to install farmers, mechanics and merchants exclusively in their stead, the rights of life and property would become as uncertain as the whim of each ignorant legislature or magistrate, and society would be resolved into anarchy. We are in favor of disestablishing the kind of lawyers to which the Wisconsin editor may have referred—the shyster, the betrayer of clients, and the plunderer of the widow and orphan; but every member of society is interested in upholding the honest and diligent lawyer, for by doing so he upholds the law itself.

Digitized by Google

The Supreme Court of Iowa—Its "Inner Temple" Practice.

Subjoined we print the material part of a very interesting article under the above title in the Western Jurist for May, written, no doubt, by Chief Justice COLE. A Missouri correspondent, in calling our attention to this article, writes that it would seem that the judges of the Supreme Court of Missouri do not consult with reference to the causes heard by them until the opinions of the judges to whom causes have been assigned have been written. We have no means of knowing the manner in which the judges of the Supreme Court of Missouri prepare their opinions; and it would be obviously improper for us to make any suggestions to them, or to any other court, on the subject, unless it were to commend to their attention the manner pursued by the Supreme Court of Iowa. If we were called upon to name in the order of their importance the four causes which contribute most to give character and standing to the labors of a court of last resort, we should name first, the ability, learning and industry of the judges themselves; secondly, the manner in which they prepare their opinions; thirdly, the assistance afforded them by an able and upright bar; and lastly, the manner in which the decisions are reported. Next to the ability of the judges of that court themselves, we believe that the high character which the reports of the Supreme Court of Iowa have attained throughout the country is chiefly due to the severe and laborious habits of the judges in arguing and determining every cause in consultation before the opinion is written. The evil of the other mode is said to have been strikingly illustrated by the present Supreme Court of Tennessee. This court consists of six judges, and they are empowered by law, when their docket is crowded, to sit in two sections, but are required to consult together upon each case before determining it. This, it seems, they sometimes neglected to do; and the evil of the habit practiced by judges to whom causes were assigned, of writing their opinions before there had been a consultation, did not alarm the bar until one section began to overrule the other! And then the bar, instead of making a respectful and united representation to the court in regard to the matter, contented themselves with anonymous communications made by one or two of their members in the newspapers. Although we have been obliged to take the above statement from one of those anonymous communications, written over the signature of "REFORM," in the Memphis Avalanche of December 28, 1873, yet we happen to know that the writer stands exceptionally high, both as a lawyer and a gentleman; and besides, the charge is so specifically made, and fortified by a citation of the cases, that we do not doubt that there must have been substantial truth in it. The writer above alluded to also charged that the Supreme Court of Tennessee overrules itself from session to session. He says:

"There have been four decisions on the effect of the comptroller's statement upon the accounts of tax collectors, the question being a single one, to-wit, whether such statement was conclusive or prima facie against a collector when sued at the instance of the state. Now, one would suppose that there could hardly be a moment for hesitation on the subject. An abitrary rule, that the statement of the comptroller should be infallible, conclusive, and bind the collector against the truth, to a liability he has not incurred, would seem to be so monstrous that common sense would shrink from the supposition that such could be law.

"Nevertheless, in the archives of the supreme court of this state there are two decisions ruling the statement to be conclusive, and two ruling it to be prima facie. If these four decisions were converted into a team of horses, drawing the car of justice, two of them would appear to be jet black and two of them milk white, yet all foaled of the same ancestors. If this would be a curiosity in 'animated nature,' what must it be in the science of judicature? When like—that is, reason and law—is said to produce like, that is, justice and equity, here there is a case where the court has overruled itself three different times on one naked question of law, and with unanimity each time, within a few sessions. Now if a real 'lawyer,' following these decisions, were to undertake to practice the old and established rule, 'stare decisis,' he would have to stand on his head and heels at the same time—a curious posture for a well-balanced 'lawyer'—and even in that attitude he would not be sure of a lien, as the court at the next session might reverse the entire position."

As we suggested before, it would be obviously improper for a single writer to presume to make suggestious to a court of last resort upon so delicate a subject. But while this is so, we think there is little doubt that the bar in its united capacity, either through a bar association or otherwise, may without impropriety do so. There can be no department of practice in the appellate tribunals in which the bar have a deeper interest. What advocate can feel safe in submitting the rights of his client to such a court on a printed brief—and many causes must be so submitted from want of time to argue them orally—when he knows that his argument may never be read by more than a single judge? And has not every litigant a right to demand that before his rights shall be finally passed upon, the machinery which the law has provided shall be exerted in the most effective manner in order to attain justice and diminish the probabilities of error?

But to the article from the Western Jurist:

"Under the present rules of practice in the Supreme Court of Iowa, the printed abstracts of the records and the briefs of counsel are required to be filed a certain number of days before the term, and before the day the causes are set for hearing. This is for the purpose of enabling the judges to obtain the abstracts and briefs in advance of the argument of the cause at bar, in order to enable them the better to comprehend and understand the arguments of counsel when and as they are made. The effort is made to read the abstracts always in advance of the argument; but by reason of the failure of counsel to file the abstracts in time, or by reason of the large records, or the large number of records filed, it is sometimes impracticable to have them read before the hearing.

Digitized by Google

"But however this may be in any particular case, the causes are always placed by the clerk upon the submission docket, of which each judge has a copy in the order of their submission. Each judge by himself reads every abstract and argument either before or after submission, and makes a memorandum upon his submission docket of the points involved in the case, and of his individual views thereon, and also of the result either of affirmance or reversal which, in his opinion, should follow. This reading is usually done before the meeting of the court in the morning, or after the adjournment of the consultation in the evening. After the records and arguments are thus read and examined by each judge, there is a meeting of all the judges for consultation upon them. These meetings are usually held every afternoon from two till six o'clock during the sessions of the court. The judges there in regular order state each a case as his reading has enabled him to understand it, and also states his views upon each point involved, and the ultimate determination, either to affirm or reverse, which he would make of the cause. Each of the other judges, in turn, then states his views and his opinion of the proper result. If all are agreed, that ends the consultation upon that case. If there is a difference of understanding respecting the facts, the abstracts and arguments are always at hand and are consulted to settle that difference. If there is a difference of views as to the law, the authorities are examined. Sometimes it happens that a day or two, or more, are taken by one or all of the judges to examine the law. But the case is fully settled by all before any opinion is written in any case.

"After the decision of the cause it is assigned to one of the judges to prepare the opinion in accordance with the result reached in the consultation, and it is an invariable rule that each judge shall take every fourth cause in the order it stands upon the submission docket. This rule is so uniformly and strictly adhered to that if one of the judges happens to differ with the majority as to the result of the cause, he must and does nevertheless write the opinion for the majority and also his dissent from it. This will account for several such opinions, which are really anomalous, to be found in the Iowa reports.

"If it happens that time is taken to examine the law in any case, and the consultation passes to the next case in order, nevertheless this case, in which time is thus taken, is then regularly assigned, but no opinion is to be written until the consultation is concluded and the result settled by a majority of the judges. So that no judge has any choice or knowledge of the cases in which he is to write opinions. It all depends upon the order of their submission. Ordinarily the causes submitted at a term are decided in consultation before adjournment. But if for any cause they are not, they are settled by correspondence or at the succeeding session.

"It will be seen from the order of the business during term time—the forenoon being occupied by the session of the court for the purpose of hearing arguments and receiving submission of causes; the afternoon in consultation, and the nights and mornings in reading abstracts—that all the time of the judges during the terms is fully occupied, and that it is therefore impracticable to prepare any opinions in the cases at the term of their submission. This work has to be done during the vacations; and it will be manifest, therefore, that the most laborious duty of the judges of the supreme court is to be discharged during what is called vacation.

"As the court convenes at the succeeding term, the opinions prepared in the causes submitted at the previous term are read to all the judges at their afternoon meetings for consultation. If the reasoning of the opinion is satisfactory it is approved, but if there are objections to it for its reasons, or because the language of it is too broad or is susceptible of misconstruction or misapplication, it is corrected or modified so as to harmonize the views of all if possible. When it is settled in its law and language, it is announced as the opinion of the court and becomes the law of the case. If a petition for a rehearing is filed by either party it is read separately by each of the four judges, and if serious doubts of the correctness of the opinion announced in the case is entertained by any two of the judges, a reply to the petition is ordered or a rehearing in full is granted. If another opinion becomes necessary, it is prepared by the judge to whom the case may fall in its regular order as entered again upon the submission docket.

"This method of disposing of the business of the court, while perhaps it is the most laborious for the judges, has been found the most satisfactory of any ever adopted by the court, because it secures the careful examination and actual individual approval of each case by each of the four judges."

The Right to Keep and Bear Arms for Private and Public Defence.

[CONTINUED.]

3. A third question is, whether the natural right of self-defence will under any circumstances justify the carrying of a particular weapon, and in a particular manner, when such carrying is forbidden by statute. "In reason," says Mr. Bishop, "there may be circumstances in which the right of self-defence will justify the carrying of a concealed weapon for the purpose; and should such a case arise (and it must be an extreme one, out of the ordinary course of things, or it could not arise), doubtless this should be held to be an exception, engrafted by the common law upon the general terms of the statute." Bish. Stat. Crimes, § 789. This view would seem to be entirely consistent with reason, and unavoidable. When we reflect on the question of what is termed the right of self-defence, we shall see that it is a most comprehensive right; that it is one and the same thing with the right to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," which our fathers asserted in the Declaration of Independence. It would seem to follow from what has been said upon the subject by various writers that while society may regulate this right of self-defence so as to promote the safety and good of its members, yet any law which should attempt to take it away, or materially abridge it, would be the grossest and most odious form of tyranny. Thus, Sir Michael Foster says: "The right of self-defence in these cases [cases of felonious attacks upon person, habitation, or property] is founded in the law of nature, and is not, nor can be, superseded by any law of society; for, before societies were formed, * * * the right of self-defence resided in individuals; it could not reside elsewhere; and since, in cases of necessity, individuals incorporated into society cannot resort for protection to the law of society, that law with great propriety and strict justice, considereth them as still in that instance under the protection of the law of nature." (Foster Crown Law, 273-4. See also 2 Rutherforth's Institutes, ch. 16; Grotius' De Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. 2 cap. 1; Gray v. Coombs, 7 J. J. Marshall, 478; Isaacs v. State, 25 Tex. 174; Com. v. Riley, Thacher's Crim. Cas. 471; United States v. Holmes, 1 Wallace, Jr. 1.) It is within common experience that there are circumstances under which to disarm a citizen would be to leave his life at the mercy of a treacherous and plotting enemy. If such a state of facts were clearly proven, it is obvious that it would be contrary to all our notions of right and justice to punish the carrying of arms, although it may have infringed the letter of some statute. To do so would be to make the law what it never was intended to be, an instrument of cruelty and injustice. Such a case might clearly be said to fall within that class of cases in which the previously existing common law interpolates exceptions upon subsequently enacted statutes. See Bish. Stat. Crimes, §§ 7, 123, 131, 141, 351-359, 362, 789.

Digitized by Google

Turning to the adjudications, we find it declared in one case, under an Indiana statute, probably the same already cited (ante, 260), that if a person, not being a traveller, carry a concealed weapon, he is guilty of an indictable offense, and his motive for carrying the weapon is immaterial. Walls v. The State, 7 Black. 572. A similar ruling was made in Cutsinger v. Commonwealth. 7 Bush. Ky. 362. But these cases do not help our enquiries, because the defendants did not claim to have carried the weapons for the purpose of defence against any threatened or impending injury, but, in one case, for the purpose of exhibiting it as a curiosity, and in the other, for the purpose of conveying it to another person.

In Hopkins v. Commonwealth, 3 Bush, Ky. 480, there was sufficient proof that the defendant, on a certain day, carried a pistol concealed about his person, and the defendant attempted to excuse the act by proving that he had been shot at by strangers more than two years before, and that "for precautionary security of self-defence" against a like attack, he had carried a pistol ever since. The court (ROBERTSON, J.) said: "These facts were wholly irrelevant, as there was neither proof nor cause for apprehension of any such impending danger; and, therefore, there was no error in refusing to admit another witness to the same facts."

Another ground of error urged in the same case was that the court should not have given the following instruction.: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant * * * carried a pistol concealed about his person, and that he had no reasonable ground to believe, and did not believe, that his person was in danger of great bodily harm, they should punish him by a fine," etc. To understand the force of this instruction, it should be observed that the Kentucky statute against carrying concealed weapons, in force at that time, made the carrying of such weapons lawful "where the person has reasonable grounds to believe that his person, or the person of some of his family, or his property, is in danger from violence or crime." Stanton's Code, p. 414. The defendant's counsel insisted that the defendant was rightfully the best judge of the necessity or prudence of carrying a concealed pistol for self-defence, and was the only person who could know whether he in fact apprehended danger; and hence objected to so much of the instruction as required reasonable grounds for apprehension. The court, however, did not see the instruction in this light. Judge ROBERTSON said: "Were this erroneous, the salutary law against the pestilent and alarmingly prevalent habit among all classes, and especially among young men and even boys, of wearing concealed arms, through false and cowardly pride, and through mock chivalry, might soon become practically a dead letter. A statute so beneficent, and so often and so easily evaded, should be vigilantly upheld and stringently enforced by the judiciary, for repressing a dishonorable and mischievous practice, which, licensed or unlicensed, leads almost daily to causeless homicides and disturbances, which would otherwise never be perpetrated; and to that end, the accused should always be required to prove that he carried a concealed weapon only for the purpose of defending himself or family or property against an impending attack, reasonably apprehended, and which, if attempted, would justify the use of some such means of defence. But the superfluous addition of the words, 'and did not believe that his person was in danger,' relieves the instruction from the counsel's criticism, and makes it more favorable to the appellant than he had a right to demand or expect." Although this ruling was necessary in view of the terms of the Kentucky statute, yet it is thought that it would be the same on general principles; for it is in strict analogy with that numerous class of cases which makes the fears of a reasonable man, and not the fears actually entertained, the test of the justification of the degree of force and kind of weapon employed in one's defence. (Selfridge's case, 1 Self-Defence Cases, 1; Sullivan's case, ib. 65; Shorter's case, ib. 258; and many others.)

In one of the cases in Tennessee, already quoted, Andrews v. The State, 3 Heiskell, 165, 188, there are considerable dicta on the question whether a man can defend himself against an indictment for carrying arms forbidden to be carried by law, by showing that he carried them in self-defence. While admitting the question to be one of "some little difficulty," the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court says: "The real question in such case, however, is not the right of self-defence, as seems to be supposed (for that is conceded by our law to its fullest extent), but the right to use weapons or select weapons for such defence, which the law forbids him to keep or carry. If this plea could be allowed as to weapons thus forbidden, it would amount to a denial of the right of the legislature to prohibit the keeping of such weapons; for if he may lawfully use them in self-defence, he may certainly provide them and keep them for such purpose, and thus the plea of right of self-defence will draw with it, necessarily, the right to keep and use everything for such purpose, however pernicious to the general interest or peace or quiet of the community. Admitting the right of self-defence in its broadest sense, still, on sound principles, every good citizen is bound to yield his preference as to the means to be used, to the demands of the public good; and where certain weapons are forbidden to be kept or used by the law of the land, in order to the prevention of crime—a great public end—no man can be permitted to disregard this general end, and demand of the community the right, in order to gratify his whim or wilful desire, to use a particular weapon in his particular self-defence. The law allows ample means of self-defence without the means which we have held may be rightfully proscribed by this statute. The object being to banish these weapons from the community by an absolute prohibition, for the prevention of crime, no man's particular safety, if such case could exist, ought to be allowed to defeat this end. Mutual sacrifice of individual rights is the bond of all social organizations, and prompt and willing obedience to all laws passed for the general good is not only the duty, but the highest interest of every man in the land. * * * We admit that extreme cases may be put where the rule may work harshly, but this is the result of all general rules—that they may work harshly sometimes in individual cases. By our system, however, allowing the attorney-general to enter a nolle prosequi with the assent of the court, there is but little danger of the law being enforced in any such cases to the detriment of any one; and if such case should occur, an application to executive clemency may fairly be presumed to be the remedy provided by the constitution to meet all such exigencies." The court, therefore, hold that the testimony tending to prove "that there was a set of men in the neighborhood of defendant during the time he carried his pistol and before, seeking the life of defendant," was properly rejected, because it did not appear what the character of the weapon was, and it may have been such a weapon as could not be properly carried at all, and if so, the testimony would be no defence to the indictment. Comparing the above with that part of this case which was quoted on page 274 of our last number, it is seen that it decides that a man may not, even in his necessary defence, carry, either publicly or privately, a dirk, sword-cane, Spanish stiletto, belt or pocket-pistol, but that he may carry such arms for his private defence as are adapted to the equipment of the soldier. Much as we respect the general views of the learned judge and the commendable desire to promote peace and public order which his opinion manifests, yet we do not think that either his reasoning or his conclusion on this particular branch of the question can be commended. It entirely confounds the right of arming one's self for private de fence against a threatened danger, with the policy of the constitution of Tennessee, which guarantees the right of bearing certain arms in order to educate the citizen for military duty. It a citizen is obliged to perform a journey where he is in danger of being attacked by highwaymen, or by assassins who seek his life, he may, if he have the arms used by a militiaman, arm himself with them;—we suppose he may even take a cannon along with him, if he have one. But if he have not, and cannot procure any of the weapons which are used in civilized warfare, he must go unarmed. Besides, in attempting to distinguish between the weapons which he may and may not use, the learned court descend into distinctions altogether too nice to be of any practical value. A belt or pocket-pistol may not be worn, but a "repeater" may. What is a large "repeater" but a belt-pistol, and what is a small "repeater" but a pocket-pistol? According to these distinctions, we suppose if the citizen have no other arms than an old-fashioned "pepper-box," he must needs leave it at home —to carry it to defend himself against the attack of a highwayman will be an indictable offence (and we don't know but it ought to be)—but he may lawfully carry a far more formidable and dangerous weapon—a cavalry-revolver, Colt or Remington. In short, before he may lawfully take with him any weapon for his personal defence, he must debate and settle in his mind whether such a weapon would be appropriate to the equipment of a soldier, and if it would, he may lawfully carry it for the purpose of defending himself; otherwise not. That such conclusions do not commend themselves to reason, need scarcely to be suggested. Nor do we perceive any ground for the distinction which the learned judge attempts to draw between the right of self-defence and the means by which that right may be secured. If the means are prohibited or withheld, can any one say that the right is of any substantial value? We think that upon this branch of the case the views of Judge NELSON, in his dissenting opinion, are much to be preferred. "I hold," said that learned judge, "that when a man is really and truly endangered by a lawless assault, and the fierceness of the attack is such as to require immediate resistance in order to save his own life, he may defend himself with any weapon whatever, whether seized in the heat of conflict, or carried for the purpose of self-defence."

Digitized by Google

In the principal Alabama case which we have already quoted, The State v. Reid, 1 Ala. 612, 619, the question, it will be remembered, arose on a constitutional provision which guaranteed the right to bear arms "in defence of himself and the state." The court thought that in view of that provision it would not be competent for the legislature to prohibit the wearing of arms openly, because "it is only when worn openly that they can be efficiently used for defence." And they also say: "We will not undertake to say that if in any case it should appear to be indispensable to the right of defence that arms should be carried concealed about the person, the act 'to suppress the evil practice of carrying weapons secretly' should be so construed as to operate a prohibition in such case." The right to bear arms when threatened with, or having good reason to apprehend an attack, or travelling or setting out on a journey, was subsequently recognized in Alabama by statute. Ala. Code, 1852, § 3274; Owen v. State, 31 Ala. 388.

In Texas, as we have already seen (ante, p. 274), it has been held within the power of the legislature to prohibit the carrying of all small arms, notwithstanding a constitutional provision similar to that of Alabama, guaranteeing the right to carry arms for the defence of one's self, as well as for the defence of the state.

Such appears to be the unsatisfactory state of the authorities on this branch of the question. On the one hand, as long as the machinery which society has afforded for the prevention of private injuries remains in its present ineffective state, society cannot justly require the individual to surrender and lay aside the means of self-protection in seasons of personal danger; and it will be in vain that the laws of society denounce penalties against the citizen for arming himself when his life is menaced by the attacks of wild beasts, of highwaymen, or of dangerous and persevering enemies. On the other hand, the peace of society and the safety of peaceable citizens plead loudly for protection against the evils which result from permitting other citizens to go armed with dangerous weapons, and the utmost that the law can hope to do is to strike some sort of balance between these apparently conflicting rights.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

—IT is said that for the first time in the state of Tennessee there has been an escheat to the state. The case is that of an administrator of an estate in Weakley county, and the amount is $26.50. There have been a good many cheats against the state in Tennessee as well as elsewhere.

Digitized by Google

Railway Regulation—Power to Compel the Union Pacific Railroad Company, by Mandamus, to Operate its Road as Required by Law.

UNITED STATES ex rel. HALL & MORSE v. DIRECTORS OF THE UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

United States Circuit Court, District of Iowa, May Term, 1874.

1. Railway Regulation—Union Pacific Railroad.—The act of March 3, 1873 (17 Stats. at Large, 509), gives to the proper circuit court jurisdiction in mandamus to compel the Union Pacific Railroad Company to operate its road as required by law. There must be jurisdiction over the company by service upon it to enable the court to exercise the power conferred by the act.

2. ——. ——. ——. Jurisdiction.—Whether the Circuit Court for the District of Iowa can acquire jurisdiction over the company under this act, quære.

3. ——. ——. ——. Suits by Private Persons.—Private persons who suffer damage and inconvenience from the failure of the company to operate its road as required by law may institute proceedings under the act of March 3, 1873, supra, without the sanction of the attorney-general.

4. ——. ——. ——. ——. Cases in which the attorney-general must, and in which private citizens may, apply for the writ considered.

A petition or statement under oath is filed in the court by Samuel E. Hall and John W. Morse, citizens of the United States, and of the state of Iowa, asking for a writ of mandamus to be directed to the Union Pacific Railroad Company to compel it to operate its trains over the whole of its road as one continuous line, from Council Bluffs westward, and to desist from operating its bridge over the Missouri river between Council Bluffs and Omaha as an independent and separate line or portion of its road. The nature of the statements made by the prosecutors, and of their interests, and of the particular duty which it is sought hereby to compel the respondent to perform, appears more at large in 2 Dillon, C. C. 527. The decision then made settled the mode of procedure herein to be in accordance with the practice at common law, and the counsel for the prosecutors or relators now move for an alternative writ of mandamus to be directed to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, commanding it to operate the whole of its line of road to and from Council Bluffs, etc., as above stated. A notice of the application was served upon a general agent of the company at Council Bluffs. No appearance is made by the company, but counsel in its interest have been heard to make suggestions against the granting of the alternative writ.

John N. Rogers, Sapp, Lyman & Hanna and A. V. Larimer for the prosecutors; James M. Woolworth and A. J. Poppleton, contra.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—On March 3, 1873, it was enacted by congress that the "proper circuit court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine all cases of mandamus to compel the Union Pacific Railroad Company to operate its road as required by law." 17 Stats. at Large, 509. This act is the basis of the present proceeding, and the proper practice under it has been already determined. United States ex rel. Hall et al. v. Union Pacific Railroad Co., 2 Dillon, C. C. 527. The question before us at this time is whether an alternative writ shall be ordered.

The relators' counsel have been heard in support of the motion for the writ; and in a matter of so much importance we willingly granted the application of counsel to be heard in opposition, although they do not enter an appearance for the respondent.

Two leading objections have been urged against awarding the writ. The one relates to the jurisdiction of the court over the company, the other to the form of the proceeding.

Whether the Circuit Court for the District of Iowa is the "proper circuit court" to hear and determine the case made by the relators need not, and perhaps cannot, now be determined. If the writ be awarded, but cannot be served on the respondent, so as to give the court jurisdiction over it, then, unless there is a voluntary appearance, the proceeding will necessarily fail. The petition or information sets out that the eastern terminus of the respondent's road is in this state; and we are not prepared now to say, as a matter of law arising from statutes of which we take judicial notice, that it appears that in no event can this court obtain jurisdiction under the act of 1873 over the company to compel it to operate its road as required by law. If it were admitted or appeared that no part of the road was in the district, and that the company had no principal place of business therein, we might have the data, perhaps, to decide whether in any event this court could acquire jurisdiction over it. Under the circumstances we reserve the question as to jurisdiction, until we see whether the company appears, or until the character of the service of the writ upon it is known to us.

Whether the facts stated by the relator show a failure by the company to operate the road according to law, is a question which may arise on demurrer to the alternative writ, or on the return thereto, in case the court shall acquire jurisdiction over the respondent, but which we do not consider at this stage of the proceeding.

This brings us to the objections which relate to the form of the proceeding. It is contended that the affidavits should be filed or the writ moved for by the public law officer of the United States—either the attorney-general or the district attorney. In other words, as the duty here sought to be enforced is one which the company owes to the public at large, is one in which the relators have no special interest distinct from other citizens, it is maintained that the law officers of the United States have the sole right to apply to the courts to enforce its performance; and that private persons can only have or move for the writ and mandamus when it is the appropriate remedy to enforce some individual or private right.

The affidavit or petition on which the writ is asked states that the failure of the company to operate its road according to law "causes great expense and delay to shippers and passengers, and great damage and inconvenience to the public at large, and especially to the petitioners, who are merchants doing business in Council Bluffs, and who are constantly obliged to ship and receive goods transported over said road." This is the only special interest set forth by the prosecutors; and it was conceded by their learned counsel that the duty here sought to be enforced was a public duty, or at least one in the perfomance of which the relators had no more interest than any citizen who had frequent occasion to ship and receive goods over the respondent's road.

There is no legislation of congress specifically making it either the duty of the attorney-general or the district attorney to institute proceedings like the present; and so the question whether they must be instituted by one of these officers, or may be instituted by private persons, and the writ moved for private counsel, must be determined on general principles having reference in their applications to the particular nature of the defendant corporation and the particular duty which it is here sought to make it discharge.

The act of March 3, 1873, gives to the proper circuit court jurisdiction in mandamus to compel the road to be operated according to law, but the act is silent as to who shall institute or set on foot the proceedings. This is the more significant because, as respects other duties and supposed liabilities of the company, the attorney-general is expressly directed to institute the necessary legal proceedings to protect the interests of the United States. Act March 3, 1873, 17 Stat. at Large, 509; Act of April 10, 1869, 16 ib. 56.

There is, therefore, as respects the duty of operating its road as one continous line (which is the particular duty the performance of which is here sought to be compelled) no declaration of the will of congress as to who shall or may commence the necessary proceedings in mandamus.

It will conduce to a proper solution of the question before us to advert briefly to the character of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. It was chartered by Congress and aided by money and lands. It is a private corporation in the sense that its capital stock is owned by the stockholders, who are declared to constitute the corporate body. Both from the title of the incorporating statute and from express declaration in the body of the act (sec. 18), it appears that the object of Congress in chartering and aiding the company was to promote the public interest and welfare, and secure to the government the use of the road for postal, military and other purposes. The government has also a lien on the railroad and its property, to secure the bonds it issued to the company. By the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. at Large, 356, § 15), "the several companies are required to operate and use said roads and telegraph for all purposes of communication, travel and transportation, so far the public and government are concerned, as one continuous line."

Digitized by Google

Throughout the legislation of congress respecting this company, the fact is recognized that it sustains a special or peculiar relation to the United States in their political capacity, and also a relation to the people at large or the general public.

Now, so far as the company owes duties to the general government of a nature to be enforced by mandamus, it is clear that private persons cannot institute or set on foot the proceedings. This would be a duty devolved upon the attorney-general by express enactment or resulting from his station. Such is not this case.

And it may be admitted that where, as in the present instance, the duty charged to be neglected by the company is one which concerns the public at large as distinguished from the government, the attorney-general in his official capacity, alone, or on the relation of private persons, might file the necessary suggestion or affidavits and move for the writ.

But where the duty neglected is one which the company owes to the public, and where individuals who suffer from such neglect complain of it, must the court refuse the writ solely because the attorney-general does not move for it? Upon principle and authority this question must, in our opinion, be answered in the negative. By the practice at common law "the writ is ordinarily obtained on motion of counsel to the Court of King's Bench, at Westminster, during the term, supported by a suggestion, on the oath of the party injured (prosecutor), of his right, and of the denial of justice by the defendant, whereupon a rule nisi is made," etc. Tapping, 5. "The application to the Court of B. R., for a rule for a writ of mandamus in all matters affecting the public is ex dibito justitiæ. * * "Where, however, the right or power is of a private nature, as in the case of many officers, etc., in which the public are not primarily concerned, it is discretionary in the court, in the first instance, either to grant or refuse the application." * * "In general, all those who are legally capable of bringing an action are also equally capable of applying to the Court of B. R. for the writ of mandamus," etc. Tapping, 287,288.

It is clear that the affidavits upon which the writ is applied for may be made by any person cognizant of the facts, and those affidavits should not be entitled as of the cause, for none is yet pending, and the government only becomes a party in form when the writ issues. Tapping, 413; Haight v. Turner, 2 Johns, 372; People v. Tioga C. P., 1 Wend. 291.

So that the question is reduced to this: Must the writ be applied for by the attorney-general? and must it be refused in a case otherwise proper for it unless this officer makes or sanctions the application?

A thorough examination of the English books has satisfied us that it is the constant practice of the Queen's Bench to entertain applications by private persons, on the motion of private counsel, for writs of mandamus to public officers and companies to enforce the performance of public duties. This is well illustrated by the case of Rex. v. The Severn & Wye Ry. Co., 2 Barn. & Ald. 646, which, in principle, is analogous to the case at the bar. In the case just cited, upon the affidavit of a private prosecutor (Taunton) and on the motion of private counsel, without the presence or sanction of the attorney-general, the King's Bench granted a mandamus to compel the railway company to reinstate and lay down again the track which it had taken up; and the writ thus applied for was ordered on the distinct ground that the public, of which the prosecutor was one, and probably interested in the mines which the railway accommodated had a right to the use of the road. See also Rex v. Com'rs of Dean Inclosure, 2 Maule & Sel. 80; Rex. v. Bristol Dock Co., 6 Barn. & Cress. 181; Clarke v. L. & N. Canal Co., 6 Ad. & Ell. (N. S.) 898; Reg. v. Fall, etc., 1 Ad. & Ell. (N. S.) 636; Reg. v. Trustees, etc. of Turnpike Road, 12 Ad. & Ell. (N. S.) 448; Reg. v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 11 Ad. & Ell. (N. S.) 578. And on principle, where a statute enjoins a duty for the benefit of the entire public, why may not any one of the public injured by its non-performance complain of it to the proper court, and ask it to compel the observance of the duty? Why should such person be compelled to resort to the attorney-general, and what is the necessity or propriety for vesting in this officer, whose general duties, by reason of the peculiar structure of our government, are quite dissimilar to those of the officer of the same name in England, the sole power to determine whether a judicial inquiry shall be made concerning the discharge by a corporation of duties imposed upon it by law for the public advantage? What answer is it to the present relators to say, "Yes, you are required by the company's neglect to discharge its duty; but as your injury is the same as suffered by others, the court cannot hear or redress your complaint." But it may be objected to this view that if one person may apply and have the writ, so equally all may apply, and the result is that the defendant may be vexed with many applications, whereas if the attorney-general or some public officer can alone apply, one suit only of the same character will be brought, and the result will be conclusive, both as respects the public and the defendant. An answer to the objection is that the granting of a writ of mandamus is discretionary with the court, and if a case is pending which will test the right or question in controversy, the court may for this reason alone refuse to entertain similar applications by other persons.

Besides, it deserves consideration whether a judgment in a suit in which the attorney-general appears concludes the public to any greater extent than a similar judgment would in a mandamus proceeding instituted by a private relator, as in each case it is the writ which makes the government formally a party, and the form of the proceeding is the same.

There is some contrariety of opinion in this country whether private persons may be prosecutors or relators in a mandamus proceeding to enforce a public duty, but the decided weight of authority is in favor of the doctrine. The leading case asserting it is The People v. Collins, 19 Wend. 56, 1837, where the court, after an examination of the English decisions and practice, reaches the conclusion that in a matter of public right any citizen of the state may, where mandamus is the proper remedy, be a relator or enforce the execution of the common law, or an act of the legislature, though it was admitted to be otherwise in cases of private or corporate rights, where the title or right of the relator to relief must appear. To the same effect, see also Hamilton v. State, 3 Ind. 452; Ottawa v. People, 48 Ill. 233; State v. County Judge, 7 Iowa, 186, 202; ib. 390, 397; People v. Halsey, 37 N. Y. 344; s. c. 53 Barb. 547; State v. Rahway, 33 N. J. Law, 110; Watts v. Carroll Parish, 11 La. An. 141; Dillon Munic. Corp. § 695, and cases cited; State v. Turnpike Co., 16 Ohio St. 308. Contra, People v. University Regents, 4 Mich. 98, Sanger v. Comm'rs, 25 Maine, 291; Heffner v. Comm., 28 Pa. St. 108. Compare Comm. v. Meeser, 44 Pa. St. 341.

The right to institute mandamus proceedings by private prosecutors is likened, by Judge Cowen, to the right of private persons to become relators in informations in the nature of quo warranto,

Digitized by Google

People v. Collins, supra. In substance there is often much resemblance, but in England an information proper, that is, the suggestion upon which the court acts, is filed by the attorney-general as the appropriate officer of the crown, and unlike the affidavits in mandamus the information, cannot be made by private persons, though it may be and often is made upon their relation. While it is usual to join relators, it is not necessary. The object of joining them is that the defendant may not be oppressed without remedy, by vexatious suits, since the relators are liable to costs, while the crown is not. 3 Black. Com., per Lord REDESDALE, in Attorney-General v. Dublin, 1 Bligh, N. R. 312.

Reserving, as we do, all questions which concern the merits of the controversy, and in order, indeed, that the merits may be better understood, we think our discretion will be more wisely exercised by awarding than by refusing the alternative writ, particularly as in this way the opinon of the supreme court may more certainly be obtained than if the writ were denied.

ALTERNATIVE WRIT ORDERED.

Homestead Exemption—Absconding Bankrupt.

In re CHARLES C. PRATT.

United States District Court, Western District of Michigan, Grand Rapids, June 1, 1874.

Before Hon. S. L. WITHEY, District Judge.

1. Homestead—Absconding Debtor—Michigan Statute.—Under the Michigan statute which protects a homestead against creditors "when owned and occupied by any resident of this state," the homestead of an absconding debtor cannot be taken possession of by his assignee in bankruptcy if the debtor's family continue to reside upon it. In such a case the residence of the bankrupt will be deemed to continue in the state where his family reside, unless there is clear proof that he has acquired a residence in another state.

Joslin & Kennedy, for the petitioner; Norris, Blair & Kingsley, for the assignee.

WITHEY, J.—Pratt, the bankrupt, absconded, and was subsequently proceeded against by petition of a creditor and adjudged a bankrupt. The wife of Pratt presents a petition to have the homestead, which by the laws of Michigan is exempt "when owned and occupied by any resident of this state," set off to the bankrupt or his family. The assignee, assuming that the wife and children are not entitled to the exemption, has put a person in possession of a part of the homestead, threatens to deprive them of their home, and refuses to set off the premises as exempt.

An order to show cause has been served on the assignee, and the only cause shown is the homestead exemption statute of Michigan. The laws of Michigan declare that a homestead consisting of any quantity of land not exceeding forty acres, and the dwelling-house thereon and its appurtenances, to be selected by the owner, and not included in any recorded town-plat or village, or instead thereof, at the option of the owner, a quantity of land not exceeding one lot, being within a recorded town-plat or city or village, and the dwelling-house thereon and its appurtenances, owned and occupied by any resident of this state, not exceeding in value $1,500, shall not be subject to forced sale on execution, etc. Such homestead is exempt also during the time it shall be occupied by the widow, or minor child or children of any deceased person who was when living entitled to the benefit of the act. Every alienation of such land by the owner, if a married man, is declared invalid unless the wife joins in the conveyance.

The homestead in question was owned by Pratt and occupied by his family up to the time he absconded, and his wife and children have continued to occupy it since. The value of the premises is $2,000, on which there is a mortgage-lien amounting to something over $700. I have in another case (In re William F. Leavitt, a bankrupt, manuscript), held that when the owner's interest does not exceed $1,500 in the homestead it is exempt, subject to any encumbrance there may exist upon it. When the premises do not exceed in quantity the exemption, no selection is required by the statute to be made. Ownership and occupancy in such case are sufficient; the exemption attaches as a right unless waiver is affirmatively shown by operation of the statute. Such is, in substance, the ruling of the supreme court of the state. Beecher v. Baldy, 7 Mich. 488; see pp. 503, 508.

The object of the statute was as much to protect the wife and children as the husband. This is seen in the protection to the wife against alienation by the husband without her signing the conveyance, and in case of his death, the provision for the widow and children. This view is uniformly held by the courts.

There is nothing shown as to the intention of Pratt in reference to returning or not returning, nor do I think that fact at all controlling, but certainly nothing will be presumed in favor of a fixed intention not to return. He left his family in the occupancy of his home, and they have continued there. He may return. His residence is where his family reside, and where he and they have resided for years. He is the owner, and while his family occupies he may be truly said to occupy the premises. He is a resident of Michigan until he is shown to have gained a residence elsewhere, and while his family reside in Michigan his residence continues until the contrary is clearly established.

While the family remain in the state occupying the premises as a home, the exemption is secured by the statute, inasmuch as it continues to be owned and occupied by Pratt while his family reside on it; their occupancy is his occupancy. His claim of a homestead exemption will be presumed in the absence of a distinct disclaimer or some act amounting to that. Shepherd v. Cassidy, 20 Texas, 24; Goughenant v. Cockerell, ib. 96; Mills v. Boskirk, 32 Texas, 360; Lock v. Rowell, 47 N. H. 46.

The last case, 47 N. H., holds that where the wife and family continue to occupy, any presumption of intention to abandon from absence of the husband is rebutted. Other cases consulted, and aiding to illustrate and enforce the views expressed, are White v. Clark, 36 Ill. 285; Tilman v. Moore, 43 Ill. 169; Bonnell v. Smith, 53 Ill. 375; Booker v. Anderson, 35 Ill. 66; Pardee v. Lindley, 31 Ill. 174; Moore v. Dunning, 29 Ill. 130; Cox v. Wilder et al., 2 Dillon, 45; Bartholomew v. West et al., ib. 290; Taylor v. Hargous, 4 Cal. 268; Volger v. Montgomery et al., 13 Am. Law Reg. April, 1874, 244.

Should Pratt return, I think there can be no doubt he could recover the property from any one holding through the bankruptcy proceedings, and if so, the assignee has no power to sell or convey the property. My opinion is that the property is exempt as a homestead, subject to the mortgage encumbrance of over $700.

Let an order be entered directing the assignee to set off the premises in question as exempt to the bankrupt, and that he yield possession of any part of the premises he now occupies, directly or indirectly, to the bankrupt or his family; and that he report to the court within twenty days his action in the premises under this order.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

Action on Life Insurance Contracts—Who May Sue.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1874.

NORTH AMERICA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY IN REVIEW v. JOHN T. WILSON.

Life Insurance—Party.—One who is not party to the written contract of a policy of life insurance cannot maintain an action to rescind the contract as having been obtained by fraud, or recover back the money paid for premiums, although it was his life that was insured and he actually paid the premiums.

This was a review of an action originally brought by John T. Wilson against the North America Life Ins. Co. The evidence tended to show that in 1867 one Pierce, an agent of the plaintiff company, employed only to solicit and receive applications for insurance, solicited defendant's patronage for the plaintiff company, making certain representations about the company and about its policies which were claimed to be false and which are now immaterial. Defendant, by reason of these representations, took a policy in the plaintiff company purporting to be made to Wm. F. Wilson and Andrew Wilson, acknowledging the receipt of the premium from them, and payable to them in case of loss. All the premiums were paid by the plaintiff. Afterwards, the promises of the agent not having been observed, the defendant demanded of the plaintiff corporation a return of his premiums, and brought this action to recover them by reason of the false representations of Pierce. On these facts the court below ruled that defendant had no cause of action in his own name against the plaintiff in review upon the policy or for the premiums paid thereon, and ordered a verdict for the plaintiff in review. If this ruling was correct, judgment to be entered on the verdict, otherwise a new trial to be ordered.

Digitized by Google

GRAY, J.—The policy of insurance was made to William F. Wilson and Andrew Wilson, and payable to them. John T. Wilson, whose life was thereby insured, was not a party to the contract. Campbell v. New England Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 381, 400. He had, therefore, no right to avoid the policy on the ground of fraud, and even if the money paid by him for premiums was his own and not that of the assured, he cannot recover it back in this action.

JUDGMENT ON THE VERDICT.

NOTE.—In Campbell v. N. E. Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 381, referred to in the opinion, the policy was made payable to Andrew Campbell, the person whose life was insured, his executors, administrators and assigns, for the benefit of Margaret Campbell. After his death, suit was brought upon the policy by said Margaret, who was not his administratrix, in her own name. The case was tried twice on the merits, the verdict at each trial being set aside. Afterwards, defendants objected that the action could not be maintained in the name of this plaintiff. But the objection was overruled as coming too late. GRAY, J., said on this point (p. 400): "The conclusive reply to this objection is that the defendants, by their previous conduct of the case, have waived all right to take advantage of it. Whenever a defendant, without demanding judgment on a technical or formal defect apparent on the face of the writ, goes to trial on the merits, he is held to have waived such defect, and cannot afterwards revive it. This would apply to the want of such a seal, endorser, declaration, or service as is required by law, and even of the test prescribed by the constitution. Clark v. Montague, 1 Gray 448, 449, and cases cited. So where one of two joint creditors assigned his share to the other, vesting in him the whole beneficial interest in the debt, and an action at law was afterwards brought in the name of the latter only, and was referred to arbitration, under a rule of court, it was held that the non-joinder of the other was waived Austin v. Kimball, 12 Cush. 185. In the present case the plaintiff, though not the assured, was the person for whose benefit the policy was made, and was therefore the owner of the entire equitable interest, and might have maintained an action upon it in the name and without the consent of the administrator, or if the latter had collected the amount of the policy, might have sued him for the proceeds. Gen. Sts. c. 58, § 62; Grover v. Grover, 24 Pick. 261; Burroughs v. State Ins. Co., 97 Mass. 359; Gould v. Emerson, 99 Mass. 154. The plaintiff had the equitable interest in the policy, although not the title to support an action at law in her own name against the insurers. The objection now made goes to the foundation of the action, and if valid and seasonably taken would have rendered the other grounds of defence immaterial. Yet the defendants did not present it to the court on either of the first two trials, or upon the motion upon which the first verdict was set aside, or at the argument of the exceptions taken at the second trial. By thus repeatedly contesting the plaintiff's claim upon the merits, and putting her to great trouble and expense in proving her case, they must be held to have waived the right to suggest at the third trial, for the first time, a defect apparent upon the face of the writ and declaration, and touching only the name of the formal plaintiff." But if the rule has not (as in many states it has) been changed by legislation, and the objection is properly taken, there is no need of citing authorities to show that only the person who has the legal interest in a demand can maintain an action thereon. H. N. S.

—EUGENE L. GROSS, Esq., of the Springfield, Illinois, bar, and one of the editors of Gross' Illinois Statutes, a gentleman who stood high in his profession, died at his residence, at Springfield, of consumption, on the 4th instant, at the early age of thirty-eight.

The Great New Hampshire Church Case.

The following is the syllabus in the great New Hampshire Church case, which we have already alluded to, and which is no doubt destined to become one of the famous cases on the law of religious corporations. The title of the case is Hale v. Everett:—

1. Article VI, in the bill of rights of the New Hampshire constitution, while it empowers the legislature to authorize the several towns, parishes, bodies corporate, or religious societies within the state, to make adequate provision, at their own expense, for the support and maintenance of public protestant teachers of piety, religion and morality, does not directly, and was not intended to, and does not by implication, forbid the legislature to authorize such towns, etc., or religious societies, to make provisions for the support of any other religious teachers besides protestants.

2. Under Sec. V of part second of said constitution, the legislature is as fully empowered to authorize such towns, parishes, bodies corporate, or religious societies, to make provision for the support of any other religious teachers besides protestants, if they think it for the welfare or benefit of the state to do so, as it is by Art. VI of part first to make provision for the support of protestant teachers.

3. The third paragraph in Art. VI of the bill of rights, which declares that every denomination of Christians demeaning themselves quietly, etc., shall be equally under the protection of the law, and that no subordination of any one sect or denomination to another shall ever be established by law, was designed to show that, although the framers of the constitution had a preference for the protestant religion rather than the Roman catholic, and were willing to encourage the former as far as consistent, yet that they held the rights of conscience of both to be alike and the same. The same rights of conscience are quaranteed to all.

4. Articles XIV, XXIX, XLII, and LXI, of part second of the constitution, providing that the governor, councillors, senators, and representatives must be "of the protestant religion," were designed to require a positive and affirmative test, and not merely the negative qualification of not being a Roman catholic.

5. The right of holding these offices is a civil or political right, which may be surrendered to the government or to society in order to secure the protection of other rights (Art. III, bill of rights), or the government may abridge or take away such rights for sufficient cause; for though such rights may be considered as natural rights (Art. II, bill of rights), yet they are not of the class of natural rights which are held to be "unalienable," like the rights of conscience. Art. IV, bill of rights.

6. The rights of conscience, which are held to be not only natural, essential and inherent (Art. II, bill of rights), but also "unalienable," not capable of being surrendered voluntarily, or of being taken away or abridged by the government, "because no equivalent can be given or received for them" (Art. IV, bill of rights), are set forth and declared specifically in Art. V of the bill of rights; and nothing contained in Art. VI of the bill of rights, or in any other article of the constitution, was intended to conflict or interfere with, or to modify the declaration of the rights of conscience there made.

7. The term Christian in our constitution is used in its ordinary sense, to designate one who believes or assents to the truth of the doctrines of Christianity, as taught by Jesus Christ in the New Testament.

8. The term protestant is used in the same instrument in its ordinary sense, meaning to include all Christians who deny the authority of the Pope of Rome—Christians in this country and in western Europe being divided into Roman catholic and protestant.

9. But neither the term Roman catholic nor protestant is broad enough to include any who do not, nominally at least, assent to the truth of Christianity as a distinct system of religion;—a Mahometan, a Jew, a pagan, or an infidel cannot properly be called either a catholic or a protestant, not being a Christian.

10. The political or conventional use of the word Christian, denoting one who assents to the truth of the doctrines of the religion of Christ, or who, being born of Christian parents or in a Christian country, does not profess any other religion or belong to any of the other religious divisions of men, is the sense in which the word is ordinarily used in constitutions and statutes and legal documents, and referring to those commonly known as nominally Christian, rather than to those who, professing the faith of some particular church, are termed Christians, in the theological or sacred sense of the term.

Digitized by Google

11. But when the children of protestant parents, or those born in a protestant country, renounce that religion, and voluntarily elect and adopt and profess some other religion, they cannot any longer be reckoned or assumed to be of the protestant religion; and so of all the denominations of Christians, and all other systems of religion.

12. By the act of 1819 all power to build meeting-houses and to support religious teachers was taken from the towns where it had been placed by the law of 1791, and was conferred upon religious societies; and any religious sect, as well as any denomination of Christians, was authorized to form such a society.

13. Under the acts of 1819 and 1827, religious sects or denominations of Christians were alone authorized to form religious societies, and the limited corporate powers that were conferred upon them did not in any way take away or change their character as sectarian or denominational societies.

14. When a society of a particular religious sect or denomination is formed with a strictly sectarian or denominational name descriptive of the fundamental doctrines of the sect to which it belongs, it will be presumed that it was constituted for the purpose of promoting the vital and fundamental doctrines of such sect or denomination.

15. In such case, where a conveyance is made to, or a trust created for the benefit or use of such religious society, by its denominational name, with no other particular designation in the deed of the tenets or doctrines which it is to be used to advance and support, the denominational name may be a sufficient guide as to the nature of the trust, so far as respects doctrines which are admitted to be fundamental.

16. In such case, those having control of property held in trust for the benefit of such religious society may be restrained from applying the property or the use of it to the promotion of religious tenets and doctrines clearly opposed and adverse to the fundamental doctrines and faith of such sect or denomination, at the time, and immediately after, such trust was created.

17. Where the original trustees, appointed by the founder of a religious charity or trust, applied the fund to the support of certain religious doctrines, and that application had been long continued, and had always been acquiesced in by the founders of the charity or trust, a court of equity will not allow such application to be changed or interfered with unless such change is clearly required by the plainly expressed intention of the donor.

18. It is not the province of courts of justice to decide or to enquire what system of religious faith is most consistent, or what religious doctrines are true or what are false, in any case, and it seldom becomes necessary for courts to discuss or to examine the creeds, or confessions, or systems of faith of the different religious sects, in determining questions of law, except in cases where they are called upon to see that a trust or charity is administered according to the intention of the original founders.

19. A congregational society is usually made up of the church with which it is connected, and of those who worship with the church and assist in supporting the preaching and public worship of the church, and though the minister is settled by the society, he becomes the pastor of the church as well as of the society, and the society generally has no creed or published religious opinions distinct from the church; and to find what are the religions opinions of a congregational society, we must look at the creed or confession or doctrines of the church with which it is connected, which is the centre and foundation of the whole. This holds true of all who adopt the distinctive congregational polity, whether known as orthodox Congregationalists, Baptists, and others, or those known as liberal Congregationalists, such as Unitarians, Universalists and others.

20. In case of a division of a religious society or corporation where both parties still adhere to the tenets, doctrines and discipline of the organization, the property should be divided between them in proportion to their numbers at the time of separation.

21. Members who secede from a church organization or a religious society thereby forfeit all right to any part of the property, rights or privileges of such church or society.

22. Whether there has been a secession from a church or religious society is a question of fact to be settled upon evidence of the acts and intention of the parties.

23. Deists, theists, free religionists and other infidels, though they may be Unitarians in some sense, are not Unitarian Christians.

DOE, J., dissented.

Legal Education and the Present State of the Literature of the Law.

We take the liberty of reprinting from a report of the law departmen of the Iowa State University; understood to have been written by Dr. Hammond, the following observations upon legal education and the present condition of legal literature. It is somewhat long, but its perusal is worth the pains of every thoughtful lawyer. After showing by means of a statistical table the rapid growth of the law department of the university, the report proceeds as follows:

"The rapid and steady growth, shown by the figures above given, is certainly not to be attributed to any special effort on the part of the university authorities, since scarcely anything has been done for the school beyond what was necessary for its mere existence. Nor can the law faculty take to themselves any merit on this account, except that of a faithful discharge of their duties. The real cause of growth has been the widely felt need of better legal education than could be obtained in the older method, and the general conviction, among those best competent to judge, that the law school is as much of a public necessity as the schools which have long constituted the recognized means of entrance to the other professions.

"The grounds of this conviction are too many and too broad to be treated here. We refer to them, however, for two reasons: because they warrant the belief that the present popularity of the law-school system is not a mere popular caprice, a change of educational fashions, but is founded on and required by a great change in the law itself regarded as a science; and secondly, because they afford some valuable hints as to the course to be pursued in building up any institution of the kind.

"In the first place, law schools have become popular because the old method of study is felt to be no longer sufficient, owing to the change which has come over the law itself. When the custom of preparation for the bar by office study was first introduced, English law was a fixed and rather narrow system of rigid rules, contained in a few volumes of reports, the whole of which might, with moderate industry, be mastered by rote in a few years. Scientific methods and the study of first principles were needless practicing before courts whose only query was as to the points already decided by themselves or their predecessors. At the same time, the practice was so complicated and difficult as to require by far the larger share of the student's attention, and so technical and arbitrary that it could only be learned by practicing. The result was that the ancient schools of English law were neglected as no longer necessary; the student entered an office to learn by mere rote the technical part of the law, the hardest part of his task, and picked up its scanty doctrines and principles almost unconsciously while engaged upon the forms in which they were administered. If a deeper mind craved more insight into the science of jurisprudence than this course furnished, he must wait to evolve it for himself from his later experience, or else look to the civilians and writers on the law of nature.

"It should be observed, however, that there were exceptional cases, where the instructor collected a number of students and devoted a considerable portion of his time to teaching them. These, in fact, were the forerunners of the modern law schools, though the education given by them is often credited to the old system to prove its superiority over these very schools. Thus Sir Fitzroy Kelly, advocating the old system before the Inns of Court Commission, gave the following account of his experience of it. Any one can judge whether such education as he had in view would now most likely be found in a law office or in a law school: 'There were constant debatings, there were constant investigations and looking up of cases; and then the students, each giving his own opinion upon the case, and saying why he formed that opinion by referring to authorities; and then the barrister saying, my opinion is so and so, upon such grounds, correcting the errors of one student and approving of the course resorted to by the other. This was coupled with the copying of precedents and preparing pleadings, reading elementary books, and reading cases.' We know, too, that some of the best English treatises were prepared for the instruction of students, e. g., Mitford's Equity Pleading, Preston on Abstracts, Preston on Conveyancing. Possibly law schools might have been dispensed with if such teaching as this could ever have become common in offices.

"But now the student who enters an office to prepare himself for the bar finds himself left to his own resources as much as he was in the old-fashioned way, while he has an utterly different task before him, both in reference to the object to be attained and the means of attaining it. We will say nothing here of the practical difficulties of such a course as compared with what it might be in theory; of the temptations to idleness and mental dissipation; of the lack of companions and the stimulus of companionship; of the danger to his moral sense, of learning merely the arts of the profession without its lofty principles. We will suppose it possible for him to find an instructor fully competent to guide his steps, and yet without business enough to engross all his time and prevent him from being of the least assistance to a beginner when he most needs careful direction. Still, under the most favorable circumstances, the student will find himself in the same situation with any other man who should attempt to prepare himself for a trade, or business, or profession, to-day, with the means that sufficed for the same calling a century ago. This will be the case even in England or in the Eastern states; and here in the West the solitary student's difficulties increase while his means of overcoming them are still fewer and weaker. The books that are given him to read describe neither the law that he is to practice, nor its historical development, nor the elementary principles of all law, but the positive law that happened to exist when the author wrote, twenty, fifty, or a hundred years ago. Some of them treat only of English law, differing in countless particulars from that of America; but, singular as it may seem, these do not confuse or mislead the beginner so badly as most American treatises, which present no system that now exists or ever could exist in any particular state, but a vague and imperfect statement of the doctrines in which all or most of the states of the Union agree, mingled with exceptions, qualifications, and differences of opinion, beyond the utmost powers of his memory if not of his comprehension. All of them have been written to serve a purpose entirely different from his, and inconsistent with it, and they presuppose in their reader the very knowledge which he is set to learn from their pages. Instead of fixing his attention firmly on leading principles until these are mastered, they pass the settled law with the briefest possible mention, and elaborate only those doubtful points or questions as to the application of the law, upon which the practitioner is expected to consult them. Instead of discriminating between authorities, and guiding the student in their use, the most popular treatises rake indiscriminately into their net everything that has ever been reported, and are of no more use in the formation of a sound legal judgment than a dictionary would be in the formation of a pure literary style. Indeed, it is now generally understood in the profession (and too often accepted as inevitable) that the proper office of a text-book is to serve as a mere dictionary or digest to the reports. To the student they are often of more harm than service, and as a means of learning the law are not to be compared with a judicious selection and arrangement of the cases from which they are made up. But the cases can be so used only under the guidance of an instructor, and with access to an ample library. To the solitary student, in a busy office, the usual choice is to read text-books or do nothing. He must take their statements of the general doctrine and then learn for himself, as best he may, how it has been affected by the legislation and decisions of his own state. It is probably within bounds to say that every other rule he finds in a general treatise must have some qualification of this kind before he can rely on it in practice. When the fact is considered, in addition to the other defects of the method, it no longer is a matter of surprise that the learning of even well-read lawyers is too often loose, inaccurate, and not to be depended on without fresh study on every new point. The wonder would be if they learned anything accurately in such a method.

Digitized by Google

"But even with the best treatises and the most careful office instruction, it is doubtful if the old system could be kept up much longer, since the change in it has been chiefly caused by a change in the law itself. Even in England, where they have but a single line of decisions, and where a very learned bench and thoroughly trained reporters do all that they can to keep the law in manageable shape, the vast extent and variety of modern litigation have made it impossible to learn the law as a mere collection of decided points, and have set the whole bar to devising schemes of systematic study and the introduction of scientific jurisprudence. In this country the change is still more necessary. In the first place the American lawyer has to refer to all the English reports, and to two thousand volumes of our own besides; and when reports are counted by the thousand and cases by the hundred thousand, it is useless to think of learning them or relying on them as our fathers did. Not only the old system of learning law, but the old system of discussing and deciding law, is actually breaking down under the weight of its accumulated material. Nor is this the only difficulty, or the worst. We have nearly forty different courts of the last resort, each independent of all the rest in most cases, and yet all administering the same system, and making decisions that may be quoted to each other. To preserve the venerable theory of our law, that each case is to be determined in view of all the previous decisions on the same point, so that a single uniform or uniformly developed doctrine may be found in them all, is simply impossible among such a number of courts, especially when an equal number of legislatures are annually making statutory changes that affect the questions. It would be vain to think of harmonizing all the cases if every American judge were a Mansfield or an Eldon, and with the average legal attainments of our two hundred or more opinion-writers, it is scarcely less than absurd. Every lawyer knows that he can find a case in point for either side of almost every question, and what is still worse for the system, that even the cases which seem to harmonize present such an infinite variety of distinctions, such imperceptible sliding and slipping from one point to another, that it is fast becoming useless to rely on any authority whatever, unless it be on that vague and treacherous 'current of authorities,' or 'general result of the cases,' which commonly resolves itself into a kind of primitive equity, allowing the author of the opinion to decide in any way that his sense of abstract justice or his prejudicies may lead, and which seems fated yet to work as much mischief in our law as the analogous communis doctorum opinio did among the civilians under strikingly similar circumstances three or four centuries ago.

"It is to be noticed that there never has been a period when the common law was so devoid of system and order as now. Its founders and their immediate successors treated it, if not as a science, yet as an art of great technical refinement, and brought two departments of it into very complete system. One was the doctrine of real property, and the other that of the forms of action and pleading. As time went on, these served as frames to retain the increasing mass in some kind of regular form. Every new edition was tacked on in some way to one or the other, and the value of even such an imperfect classification as was thus constructed, is best shown by the permanence of both feudal doctrines and the common-law practice long after both had become very inconvenient. But of late the law of property has altogether outgrown the mediæval system, and in America, especially in the West, even its terms and categories have disappeared. At the same time, the common-law forms of action have been abolished, or so changed and simplified as to be practically new, with all the nice rules and distinctions as to personal property and obligations which depended on them. Both changes are doubtless for the better, but both have the temporary disadvantage of destroying at once nearly all the system and order that existed in any part of the common law.

"The only permanent and effectual remedy for this chaotic condition of our law, it seems to us, must be found in a thorough reconstruction, not of its substance, but of its forms and methods of classification, etc., upon scientific principles. We are aware that there is an old, deep-seated dislike, or rather distrust of 'scientific' jurisprudence among the English and American bars; we are conscious of it ourselves, and we still believe that it has been a great blessing to English common law, or, rather, to the peoples living under it, that it has been able to postpone so long a reduction to logical form. But no national law can postpone it forever and itself continue to exist. By almost the common consent of those best qualified to judge, the time has come when American law, at least, must be thoroughly sifted, analyzed, its terms defined, its principles established and classified. Some would accomplish the task at once by legislative codification; others, who, as we think, better appreciate its difficulty, would have it constructed into a science before it takes the rigid form of statute. Such a task cannot be executed by one man or a few; it will require the labors of a generation of thoroughly-trained lawyers, competent to to commence the work from the highest vantage-ground that has been gained by all that has heretofore been done in the science of law. And this we believe to be the work which law schools have been raised up to do.

"It is a common error, and one which shows itself within the profession as well as without it, to think of legal education as consisting entirely in a set of rules which are to be learned, and learned only, in the course of preparation for the bar, and practiced upon or applied afterward. Consequently the law school is regarded simply as a means of committing to memory, with the greatest ease and expedition, such a set of rules. (We have even had letters from persons describing themselves as law students, asking us to send them through the post-office all the questions necessary to be answered to make a thorough lawyer, with the answers, promising at the same time to come to us for examination and graduation when they had thoroughly 'memorized' the same!) There was some foundation for this mistaken notion when the law itself was regarded as existing only in such rules, 'prescribed by the supreme power in the state' to a mass of obedient subjects, but the two should be allowed to grow obsolete together. Such an idea of the law school and its course is as great a mistake as it would be to think of a medical school as a place where students are to learn by rote the names of different diseases and the contents of the dispensary. Such knowledge is necessary in both cases, but a professional education, both in medicine and in law, implies a great deal more than this. It must train and discipline the student for the peculiar kind of work to which the rest of his life is to be devoted. As the medical student is taught carefully to observe and distinguish different forms of disease, and to apply remedies with judgment and discrimination, so there are analogous precesses in the practice of law, in which the student should be educated before he is allowed to experiment on the fortunes and happiness of his clients. The diagnosis and therapeutics of the law are no more within the reach of untaught common sense than those of physic. The law school is a place where the student may learn to analyze a complicated statement of facts, and distinguish those that have legal significance from those that have not —to discriminate authorities and tell why one applies and another does not, or why one has more weight than another; to put a client's demand or defence in such a shape that he may be sure of having the benefit of all the law that is really on his side. In short, it is a place to learn the theory and the reason of all those processes which he is to employ in actual cases, that he may employ them intelligently and not by rote, as is too often the case with one who has learned them merely by copying or looking on in an office. Above all, the law school is the place to learn how to learn law during all the remainder of his professional life, since that is acknowledged now by all to be a task that can never be regarded as at an end. The actual amount of law acquired before admission is a matter of secondary importance, since, at the best, it can only be a very small fraction of all that is to be learned. The main point is to master thoroughly the art of learning it, as well as that of applying it to the facts. And these objects, in the condition of our law at present, as already described, can only be attained by strictly scientific methods."

Digitized by Google

Book Notices.

REPORTS OF CASES IN THE DISTRICT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES WITHIN THE SECOND CIRCUIT. By ROBERT D. BENEDICT. Vol. 5. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co. 1874.

This is the fifth volume of the series known as "Benedict's District Court Reports," and is of the same general character as its predecessors. The volume contains nearly 100 cases, mostly in Admiralty, Bankruptcy and Revenue. The opinions reported are mainly those of Judges BLATCHFORD and BENEDICT and the late Judge N. K. HALL. Some of the points decided are new, and most of them of interest to all lawyers who practice in the federal district courts. It is needless to speak of the ability of the judges named, and it only remains to add that we think the reporter's work excellently done.

FIFTY-SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE TRUSTEES OF THE NEW YORK STATE LIBRARY. For the Year 1873. Transmitted to the Legislature January 28, 1874.

From this report, which we have received through the courtesy of Stephen B. Griswold, Esq., the law librarian, we learn that the total number of volumes in the New York State Library, at the close of the year 1873, was 90,887. Of these, 66,253 were in the general library, and 24,634 in the law library. The increase of volumes during the year was—in the general library 1,767; in the law library 1,120. If we might judge of the value of the law library by the number of its volumes, we should say that Albany must be a paradise for lawyers and law-book makers.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW. Catalogue and Circular for the year 1873–74. Boston: University Offices, 20 Beacon street. Printed at the Riverside Press. 1874.

Among the professors and lecturers of this rising law school are no less than ten LL. D.'s, among whom we notice the eminent names of Dr. Francis Wharton, Dr. Edmund H. Bennett, Dr. George S. Hilliard, Dr. Henry W. Paine, Dr. Benjamin R. Curtis, and Dr. William Beach Lawrence. Among the rising men connected with the school we notice the names of Melvin M. Bigelow, A. M., author of "The Law of Estoppel," etc., and N. St. John Green, LL. B. (Acting Dean), who is now engaged in editing a series of criminal reports to be published by Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, of New York.

ABSTRACTS OF DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN, at the April term, 1874. Prepared by HENRY A. CHANEY, Esq., for and originally published in the Detroit Daily Tribune. Published by E. B. Smith & Co., Detroit, Mich.

This pamphlet, which the publishers have printed for gratuitous distribution, resembles somewhat Mr. Chaney's Quarterly Digest, except that the reasoning of the judges is given at greater length. It contains in a condensed form several important decisions.

Legal News and Notes.

—AN exchange says that Dr. Kenealy, of Tichborne trial notoriety, is in Ottawa, Canada, where he was the guest of Lord Dufferin on Saturday. He is there on business connected with the development of the mining interests of Nova Scotia. We do not see how Dr. Kenealy can edit his new paper, "The Englishman," and develop mining interests in Nova Scotia at the same time, but his is a great genius.

—TRINITY term of the English courts of common law opened at Westminster on the 22d ult., for the last time under the present legal system. Those American lawyers, and even authors (vide Powell on Appellate Proceedings), who have failed to keep pace with the changes which from time to time take place in the English judiciary system, will need to revise their knowledge of that subject again by the second of November next, when the new judicature act, with its sweeping changes, goes into operation.

—IN view of the approaching termination of the jurisdiction of the house of lords as the British court of final resort, in consequence of the supreme court of judicature act, which goes into operation in November next, Lord Redesdale is making strenuous efforts to have its appellate jurisdiction continued. To the objection that there might come a time when the house of lords would not contain a sufficient number of qualfied peers to administer the law in appeal cases, Lord Redesdale answers that certain judicial persons might be brought in to represent the law in the house of lords, the same as the bishops represent the church. Upon this the Pall Mall Gazette irreverently suggests that a tribunal which cannot discharge its judicial duties without the assistance of "judicial personages" from outside its own body, is no tribunal at all.

—HON. WM. A. RICHARDSON resigned the office of secretary of the treasury on the 1st instant, and was immediately appointed a justice of the Court of Claims, vice Justice MILLIGAN, deceased. After the damaging disclosures against him in the Sanborn investigation, affecting either his competency or his integrity, the country cannot tell which, the propriety and good taste of his immediate appointment to a judicial position will no doubt be questioned. His successor, Col. B. H. Bristow, of Kentucky, is a distinguished lawyer. He was the first solictor-general under the present organization of the department of justice. He left public life because it was more profitable to accept the attorneyship of the Texas Pacific Railroad, but finding the routine of a railroad attorney unsuited to his tastes, he withdrew to private practice. It is said that Col. Bristow always desired to be appointed attorney-general, because of the prestige as lawyers acquired by all who have filled that office for any considerable length of time, but the office of secretary of the treasury was unsolicited by him and accepted with diffidence. His nomination calls to mind the fact that another distinguished lawyer of Kentucky, Mr. Guthrie, occupied the post of secretary of the treasury under President Pierce. Col. Bristow seems to possess the same strong integrity and resolute cast of character which distinguished Mr. Guthrie. The latter is known on one occasion to have "put his foot down" and refused to approve a voucher, although directed to do so by the president; and the former is already making a rattling among the dry bones of sinecure clerks and incumbents of greater dignity who were mixed up in the Sanborn disgrace. We accordingly learn that some eighteen sinecure clerks have been dismissed, and that Assistant-Secretary Sawyer and Solicitor Banfield have resigned.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JUNE 18, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

WE desire to call attention to the letter of "PELHAM," from London, which we elsewhere print. "PELHAM" is an able and veteran lawyer of Boston, who is travelling in England and on the continent. He travels with his eyes open—sees things through the spectacles of an American lawyer, and relates with force and grace what he sees. His observations upon the confiscation of monasteries in Italy are calculated to impress us with a profound sense of the advantages of constitutional guaranties like those we enjoy, and to reconcile us to the rule in the Dartmouth College case. We expect the pleasure of laying before our readers other letters from the same pen.

WE are indebted to Mr. Justice COOLEY, of the Supreme Court of Michigan, for an abridgment of a very able and important opinion of his, which we elsewhere print, on the power of the supreme court to award a mandamus against the governor of the state. We should gladly have published the opinion in full, but Mr. Justice COOLEY modestly cut it down, sending only that part which relates more immediately to the question in judgment. It will be seen that it places the question on the broad ground that the governor of a state is the best and final judge of the duties which attach to his official position, and that any attempt on the part of the judiciary to control his action contrary to his judgment, with reference to those duties, would not only be an invasion by one co-ordinate department of the government of the functions of another, but that it would also involve the court in the position of rendering a judgment which it would be without power to enforce.

The Right to Keep and Bear Arms for Private and Public Defence.

[CONCLUDED.]

4. We shall take leave of this subject by briefly considering whether the second amendment of the constitution of the United States is restrictive upon the states. This amendment provides that "a well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." Mr. Bishop suggests that, "though most of the amendments are restrictions on the general government alone, this one seems to be of a nature to bind both the state and the national legislatures; and doubtless it does." Of the same view was the Supreme Court of Georgia in Nunn v. The State, 1 Kelly, 243, where the question was discussed at considerable length, and where a statute of that state was held in part invalid because in conflict with this amendment. In the three Louisiana cases already quoted, the subject was discussed solely with reference to this amendment to the federal constitution, and it seems to have been taken for granted that it is restrictive upon the states. State v. Chandler, 5 La. An. 489; State v. Smith, 11 La. An. 633; State v. Jumel, 13 La. An. 399. So in the Arkansas case, The State v. Buzzard, 4 Ark. 18, all the judges appear to have understood this amendment as applicable to the states; and Judge DICKINSON supposes it to pertain to the power possessed by the general government of organizing, arming and disciplining the militia. He says this provision of the federal constitution "is but an assertion of that general right of sovereignty belonging to independent nations, to regulate their military force."

This view of Judge DICKINSON contains the only plausible reason we have met with for supposing that this amendment is binding upon the states. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, expounding the early amendments of the federal constitution, leave little room to doubt that none of the first ten amendments apply to the states, but that all of them are merely restrictive upon the federal power. Thus, in Barron v. The City of Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243, 247, it was held that an act of the Maryland legislature, which it was alleged deprived the plaintiff in error of his property without just compensation, was not void as being in conflict with the fifth amendment of the federal constitution. Chief Justice MARSHALL, delivering the unanimous judgment of the court, said: "The question presented is, we think, of great importance, but not of much difficulty. The constitution was ordained and established by the people of the United States themselves, for their own government, and not for the government of the individual states. Each state established a constitution for itself, and in that constitution provided such limitations and restrictions on the powers of its particular government as its judgment dictated. The people of the United States framed such a government for the United States as they supposed best adapted to their situation and best calculated to promote their interests. The power they conferred on this government was to be exercised by itself, and the limitations on power, if expressed in general terms, are naturally and, we think, necessarily, applicable to the government created by the instrument. They are limitations of power granted in the instrument itself, not of distinct governments framed by different persons and for different purposes." This language would be equally decisive if applied to any of the first ten amendments. Again, in Fox v. The State of Ohio, 5 How. 410, 434, it is declared that the prohibitions contained in the amendments to the federal constitution "were not designed as limits upon the state governments in reference to their own citizens. They are exclusively restrictions upon federal power, intended to prevent interference with the rights of the states and of their citizens." "Such, indeed," said Mr. Justice DANIEL, in delivering the opinion of the court, "is the only rational and intelligible interpretation which these amendments can bear, since it is neither probable nor credible that the states should have anxiously insisted to engraft upon the federal constitution restrictions upon their own authority—restrictions which some of the states regarded as the sine qua non of its adoption by them." So, also, it was held in Smith v. The State of Maryland, 18 How. 71, 76, that the provision of the fourth amendment of the federal constitution which prohibits the issuing of a warrant, "but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation," had no application to the process of the state courts. Language equally decisive will be found in Withers v. Buckley, 20 How. 84, 90; Twichell v. The Commonwealth, 7 Wall. 321, and in other cases decided by the same court.

Digitized by Google

In view of these decisions of the only court whose interpretations of the federal constitution are binding and decisive, there would seem to remain no doubt that if the question should ever arise in that court it would be held that the second amendment of the federal constitution is restrictive upon the general government merely, and not upon the states, and that every state has power to regulate the bearing of arms in such manner as it may see fit, or to restrain it altogether.

The Right of Trial by Jury.

It will be remembered that at the last presidential election Miss Susan B. Anthony and some other women had the courage to offer their ballots at an election precinct in New York, and that they were accepted. It will also be recollected that Miss Anthony was prosecuted criminally, under some federal statute, for voting thus illegally, before the United States Circuit Court at Utica, New York, Mr. Justice HUNT presiding, and was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine. This fine she has petitioned congress to remit, and the judiciary committee of the house have made a report recommending that the petition be granted. They say that the presiding judge admitted evidence on both sides on the question of fact whether Miss Anthony did or did not vote, knowing that she had no right to do so, but that he afterwards withdrew from the jury altogether this question of fact, and ordered a verdict to be entered up upon his own decision, without allowing the question either to be argued or submitted to the jury, or the jury to pass upon it. The committee argue that "there certainly can be no graver question affecting the rights of citizens than this;" that the whole theory of trial by jury at common law consists in the fundamental maxim that no conviction can be had until passed upon by a jury of twelve peers of the accused; and that there can be no advantage in this jury system if a judge can order a verdict of guilty without any reference to the jury at all. They say that as a matter of law the judge cannot even order a verdict of acquittal, but can only direct the jury that in his opinion the case cannot be maintained upon the evidence presented, leaving to the jury to say whether they will accept his opinion. Therefore, "because the fine has been imposed by a court of the United States for an offence triable by jury, without the same being submitted to the jury, and because the court assumed to itself the right to enter a verdict without submitting the case to the jury, and in order that the judgment of the committee may, in the most signal and impressive form, mark its determination to sustain in its integrity the common-law right of trial by jury," the committee conclude their report by recommending a bill granting the prayer of the petitioner.

Referring to this report, one of our legal contemporaries suggests that "the committee seem to imagine that they have succeeded to the appellate jurisdiction of the house of lords." We do not concur in the spirit of this suggestion. Without expressing any opinion as to the propriety of the ruling of Mr. Justice HUNT (for we have no knowledge on which to base an opinion), yet we believe that if any judge has denied a person criminally accused the right of the verdict of a jury on the main issue of guilty or not guilty, it is the right and duty of the representatives of the people to express their disapprobation in a marked and decisive manner. Whatever may be said of the value of the verdicts of juries, the right of trial by jury is one which the people will not, and ought not, to surrender without resistance. Whilst we have no sympathy with that extravagant view of the right of juries to judge of the law as well as of the facts, which places juries above the judge, and advises them that they may make law to suit each particular case, yet we think that the final right of juries in criminal cases to resolve by their verdict the issues of law as well as of fact, ought not to be infringed. We lately saw an instance in a New York court of a judge falsifying his record by entering thereon a verdict as the verdict of a jury, they, at the same time, shouting "no! no!" That, however, was a civil case. If it had been a criminal case, the judge would have deserved impeachment.

We cannot part with this subject without quoting some admirable observations of Mr. Justice CAMPBELL, of the Supreme Court of Michigan, in the case of T. W. Hamilton v. The People, determined at the last (April) term of that court. Since the time of Judge GASTON there has been no American judge whose opinions in criminal cases better deserve reading than those of Judge CAMPBELL. In the case we are now adverting to, he is reported to have said:

"The power of juries in civil and criminal cases is the same in kind though different in degree. The practice of disregarding or relieving against wrong verdicts is largely of modern growth. Though they may be set aside, they cannot be reviewed or altered. And setting them aside as against law is a matter of discretion and not of right. An appellate court can only review the action of the judge, not that of the jury, and this, too, not by virtue of the old law, but by force of statutes which, though ancient, are yet later in origin than jury trials. The jury system is generally regarded as deriving one of its chief advantages from having the law applied to the facts by persons having no permanent offices as magistrates, and who are not likely to get into the habit of disregarding any circumstances of fact, or of forcing cases into rigid forms and arbitrary classes. It is especially important, where guilt depends on a wrong intent, to give full weight to every circumstance that can possibly affect it, and professional persons are constantly tempted to make the law symmetrical by disregarding small things. But it is necessary for public and private safety that the law shall be known and certain, and shall not depend on each jury that tries a cause. And the interpretation of the law can have no permanency or uniformity, and cannot become generally known, except through the action of courts. It may be fairly regarded as one of the best features of the jury system that the law, though interpreted by professional interpreters, can only be applied to facts through the understanding of ordinary men of average capacity, and usually including in this number some of very simple minds. By this process it is divested of all that would not be readily comprehended by all men. In this way over-nicety and technicality become less dangerous, if not absolutely harmless, and an apparent deviation in the verdict from the rules laid down is often no departure from the rules as supposed to be laid down.

"But if the court is to have no voice in laying down these rules, there can be no security whatever either that the innocent may not be condemned, or that society will have any defence against the guilty. A jury may disregard a statute as freely as any other rule, and a fair trial in time of excitement would be almost impossible. All the mischief of ex post facto laws would be done by tribunals and authorities wholly irresponsible, and there would be no method of enforcing with effect many of our most important constitutional and legal safeguards against injustice. Parties charged with crime need the protection of the law against unjust convictions quite as often as the public need it against groundless acquittals. Neither can be safe without having the rules of the law defined and preserved, and beyond the mere discretion of any one. We must construe the jury system like all other parts of our legal fabric, in the light of history and usage. It came into this country as a part of the common law, and it has been fixed by our constitution as a known and regular common-law institution. Like many of our best heritages from that source, we know what it is better than how it was devised, or (which is more probable) came into use without devising. We must look to the use as evidence of the law, and looking to that we find that the judge has always assumed to give the jury instructions upon the law. While there have been severe complaints and stern measures to secure them from his control on the facts, there has never been any attempt to abolish the practice of charging on the law. All the improvements in mitigation of the old system have gone upon the ground that the jury were expected to follow the instructions of the court. The introduction of reversed cases and criminal exceptions would be little short of an absurdity on any other theory. If there were any ground of complaint it would not be for wrong instructions, but for giving any charge at all. It is hard to deal with arguments which assume to qualify a system, and yet are not consistent with its uniform history. A jury system without a presiding judge who is something more than a mere puppet is not the jury system which we have inherited. If the charge is proper it can only be so because it is to be respected. If juries disregard it they may be free from personal risks, and in cases of acquittal their verdict is conclusive. But the power to do wrong with impunity does not make wrong right. The uniform practice and the decided weight of opinion is to require that the judge give his views of the law to the jury as authority, and not as a matter to be submitted to their review. And while we recognize the power of the jury to give wrong verdicts or disregard the law, usage and authority, warrant us in holding that such conduct would be an abuse of their discretion, which could only be palliated by such tyrannical and perverse instructions as their good sense should teach them could not possibly be true or just."

Digitized by Google

Railway Negligence—Consequential Damages.

SNEESBY v. THE LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Court of Queen's Bench, Westminster Hall, Hilary Term, 38 Victoriæ (February 3, 1874).

Negligence—Proximate and Remote Cause.—A herd of plaintiff's beasts were being driven at 11 o'clock P. M. along an occupation road to some fields. The road crossed a siding (side-track) of the defendants' railway on a level, and while the cattle were crossing the siding the defendants' servants negligently sent some trucks down an incline into the siding, which divided the cattle into two lots and frightened them, and they rushed away with the drovers after them. The drovers succeeded in recovering most of the cattle, but they were unable to recover six of them, which were ultimately found at between three and four A. M., lying dead or dying on another part of the railway; and it appeared they had gone along the occupation road up to a garden and orchard about a quarter of a mile from the level-crossing, had got into the garden through a defect of the fences, and so on to the line. There was no evidence as to when the rain had passed which ran over the cattle. Held, that, it being admitted that the defendants had been guilty of negligence which caused the drovers to lose control over the cattle, and it being also admitted that the plaintiff's men had done all they could to recover control over the beasts, and had not been able to do so before they were killed, their death was the consequence of the defendants' negligence, and the damage was not too remote.

Declaration that defendants were possessed of a railway and sidings, and of trucks for the conveyance of goods on the railway; that the sidings crossed an occupation road or level, and the defendants so carelessly and negligently managed their railway sidings and trucks that the trucks were suddenly driven down upon and against certain cattle of the plaintiff while they were lawfully passing over the crossing along the occupation road, without any warning having been given by the defendants' servants to the persons in charge of the cattle, whereby some of the cattle were divided from the persons in charge of them and were frightened and escaped to another part of the railway, and were killed by a passing train; and others of the cattle, being so frightened and divided from the persons in charge, ran along the occupation road to a place where the fences dividing the road from the railway were imperfect, and escaped through another fence on to the railway and were killed by a passing train.

Second count: That defendants were possessed of a railway, and were subject to the provisions of the railway clauses consolidation act, and certain cattle of the plaintiff were lawfully passing along an occupation road adjoining certain land taken for the use of the railway, and it was the duty of the defendants to maintain a good and sufficient fence between the roads and the land so taken, yet defendants, neglecting their duty, maintained so insufficient a fence that plaintiff's cattle escaped on to the railway through said fence and were killed by a passing train.

Pleas: 1. Not guilty. 2. That the cattle were not plaintiff's as alleged. 3. To second count; that the cattle were not lawfully passing over the said crossing. 4. To second count; that the cattle were not lawfully passing along said occupation road as alleged. 5. To second count; that the defendants were not subject, as to the said railway, to the railway clauses consolidation act as alleged.

Issue joined.

At the trial before the late Chief Justice BOVILL, at the Leeds Spring assizes, the following facts were admitted: The plaintiff, a cattle dealer, had sent a drove of twenty-nine fat beasts by railway for the Wakefield Wednesday market; on their arrival at Wakefield the night before, they were driven, about eleven, P. M., along an occupation road to a field where they were to be kept ready for market. The road crosses some sidings of the defendants' railway on a level, and while the cattle were crossing the sidings, the defendants' servants negligently, and without any warning to the persons in charge of the cattle, let some trucks run violently down an incline into the sidings. This separated the cattle into two divisions, and so frightened them that they escaped from the control of the drovers and rushed away. The drover went after them and succeeded in recovering most of the cattle, but six or seven of them were not found till between three and four A. M., when they were found lying dead or dying, on another part of defendants' railway having been run over by a train. Their tracks were traced from the sidings; and it appeared that they had gone along the occupation road about a quarter of a mile and had there got into an orchard and garden belonging to the defendants, the fences of which were in a defective state, and thence into the railway, where they were found. There was no evidence as to what time the train, which had run over the cattle, had passed.

On these facts the learned judge directed a non-suit, with leave to move to enter a verdict, the court to draw inferences of fact. A rule was obtained accordingly, on the grounds that the defendants were guilty of negligence, and also of a breach of duty in respect of the fences, and were liable for the death and injury to the cattle.

Digitized by Google

Price, Q. C., and Beasley showed cause. First, the death of the cattle was attributable to the defect of the fences. But the defendants were not bound to keep up the fences as against the plaintiff's cattle; first, because the railway clauses consolidation act was passed after the defendants' special act; secondly, because, if § 68 does apply, they were not occupiers of the garden and orchard, and, moreover, the defendants were not bound to keep up the fences as against the public. Manchester, Sheffield etc., Ry. Co. v. Wallis, 14 C. B. 213; Dawson v. Midland Ry. Co., Law Rep. 8 Exch. 8.

[QUAIN, J., referred to Booth v. Wilson, 1 Barn. & Ald. 59, and Ellis v. London and Southwestern Ry. Co., 2 H. & N. 424; 26 L. L. (Ex.) 349.]

Secondly, the defect of the fences was the proximate cause of the damage, and the damage was too remote from the defendants' negligence. There was a considerable lapse of time between the time when the cattle were frightened and when they were run over.

[BLACKBURN, J.—There was no evidence as to when the train passed which did the mischief. However, on the facts presented to us, we must take it that there was no negligence on the part of the drovers in looking after and endeavoring to recover the cattle. This is the case of a tort, but it is somewhat analogous to the case of insurance; and when a ship is taken out of control of the crew by a peril insured against, and is afterwards destroyed by another cause, still there is a total loss for which the underwriter is liable. The loss here is the same as if the cattle had fallen into an unfenced quarry.]

Lawrence v. Jenkins, Law Rep. 8 Q. B. 274, will no doubt be relied upon by the plaintiff; but in that case and the cases cited in it, the death of the cattle was directly attributable to the negligence in not keeping up the fence.

Field, Q. C. (J. W. Mellor with him), in support of the rule. If it be admitted that the plaintiff's drovers used due diligence in endeavoring to recover the cattle, and could not do so before the accident happened to them, the case is really not arguable; for then the negligence of the defendants' servants was the proximate cause, and the damage the natural result of the cattle being frightened. In addition to Lawrence v. Jenkins, Law Rep. 8 Q. B. 274, and the other cases already referred to—Anonymous, 1 Vent. 264; Powell v. Salisbury, 2 Y. & J. 391; Lee v. Riley, 18 C. B., N. S., 722; 34 L. J. (C. P.) 212, and Hill v. River Co., 9 B. & S. 303, may be cited. The last case is directly in point. There the defendants negligently allowed the escape of water which frightened the plaintiff's horses, so that they started on one side and upset the plaintiff's carriage into a ditch which had been negligently left unfenced by a third person; and it was held that the defendants' negligence was the proximate cause of the damage. But, secondly, the defendants were liable under § 68 of 8 Vict. chap. 20, for not keeping up the fence of the orchard and garden. [He was then stopped by the court.]

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that the rule must be made absolute. The facts seem to be that, by what is admitted to have been negligence on the part of the servants of the company, the cattle of the plaintiff, as they were crossing the railway on the level, were frightened and scattered, so that for a time the plaintiff's drovers lost control of all of them; they recovered the chief part of the cattle, but some were found killed on another railway. It happens that this was also the defendants' railway; and it appears that the cattle got on to the railway through a defect in the fence of a garden or orchard belonging to the defendants; but, from the nature of the accident, it seems to me that we may treat the case as if it had been the railway of some other company, or as if the cattle had fallen down an unguarded quarry. The question is, are the defendants, whose negligence drove the cattle out of the custody of the plaintiff, liable for their death, or is the damage too remote?

No doubt the rule of our law is that the immediate cause, the proximate cause, and not the remote cause, is to be looked at; for, as Lord Bacon says, "it were infinite for the law to judge the causes of causes and their compulsions one of another; therefore it contenteth itself with the immediate cause, and judgeth of acts by that, without looking to any further degree." Bac. Max. Reg. 1. The rule is sometimes difficult to apply; but in a case like the present this much is clear, that so long as the want of control of the cattle remains without any fault of the owner, the causa proxima is that which caused the escape, for the consequences of which he who caused it is responsible. Suppose, for instance, in former times a reclaimed falcon were frightened, the natural consequence would be that it would be lost altogether, and the person who negligently frightened it would be liable. The natural and proximate consequence was that it could not be got back at all. So, if you have lost control of cattle and cannot get them back under your control till they have run into danger and are killed, the death is a natural consequence of the negligence which caused you to lose control of them. It is the most natural consequence of cattle being frightened, that they should go galloping about and get into a dangerous position, and, being in the neighborhood of railways, should get on the line and be run over by a passing train, whether that of the defendants or not is immaterial. When once it is established that the cattle were driven out of the control of the plaintiff by the defendants' negligence, and that the control could not be recovered till they were killed, which was the natural consequence of their being uncontrolled, the liability of the defendants is beyond dispute. Lawrence v. Jenkins, Law Rep. 8 Q. B. 274, seems directly in point. The other cases, when looked into, do not go quite so far; but on principle there can be no doubt that the defendants are liable.

QUAIN, J.—It is well established that a person is liable for all the consequences of his wrongful act; of which the well-known case of Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892, 1 Smith, L. C. 417, is an instance, where a squib, having been thrown into a crowd, and having been hastily thrown away by two other persons and ultimately injured the plaintiff, the wrong-doer, the original thrower, was held liable. So, when the plaintiff's cattle got through a defective hedge, which the defendant was bound to keep in repair, and were killed, in one case by falling into a pit, and in another by the falling of a haystack upon them, the defendant was held liable. Here the defendants' porters, who were responsible for the proper management of the sidings and level-crossings, are the persons doing the illegal act, the consequence of which was the escape and death of the cattle. In a case of contract the question is very different. In tort the defendant is liable for all the consequences of his illegal act where they are not so remote as to have no connection with the act, as by the lapse of time, for instance. Applying that to the present case, I think the damage to the cattle was not so remote from the injurious act as not to be the natural consequence of the act. The injurious act was the negligence of the defendants' servants in allowing trucks to be suddenly shunted across a level-crossing at eleven o'clock at night, without any warning, so that the plaintiff's cattle were frightened. The place was very dangerous from the numerous branch railways, and they having escaped from the plaintiff's control, got on to one of the railways and were killed on the same night. These circumstances, I think, bring the case within the rule, and the death of the cattle was not so remote from the negligence of the defendants as to render the damages not recoverable.

ARCHIBALD, J.—When the facts are understood there can be no doubt as to the application of the rule that a wrong-doer is liable for all the consequences of his wrongful act. The defendants had been guilty of a wrongful act, and the important fact (which it appears at the trial was conceded) is that, although all was done that could be done, it was impossible for the drovers to regain control of some of the cattle before they were killed. The natural consequence of the cattle being frightened was that they should stray, and, so straying in the neighborhood of a railway, should get on to it, and, so lying down or remaining on it, should be run over by a passing train. Therefore, all is referable, as the proximate cause, to the original negligence of the defendants' servants.

Digitized by Google

RULE ABSOLUTE.

Mandamus against the Governor of a State.

THE PEOPLE ex rel. SUTHERLAND v. JOHN J. BAGLEY, GOVERNOR OF MICHIGAN.

Supreme Court of Michigan, April Term, 1874.

Hon. B. F. GRAVES, Chief Justice.
" J. P. CHUSTIANCY, } Judges.
" J. V. CAMPBELL, }
" T. M. COOLEY, }

1. Mandamus against Governor of State.—The governor cannot be compelled by mandamus to perform an official act, even though private rights of property may depend upon it. And this is so whe her the duty to perform the act is imposed by the constitution or by statute.

This was a petition for an order to show cause why a mandamus should not issue to compel the governor to issue his certificate that the contractors for the construction of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior canal had completed the same according to contract, and were consequently entitled to the land donated to the state by the general government for its construction. The governor appeared by the attorney-general, and raised the question of the jurisdiction of the court.

Judge COOLEY delivered the opinion of the court. After examining the particular case, and showing that it was doubtful under the law if the act to be done was not confided exclusively to the judgment and discretion of the executive, the court proceed to say that they are not disposed to decide the case on any narrow ground, if a broad general principle underlies all cases in which a remedy of this nature is brought against the governor, and would require the same decision in all. That such a principle is to be found in the apportionment of the powers of government between three distinct, co-ordinate and independent departments of government, is held to be clear. Each is independent in its constitutional action, except as the checks and balances estab lished for the protection of liberty make each a restraint upon the others. Having presented and illustrated this at some length, the court say:

But it is said that the act required of the governor is not to be done in the performance of an executive duty which the constitution imposed upon him, but is in its nature a ministerial act, provided for by statute, and which might with equal propriety have been required of an inferior officer, who beyond question could have been compelled by mandamus to take the necessary and proper action in the premises. And the question is put with some emphasis whether, where individual interests depend upon the performance of ministerial action to which the party is entitled of right, the question whether there shall be a remedy or not can depend upon the circumstances that in the particular case the ministerial action is required of a superior officer, when there is no reason in its nature why it might not have been required of an inferior.

A view similar to this has been taken in some cases, and the courts have undertaken to decide what are and what are not properly executive duties, and to assert a right to control the governor's action in some cases, while admitting their want of jurisdiction to do so in others. The State v. The Governor, 5 Ohio St. 528; Bonner v. Pitts, 7 Geo. 473; Cotton v. The Governor, 7 Jones, N. C. 545; Chamberlain v. The Governor, 4 Minn. 309; Pacific R. R. v. The Governor, 23 Mo. 353; Magruder v. The Governor, 25 Md. 173. These cases, for the most part, are rested upon the dictum of Chief Justice MARSHALL in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, that one of the heads of departments in the federal government might be compelled by mandamus to perform a mere ministerial duty; a dictum which cannot be understood as expressive of the opinion of that eminent judge that the president was subject to the like process, but which is wholly inapplicable to a case like the present unless it goes to that extent, for it cannot justly be claimed, where federal and state governments have been formed, so far as distribution of power is concerned on the same general plan, that the executive of the Union can claim immunity from judicial process any more than the governor of one of the states. In many cases it is unquestionable that the head of an executive department may be required by judicial process to perform a legal duty, while in other cases, in our judgment, the courts would be entirely without jurisdiction, and as regards such an officer we should concede that the nature of the case and of the duty to be performed must determine the right of the court to interfere in each particular instance. When the head of a department acts as the mere assistant or agent of the executive in the performance of a political or discretionary act, he is no more subject to the control of the courts than the chief executive himself; but where a ministerial act is required to be done by him independently of the executive, though in a certain sense he is an executive officer, it would be as idle to dispute his responsibility to legal process as it would be to make the same claim to exemption on behalf of an officer entrusted with similar duties of a lower grade. This is emphatically the case under the constitution of this state, which provides for the election of state and inferior officers alike by the people, and makes the chief officers of state below the governor as independent of his control in the performance of their duties as are the officers of the counties or of the townships.

But when duties are imposed upon the governor, whatever be their grade, importance or nature, we doubt the right of the courts to say that this or that duty might properly have been imposed upon a secretary of state, or a sheriff of a county, or other inferior officer, and that inasmuch as in case it had been so imposed there would have been a judicial remedy for neglect to perform it, therefore there must be the like remedy when the governor himself is guilty of a similar neglect. The apportionment of power, authority and duty to the governor is made either by the people in the constitution, or by the legislature in making laws under it; and the courts, when the apportionment has been made, would be presumptuous if they should assume to declare that a particular duty assigned to the governor is not essentially executive, but is of such inferior grade and importance as properly to pertain to some inferior officer, and consequently, for the purpose of their jurisdiction, the courts may treat it precisely as if an inferior officer had been required to perform it. To do this would be not only to question the wisdom of the constitution or the law, but also to assert a right to make the governor the passive instrument of the judiciary in executing its mandates within the sphere of his own duties. Were the courts to go so far they would break away from those checks and balances of government which were meant to be checks of co-operation, and not of antagonism or mastery, and would concentrate in their own hands something at least of the power which the people, either directly or by the action of their representatives, decided to entrust to the other departments of the government.

There is, as to all the authority specially confided to the governor, whether by the constitution or the laws, no safe or logical doctrine but this: that reasons of a conclusive nature must be presumed to have been found requiring the particular authority to be confided to the chief executive as one properly and peculiarly, if not exclusively, pertaining to the department which he represents.

It is not attempted to be disguised on the part of the relators that any other course than that which leaves the head of the executive department to act independently in the discharge of his duties might possibly lead to unseemly conflicts, if not to something worse, should the courts undertake to enforce their mandates and the executive refuse to obey; but it is insisted that no such considerations are admissible in the present case, in which the governor, though questioning our jurisdiction, professes a willingness to be governed by our decision upon it. The decision of this question, however, is to be a precedent in the state, and no voluntary appearance and no concession which may be made is to be allowed force to induce us to assert a jurisdiction which, though it may be useful in this case, would threaten conflict and danger in future controversies. Orders in these cases can only be enforced by process for the punishment of contempts of court, and it is conceded that the governor might submit or not, at his option, so that our decision in effect could be only advisory. And while we should concede, if jurisdiction were plainly vested in us, the inability to enforce our judgment would be no sufficient reason for failing to pronounce it, especially against an officer who would be presumed ready and anxious in all cases to render obedience to the law, yet in a case where jurisdiction is involved in doubt, it is not consistent with the dignity of the court to pronounce judgments which may be disregarded with impunity, nor with that of the executive to place him in position where, in a matter within his own province, he must act contrary to his judgment or stand convicted of a disregard of the laws.

Digitized by Google

But it is said that this conclusion will leave parties who have rights, in many cases, without remedy. Practically there are a great many such cases, but theoretically there are none at all. All wrongs, certainly, are not redressed by the judicial department. A party may be deprived of a right by a wrong verdict or an erroneous ruling of a judge, and though the error may be manifest to all others than those who are to decide upon his rights, he will be without redress. A person lawfully chosen to the legislature may have his seat given by the house to another, and be thus wronged without remedy. A just claim against the state may be rejected by the board of auditors, and neither the governor nor the courts can give relief. A convicted person may conclusively demonstrate his innocence to the governor and still be denied a pardon. In which one of these cases could the denial of redress by the proper tribunal constitute any ground for interference by any other authority? The law must leave the final decision upon every claim and every controversy somewhere, and where that decision has been made it must be accepted as correct. The presumption is just as conclusive in favor of executive action as in favor of judicial. The party applying for action which under the constitution and the laws depends on the executive discretion, or is to be determined by the executive judgment, if he fails to obtain it, has sought the proper remedy and must submit to the decision.

The cases of Hawkins v. The Governor, 1 Ark. 570; State v. The Governor, 25 N. J. 331; People v. Bissell, 19 Ill. 229; Dennett, Petitioner, 32 Me. 510, and Mauran v. Smith, 8 R. I. 192 which reach the same conclusion, are so full and satisfactory in their reasoning that we might have deemed it proper to dismiss the case with a simple reference to them if there had not been opposing decisions which are supposed to detract from the weight of their authority. Those opposing decisions, as we think, have not been sufficiently observant of the distinction between the governor as being himself a distinct and independent department of the government, and those administrative officers which, though clothed with important powers, must be subject in the performance of their duties to the regulation, direction and control of the legislature, executive and judiciary, according as the intervention of one or the other in a particular case shall become proper or necessary.

For the reasons stated we must decline to make any order to show cause.

MANDAMUS REFUSED.

Removal of Causes from State to Federal Court.

VERNON K. STEVENSON, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, v. MARY McDOUGALL WILLIAMS, WIFE OF WILLIAM VON PHUL, AND WILLIAM VON PHUL.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 212, October Term, 1873.

1. Removal of Causes from State to Federal Court—Final Judgment.—Under the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stats. at Large, p. 558), the application for the removal of a cause from a state court to the federal court must be made before the final judgment in the state court of original jurisdiction; it cannot be made in the state appellate court.

In error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

The application of the appellant for the removal of the suit from the Supreme Court of Louisiana to the Circuit Court of the United States was made too late, and was properly refused on that ground.

The act of congress of March 2d, 1867 (14 Stat. at Large, 558), under which the removal was asked, only authorizes a removal where an application is made "before the final hearing or trial of the suit, and this clearly means before final judgment in the court of original jurisdiction where the suit is brought. Whether it does not mean still more—before the hearing or trial of the suit has commenced, which is followed by such judgment—may be questioned; but it is unnecessary to determine that question in this case.

After a final judgment has been rendered in the state court the case cannot be removed to the Circuit Court of the United States, and "there proceed," as the statute provides, "in the same manner as if brought there by original process," without setting aside the trial and judgment of the state court as of no validity. No such proceeding is contemplated by the act, and since the decision of Murray v. The Justices of New York, reported in 9th Wallace, legislation directed to that end where, at least, the trial has been by jury, would be of doubtful validity.

The judgment recovered by Stevenson against the succession of Williams appears to have been annulled on two grounds: 1st, that the notes on which the judgment was rendered were given for a loan of confederate money; and 2d, that the transactions which resulted in the acquisition of the notes were had between enemies during the late civil war, in violation of the proclamation of the president forbidding commercial intercourse with the enemy.

The first ground would not be deemed, in a federal court, sufficient to set aside a judgment rendered for the cash value, in national currency, of the confederate money, especially when, as in this case, the judgment was entered upon a stipulation with the executor of the estate for an extended credit. And the evidence in the record leads us to doubt whether the transactions detailed properly fall within the rule of public law or the proclamation of the president forbidding commercial intercourse with the enemy.

But the ruling of the state court in these particulars, however erroneous, is not the subject of review by us. It presents no federal question for our examination. It conflicts with no part of the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States.

Had the state court refused to uphold the judgment because of the provision in the constitution of the state, subsequently adopted, prohibiting the enforcement of contracts founded upon confederate money, a federal question would have been presented. That provision, however, although referred to, does not appear to have caused the ruling. The court only followed its previous adjudications that contracts of the character mentioned were invalid. West Tennessee Bank v. Citizens' Bank, 13 Wall. 432; Bethell v. Demaret, 10 id. 537.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

—GOVERNOR DIX, of New York, has vetoed "an act to simplify and abridge the practice, pleadings and proceedings of the courts of this state."

Digitized by Google

Federal Court Practice—Taxation of Costs where the Cause has been Removed from a State Court.

HELENA WOLF v. THE CONNECTICUT MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Michigan, April Term, 1874.

Before Hon. JOHN W. LONGYEAR, District Judge.

1. Federal Court Practice—Taxation of Costs.—A suit removed from a state court comes into the federal impressed with all the rights and liabilities of the parties as to costs which accrued or attached by the laws of the state while the suit remained in the state court. Acts of congress prescribing what costs may or not be taxed apply only to such costs as may accrue after the removal has become complete and the federal court is invested with jurisdiction. In taxing costs in such cases, the federal court will therefore administer the state laws as to all costs which accrued while the suit remained in the state court.

On the mutual application of the parties for directions to the clerk as to taxation of costs.

This cause was commenced in the circuit court for the county of Wayne, in this state, and after issue and one continuance in that court, the cause was removed to this court by the defendant, under and in pursuance of the acts of congress in such cases made and provided. After sundry proceedings had in the case in this court, unnecessary to mention here, the plaintiff discontinued her suit, and judgment was entered against her for costs to be taxed. The defendant now brings its bill of costs for taxation, in which are included items of costs accrued in the state court before removal to this court, amounting in the aggregate to $15, and $7.50 paid to the clerk of the state court for transcripts in making the removal. These items are objected to on behalf of plaintiff on the ground that there is no act of congress allowing such costs to be taxed in this court.

Mr. D. C. Holbrook, for plaintiff; Mr. C. J. Walker, for defendant.

LONGYEAR, J.—A suit removed from a state court comes into this court impressed with all the rights and liabilities of parties as to costs which accrued or attached by the laws of the state while the suit remained in the state court. Acts of congress prescribing what costs may or may not be taxed apply only to such costs as accrue after the removal has become complete and this court is invested with jurisdiction.

In the state court, in case of discontinuance, the defendant would be entitled by the state laws to all his costs made up to that time, and I think this court is bound, in case of removal to this court before discontinuance, to administer those laws as to all such costs which accrued while the suit remained in the state court.

No adjudicated case involving this exact question has fallen under my notice, but the cases cited below involve principles applicable to this question, and so far as they go, fully sustain the foregoing propositions. I am also informed by my brother Judge, WITHEY, of the western district, that such has always been the uniform practice there. (See Ellis v. Jarvis, 3 Mason, 457; Field v. Schell, 4 Blatchf. C. C. 435; Gier v. Gregg, 4 McLean, 202; Ackley v. Vilas, 3 Ch. L. News, 73.)

The clerk is therefore directed in this, and all like cases, to tax to the party recovering costs, all costs to which he would have been entitled under the state laws, accrued while the suit remained in the state court, and up to the time the suit was duly entered in this court.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

—THE judgment of the New York Supreme Court in one of the suits that are known as the "ring case," The People v. Ingersoll, has been affirmed by the court of appeals. The court held that the county may maintain such suits, and not the state.

Correspondence—The Confiscation of Monasteries by Victor Emanuel as Viewed by an American Lawyer.

LONDON, May, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I am pleased with the administration of law in England. But perhaps before I tell you how and why, I ought to say I came here disposed to be pleased. I came from Italy, where with the law, at least such as it is, and so little of it as there is, I was not pleased; where the government seizes private property, sells it as its own, appropriates the proceeds to its own use, making no compensation to the owner; and where, when the owner seeks redress at law, he finds sitting in the judgment-seat only the subordinate of the wrongful taker, already committed and commanded to determine that his master has only taken his own, and that no compensation is due.

It was in 1861, I believe, that Victor Emanuel assumed the title of King of Italy. Since then, at different times, he has suppressed all the monasteries, except only the Armenian which is in the bay of Venice near the Adriatic shore, and is under the patronage of Turkey. The pretext for this suppression is that nothing was taught in these institutions but religion; that the mass of the people was kept in ignorance, and purposely so kept by the priests; that the demand was for a better and more general education, and that the only way to get it was by suppressing the monasteries. I do not believe the pretext to be true in point of fact, in the first place; in the second place, the conclusion does not follow, if it were true, and in the third place, if the facts of the pretext were true, and the conclusion did follow, they furnish no excuse for the conduct of Victor Emanuel.

Every American lawyer knows, of course, the claim and the argument under which, a dozen or so years ago, the property of the people of the Southern states was taken from them. It is true I never for a moment believed in that argument, but it was at least a claim in respect of which, as Mr. Justice MELLEN, of Massachusetts, used to say, "a noise can be made on the other side." And a noise, it will be remembered, was made; and they who blew the loudest and the longest horn prevailed. It was said there was precedent for it among states civilized. At any rate, the country, tired of noise and fighting, acquiesced, and the matter is now settled. But for the conduct of Victor Emanuel in respect to these monasteries, not now to speak of his acts in other respects, no such apology can be made. If, as the pretext admits, religion was taught in these monasteries, then to teach it they must have taught letters, and the connection between A B C and moral conduct I hold to be necessary and inseparable. I spend no time on this. Second, if it was competent to suppress these institutions, then it was competent to control and regulate them, and therefore it was not needful to destroy them, much less to rob them—which is what suppression means. Third, if, as predicated, the public good required that these institutions should be discontinued, then there was no excuse for taking the property belonging to them without compensation. It is said these monasteries had been, to some extent, publicly endowed. Suppose that were true, how does it affect the title? Must not that depend upon the terms of the grant? It was thus in great part that the foundation of Harvard College was laid. Thus in part it has been supported. But the money granted by the state, and the buildings that have been built on the college-grounds by individuals, are equally the property of the president and fellows. And what would be said if, under the pretext that the public good required that the college should be suppressed and the lands and buildings should be taken for public use, the lands and buildings belonging to the college were taken and sold by the state and the proceeds applied to support the governor's household, and an army miscalled a peace establishment, and no compensation made to the college? The American constitution shows how well it has always been understood in our country that every individual is to be protected in the enjoyment of his property, not only against his fellows, but against the thing called government. The constitutions of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Missouri, not to speak of others, respectively provide in terms that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. And the constitution of the United States has a like provision. If it is said there is no such provision in the constitution of Italy, I may answer it is quite time so plain a principle was recognized there.

Thus, you see, I was disgusted with what passes for law in Italy, and happy to find a contrast here. But I must add, I like the English system and practice better than our own; how, and in what respects, I will tell you in another letter. PELHAM.

Digitized by Google

The Married Woman's Law of Alabama—When the Federal Courts will Follow the State Courts.

GREENSBORO, ALA., June 9, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In the number of CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL issued May 28, 1874, you publish an interesting opinion of Judge WM. B. WOODS, rendered at Mobile, Alabama, in the case of Nannie C. Mitchell v. J. B. Lippincott & Co. The question raised was the validity of a certain mortgage executed by Mrs. Mitchell and her husband on the 17th February, 1869; and it was contended by the attorneys for the mortgagees that, at the date of the execution of the mortgage, the language used in the deed, by which the lands mortgaged were conveyed to Mrs. Mitchell, created in her "a contract separate estate," and that she could mortgage them according to all the decisions of the Supreme Court of Alabama prior to that time. The case of Bibb v. Pope, 43 Ala. 190, decided in January, 1869, was referred to as the earliest decision reversing the former rulings, and holding that all conveyances made directly to a married woman in Alabama conveyed to her a "statutory separate estate" irrespective of the language used. But that question was not raised or decided in Bibb v. Pope. The sole question decided in Bibb v. Pope was that a married woman in Alabama, owning a statutory separate estate here, could not mortgage it. No question was made as to the character of Mrs. Pope's estate; it being conceded to be a "statutory separate estate," as the deed to her contained no words which would have excluded her husband's marital rights by the common law. The earliest decision by the Supreme Court of Alabama holding that all property conveyed directly to a married woman became her statutory separate estate, regardless of whatever words of exclusion the grantor used in the deed, was that of Glenn v. Glenn, decided January term, 1872, and reported in 47 Ala. 208–209.

In Alabama a married woman, owning a separate estate secured to her by contract, may mortgage it. Such has been settled by our supreme court in Warfield v. Ravesies and Wife, 38 Ala. 521, and other cases. Then if, as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in Gelpke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 206, and Olcott v. Supervisors, 16 Wall. 690, the construction placed by the Supreme Court of Alabama upon this Alabama statute (creating in married women a statutory separate estate), at the date of the mortgage, declaring the land to be Mrs. Mitchell's "contract separate separate estate," or, to speak more accurately, that such language as that used in the deed to her conveyed to her a contract separate estate, became a part of her contract which no subsequent reversal of those decisions could affect; then why, in a suit brought to enforce that mortgage, would not both the state and federal courts be bound to give it that construction, irrespective of subsequent decisions overruling the former ones? It was emphatically so asserted as a correct proposition of law in Gelpke v. Dubuque, and reaffirmed in Olcott v. Supervisors, supra, that the rule of construction at date of the contract must govern in ascertaining its validity; and if that is a correct announcement of the law, it is as binding upon a state court as on a federal court. And if the case of Mitchell v. Lippincott had been pending in a court of the state of Alabama, its decision therein, under the influence of the principle so declared in 1 and 16 Wallace, would have been controlled by the construction of the statute at the date of the mortgage, and not by those made since. But whilst it is true that the United States courts follow the decisions of state courts in the construction of their own constitutions and laws, yet "where those decisions are in conflict, this court must determine between them," is the language of Judge TANEY, delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Ohio Life Ins. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 431. This law applies with equal force to contracts respecting real estate as it does to personal property.

The authorities cited and the reasoning of Judge WOODS fail to draw our minds to the conclusion he reached. His conclusion and judgment is the same as that which would have been the legitimate conclusion arrived at by following the dissenting opinion of Judge MILLER in the case of Gelpke v. Dubuque in 1 Wallace. SUBSCRIBER.

The Obligation of a Bailee for Hire.

An interesting and important judgment has been delivered in the Court of Queen's Bench in England, by BLACKBURN, J., in Searle v. Laverick, L. R. 9 Q. B. 122, which throws a considerable amount of light on the celebrated judgment of Chief Justice HOLT in the leading case of Coggs v. Bernard. In that case bailments are divided into classes, in each of which different degrees of liability are attached to the bailee. The fifth of these classes, locatio operis faciendi, or where there is "a delivery to carry or otherwise manage for a reward to be paid by the bailee," is again subdivided into two divisions—the first, where there is a delivery to one who exercises a public employment, in which case a bailee is bound to answer for the goods at all events; and the second, where the delivery is to a private person, who is only bound to take reasonable care. A question arose in Searle v. Laverick, as to under which of the subdivisions of the class of bailment, locatio operis faciendi, the case fell. The defendant was a livery stable keeper; he entered into a contract with a builder, who was not his servant, to erect in his yard a building, of which the lower part was to be a shed for the reception of carriages, and the upper part was to be used for other purposes. Before the upper portion of the building was completed, the plaintiff brought to the defendant two carriages to keep for him, a charge being made for so keeping the carriages. While the contractor's workmen were still in the upper portion of the building, it was blown down by a high wind, and the carriages were damaged. The contractor employed for the purpose of building was not denied to be one whom a careful and prudent person might trust, and there was nothing to show that the defendan had any knowledge of negligence on his part. The plaintiff, at the trial, offered evidence that owing to the neglect of the contractor and his workmen, the fall of the building took place; but this was refused by the learned judge who tried the case, on the ground that the defendant's liability was that of an ordinary bailee for hire, and that he was only bound to use ordinary care in keeping the carriages, and if in employing the builder he made use of such care as an ordinary careful man would use, he was protected. The plaintiff was, in consequence, non-suited on a motion for a new trial; the full court, after a careful review of the authorities, upheld this decision. The court held it to be established law, by the custom of England, that the extreme liability making the bailee an insurer is confined to carriers and inn-keepers. It would seem, by analogy to the Roman law, from which the English law on the subject is avowedly taken, that the case of stable keepers should be placed on a footing with inn-keepers and carriers. The language of Lord HOLT is general, and applies to all who exercise a public employment. The Prætor's Edict (Dig. lib. iv. tit. ix.), nautæ caupones stabularii ut recepta restituant, expressly mentions stablemen. The reason given by Lord HOLT for the division tells, in our opinion, rather against the interpretation now put on it by the court: "The true reason of the case is, it would be unreasonable to charge him with a trust further than the nature of the thing puts it in his power to perform it. But it is allowed in the other cases (i.e. the carrier and inn-keeper, but not the livery stable keeper, according to the present decision), by reason of the necessity of the thing." We confess we are at a loss to perceive the necessity existing in the case of the carrier and inn-keeper, which does not exist with equal force in the case of the livery stable keeper. At any rate there did not appear to exist any distinction between the cases, in the opinion of Ulpian, who, in the clearest and most express manner, mentions livery stable-men. The Prætor's Edict declared that if shipmasters, innkeepers and stable keepers did not restore what they had received to keep safe, he would give judgment against them. The reason assigned for this by Ulpian is that "it is necessary to place confidence in such persons, and to commit the custody of things to them; that no person ought to complain of the severity of the rule, for it is in his own choice to receive the goods of other persons or not, and unless the rule was thus established, an opportunity would be afforded them to combine with thieves against those who trusted them; whereas they have now an inducement to abstain from such combinations." These reasons, if read in connection with the general principle on which warranties are to be assumed, laid down in Redhead v. Midland Railway Co., L. R. 4 Q. B. 392, "that they are, for the most part, founded on the presumed intention of the parties, and ought certainly to be founded on reason, and with a just regard to the interests of the party who is supposed to give the warranty, as of the party to whom it is supposed to be given," would strongly point to the conclusion that stable keepers should be classed in the same catagory with inn-keepers and carriers.

We presume there could be no doubt of this extreme liability being applicable in the case of an inn-keeper, who also kept a stable, and took charge of the animals and vehicles of those who frequented his house. This is distinctly stated to be the law by Pothier (Du Contrat de Depot, 80), where he states "that stable servants must be judged to be appointed by inn-keepers to take charge of horses and vehicles of travellers," by which the inn-keeper is rendered liable. What difference can there be between such a case and a case where the stable keeper does not provide lodgment for "man and beast," but for "beast" alone? All the cases quoted—both those decided in this country and the dicta of foreign jurists—would seem to indicate that a tolerably wide margin should be allowed by a judge in deciding in the case of what trades a warranty is to be presumed. The case quoted in the judgment from Pothier (Du Contrat de Louage, Nos. 118, 119, 120) is a strong authority on this point. After laying down that where a person, who lets a thing for hire, knows of a defect in the thing which makes it unfit for the purpose for which it is let, he is responsible for damages. And although he does not actually know it, that if the circumstances are such that he ought to have had a suspicion of it, and make an enquiry about it, and he does not either enquire, or inform the hirer, so that he may enquire for himself, he is liable; but if the latter follows a trade which makes it his duty to know whether the thing has faults or not, he is liable, without proof that he did not know. He puts as an example the case of a cooper who supplies wine casks made of bad wood, so that they leak. Surely, if "the profession of the cooper binds him to know the quality of the goods he used, and to supply none but of a good quality," it cannot be contended that the profession of a livery stable keeper, where a person holds himself out to the public as willing to undertake the charge of property of a nature requiring the utmost care, does not bind the bailee to know of the quality of shelter which he is bound to provide to his property. The plaintiff's counsel relied mainly on Redhead v. Midland Railway Co., L. R. 4, Q. B. 392, and Francis v. Cockrell, L. R. 5, Q. B. 184, which establishes that a person who lets sittings in a temporary stand, built for the reception of spectators at a race, is under an obligation as to the sufficiency of the stand. But the court, while intimating a desire not to draw too fine distinctions between the cases, held that that case was clearly distinguishable from the present, and that there was no authority to establish that a warranty must be applied in the present case. It seems to us that the court being, in its own language, at liberty, so far as authority goes, to apply the principles to the case, and see if any warranty or obligation should be implied, in deciding as it did, rather overlooked the true principles, as laid down by the most eminent of foreign jurists, fortified by the direct dictum of so great an authority as Ulpian.—Irish Law Times.

Digitized by Google

Bona Fide Purchasers Without Notice.

The case of Caballero v. Hentz, which came up on appeal on the 11th March, from the master of the rolls, before the lords justices, seems to establish a new principle in relation to the rights of that well protected person, the bona fide purchaser without notice. A brewer sent his agent to bid for property, described as in the possession of certain tenants, and producing £30 a year. At the sale, however, it appears that these tenants were under-tenants of a lessee of the vendor, who held the whole property for a lease, of which nine years were unexpired, at a rent of £20. The lease was read at the sale, but it was not referred to in the abstract sent to the purchaser. A bill was filed for specific performance, but it was held by the master of the rolls, and his decision was affirmed, that the purchaser was not bound by the unauthorized act of his agent, and that he had not received constructive notice of the lease. The two cases most relied on by the plaintiff's counsel were those of Daniels v. Davidson (16 Vesey, 249) and James v. Litchfield (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 51; 21 L. T. Rep N. S. 526); the former of which may be looked upon as much shaken in authority, and the latter overruled. The point decided in Daniels v. Davidson was, that the possession of a tenant is notice to a purchaser of the tenant's interest, created by an agreement to purchase from his landlord; and it was intimated in the judgment of Lord Eldon that generally notice of occupation was notice of the terms of occupation. And the case of James v. Litchfield lays down that rule to its full extent. It is true that in the present case complications existed which were absent from the earlier ones. The question of principal and agent was involved, and the statement in the particulars of sale that the property brought in a certain annual rental, whereas it produced, in fact, considerably less, had great influence upon the decision. But there are statements in the judgment of Lord Justice James which go much further; so that, whereas under the older decision the usual rule was that notice of possession was notice of the terms under which the possession was held, the law may now be taken as settled, if the decision of the lords justices is maintained, that a purchaser may safely assume the tenantcy of an occupant to be from year to year or at will, unless he is distinctly informed of the contrary. After stating his indisposition to follow the dicta in James v. Litchfield (ubi sup.) the lord justice said: "If there is anything in the nature of the tenancies which affects the property sold, it is the vendor's duty to inform the purchaser of it, and he is not afterwards entitled to say, 'Oh, yes, but you ought to have gone and enquired.'" This decision seems to place the law upon a satisfactory basis, and while justly relaxing the stringency of the rule of caveat emptor, to discourage the fraudulent concealment of facts material to the property on the part of vendors.—Irish Law Times.

Negligence—Carriers—Passenger's Baggage.—We learn from the New York papers that in the suit of Thomas E. Fairfax v. The N. J. Central and Hudson R. R. Company, which was tried in the Superior Court of that city. plaintiff purchased in Montreal tickets of the Grand Trunk R. R. to New York, He left for New York October 8, on the route of the Rensselaer and Saratoga line to Albany, and thence by the People's line of steamers to New York. The tickets were for that route. He had seven pieces of luggage checked by the same route. The Rensselaer and Saratoga baggage check-master delivered them to the Hudson River R. R. at Troy, and the baggage arrived at the depot in New York October 9. Plaintiff got to New York October 11 by steamer, and next day demanded his baggage at the Hudson River R. R. depot, when it was found one piece, a valise, had been stolen. He brought suit for damage, and the jury decided in his favor on the ground that there was an arrangement by which defendant conveyed his luggage, and he called for it within a reasonable time, but the general term, through Judge SPIER, reversed the judgment, on the ground that the relations of carrier and passenger, which is the basis of liability for baggage, did not exist, and that the Grand Trunk Road, by its agent the Rensselaer, must be held responsible for the deviation of route by the baggage, and that the railroad which carried it were not insurers and had exercised ordinary care, and that the plaintiff ought to have called for the baggage earlier, notwithstanding that his ticket gave him a month to delay en route.

Book Notice.

THE CASE OF THE VIRGINIUS CONSIDERED WITH REFERENCE TO THE LAW OF SELF-DEFENCE. By GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co., 66 Nassau street. London: Trubner & Co., 57 and 59 Ludgate Hill. 1874.

On the first appearance of this interesting pamphlet we were attracted by its title, and have read it in connection with a well-written article on "The Virginius Case" in the January number of the Law Magazine and Review, and also in connection with an extremely acute and forcible article on the same subject in the April number of the American Law Review. The English writer argues the American side of the case with much vigor and considerable learning, and although we detect in it some slight errors, such as an allusion to Chief Justice STORY and to Dr. Woolsely, yet when we recollect that all that the best writer can hope to do is to reduce such errors to a decent minimum, they do not, on the whole, diminish our respect for the writer. It is proper to note, however, that the argument of this writer is almost exclusively devoted to an attempt to show that the enterprises in which the Virginius was engaged were not piratical. But this argument assumes that the Virginius was a regularly documented American ship, entitled to fly the American flag, and these premises having been destroyed by subsequent evidence, the whole argument falls to the ground. The only trouble with it is that it was written a few days too soon. Whilst this and other English lawyers have taken up the cudgel in our behalf, the more just but less pleasing task has devolved upon our own jurists of showing that in that memorable controversy, so far as the right of the Spanish admiral to seize the Virginius on the high seas was questioned, Spain was right and we were wrong.

Starting with the question of the ownership and national character of the Virginius, it now appears beyond all controversy or shadow of doubt—

1. That she was not, at the time of her seizure, owned, in whole or in part, by any American citizen, but that she was wholly owned and controlled by citizens of Spain, and was used by them for the unlawful purpose of promoting a domestic insurrection in the island of Cuba, a portion of the territory of Spain.

2. That her American register was void for two reasons: (1) because it had been obtained by an American citizen through fraud and perjury; and (2) because the bond required by law to entitle her to a registration had not been perfected.

Digitized by Google

3. That her general character and status were well known, not only to the Spanish military and naval authorities in and about Cuba, but also to our own naval officers cruising in those waters, and to our commercial agents in those and adjacent ports. The evidence that her character and status were thus generally and well known, consists in the notorious fact that previously to her capture she had succeeded in landing two hostile cargoes on the shores of Cuba. The second of these successful expeditions is remarkable from the fact that, wholly and notoriously controlled as she was by Spanish subjects, and loaded with arms and munitions of war designed to assist certain Spanish citizens to make war upon the Spanish government and other Spanish citizens, and notified by a Spanish naval officer of her real character, who earnestly solicited that she might be taken to an American port to have her true character adjudicated, the commander of an American gunboat was, nevertheless, not ashamed to convoy her out to sea from a Central American port, thus fairly rescuing her from the clutches of a Spanish cruiser, and sending her out under the sanction and protection of our flag, to land her second hostile expedition upon Spanish territory, which she immediately did. Such a dishonest breach of comity towards a friendly nation is calculated to make every American hang his head in shame, and goes far towards justifying the assertion of the Cuban journals that the final loss of that vessel involved another instance of Punic faith on our part—that instead of succumbing off Cape Hatteras to her own weak condition and the perils of a stormy sea, she was scuttled and sunk to avoid the inevitable consequence which would have followed the determination by an American court of her real character, namely, her re-delivery to Spain.

The Cuban insurgents not being recognized by any respectable power as belligerents, the Virginius, though owned by Spanish citizens, was without any national character. She was not entitled to fly the flag of any nation, but was a sort of nullius filia upon the high seas. She was, to all intents and purposes a Spanish vessel, engaged in unlawful enterprises against the Spanish government, and as clearly liable to seizure by a Spanish cruiser on the high seas as any American merchantman at sea is liable to be overhauled by an American gunboat. In reason and common sense, her fraudulent register and the device of hoisting an American flag, her real character and ownership being known, could no more confer upon her immunity against seizure by a Spanish gunboat than the same devices could confer immunity upon a pirate cruising animo furandi against the commerce of all nations. The utmost obligation which Spain owed us was, her American character having been asserted by our government, to have that character adjudicated by an American court.

We cannot, of course, enter into an extended argument to enforce these views. They are amply enforced by Mr. Curtis and by the writer in the American Law Review. The question, then, being one which concerns simply the right of a Spanish man-of-war to seize upon the high seas a vessel owned and controlled by Spanish citizens, and engaged in treasonable and felonious enterprises against the Spanish government and people, it would seem that the right of self-defence does not become an important question in the case. The governing principle of the case relates rather to the right which every sovereign power possesses over its own subjects, whether within its own territories or upon its vessels on the high seas. And it would seem to be only upon the supposition that her fraudulent American register made her, prima facie, an American vessel, that the doctrine of self-defence has any relevancy to the case. Mr. Curtis, however, discusses the question at considerable length with reference to the law of self-defence. After fully explaining the character and ownership of the Virginius, and the personal jurisdiction of a nation over its subjects on the high seas, he says: "If it is true that national jurisdiction over the persons and property of subjects exists, for some purposes, wherever they are—and this is the real basis of the relations between a national vessel at sea and the nation to which it belongs—it follows that a nation which has subjects cruising at sea in a vessel that is wholly under their control, which has no national character, and which those subjects are using to make incipient war upon their sovereign, may have rights of prevention which depend not upon territorial but upon personal jurisdiction. Whether those rights can be exercised on the ocean, or only within the territory of the nation that needs to exercise them, depends upon the character of the ocean, upon the practicability of exercising upon it a right of self-defence without interference with the rights of others, and upon the solid reasons why such a right of self-defence should be admitted rather than denied." Mr. Curtis then proceeds to show that the exercise of the right of self-defence has been conceded by civilized states to each other in the case of pirates, the extirpation of whom is referred by him solely to this right. He then cites the somewhat analogous case of slave traders, who may be said in a qualified sense to be enemies of all mankind. And finally, to show the "very great prominence which the law of nations assigns to the right of self-defence," he calls attention to the offence against that law denominated "piratical aggression," which consists in private war by one vessel against another upon the high seas; and in illustration of this he cites the memorable case of the Marianna Flora. He then calls attention to the case of the Caroline, which is within the memory of many of our readers. It is not a little singular that both Mr. Curtis and the writer in the Law Magazine and Review, while discussing at length the diplomatic controversy which grew out of the destruction of the Caroline, should have overlooked or omitted to cite the important case of The People v. McLeod, (1 Hill, N. Y. 377), which grew out of that affair. This case was determined in the Supreme Court of New York in 1841, before Chief Justice NELSON and Justices BRONSON and COWEN, all able and distinguished judges. It is noteworthy in this connection from the fact that Mr. Justice COWEN, who delivered the opinion of the court, attempted to answer the assertion of the British government that the destruction of the Caroline was a necessary act of self-defence.

The facts of the Caroline case were substantially as follows: In the winter of 1837–8, during McKenzie's rebellion in Canada, and while the United States and Great Britain were at peace with each other, a body of armed men, mostly Americans, took possession of Navy Island, in the Niagara river, an island belonging to Great Britain, and, having fortified their position, kept up for several weeks a frequent bombardment against the position occupied by British forces on the Canadian shore. An American steamer, the Caroline, plied regularly between Navy Island and Schlosser, on the American side of the river, furnishing the armed force on the island with supplies and stores, and keeping up a communication between them and the American shore. About midnight of the night of December 29–30, a party of British troops, under command of Colonel Allen McNabb, proceeded in small boats in search of the Caroline, found her fastened to the dock at Schlosser, in the state of New York, made a hostile attack upon her, expelled her crew, set fire to her, and she floated in full blaze over the great falls. In the skirmish, one Amos Durfee, a person employed on the Caroline, was killed, and for his murder, nearly two years afterward, one Alexander McLeod a British subject, was indicted by a grand jury in Niagara county, New York. McLeod having been arrested and confined in jail, the British minister, Mr. Fox, in a note to Mr. Webster, the American secretary of state (March 12, 1841), demanded his immediate release on the ground that the act in which he was engaged was one of a public character, "planned and executed by persons duly empowered by her majesty's colonial authorities to take any steps or to do any acts which might be deemed necessary for the defence of her majesty's territories and for the protection of her majesty's subjects, and that consequently those subjects of her majesty who engaged in that transaction were performing an act of public duty, for which they cannot be made personally and individually answerable to the tribunals of any foreign country."

In the meantime McLeod was brought before the Supreme Court of New York, under a writ of habeas corpus. Here the prisoner brought to the notice of the court, by affidavits and exhibits, the character of the Caroline, and of the expedition which destroyed her, as well as the demand of the British government for his release.

The case was argued with great ability by counsel, and many precedents and authorities were cited. The judgment of the court was finally pronounced by Mr. Justice COWEN, who argued the question involved at great length, displaying throughout his opinion the clearness of intellect for which he was distinguished, and the exhaustive research which was his habit. Referring to the demand of the British government for the surrender of the prisoner, he said:

"She puts herself, as we have seen, on the law of defence and necessity; and nothing is better defined, nor more familiar in any system of jurisprudence, than the juncture of circumstances which alone can tolerate the action of that law. A force which the defendant has a right to resist, must itself be within striking distance. It must be menacing, and apparently able to inflict physical injury, unless prevented by the resistance which he opposes. The right of self-defence and the defence of others, standing in certain relations to the defender, depend upon the same ground; at least they are limited by the same principle. It will be sufficient, therefore, to enquire of the right so far as it is strictly personal. All writers concur in the language of Blackstone (3 Black. Com. 4), that to warrant its exertion at all, the defender must be forcibly assaulted. He may then repel force by force, because he cannot say to what length of rapine or cruelty the outrage may be carried, unless it were admissible to oppose one violence with another. 'But,' he adds, 'care must be taken that the resistance does not exceed the bounds of mere defence and prevention; for then the defender would himself become the aggressor.' The condition upon which this right is thus placed, and the limits to which its exercise is confined by this eminent writer, are enough of themselves, when compared with McLeod's affidavit, to destroy all color for saying the case is within that condition or those limits. The Caroline was not in the act of making an assault upon the Canadian shore; she was not in a condition to make one; she had returned from her visit to Navy Island, and was moored in our own waters for the night. Instead of meeting her at the line and repelling force by force, the prisoner and his associates came out under orders to seek her wherever he could find her, and were, in fact, obliged to sail half the width of the Niagara river, after they had entered our territory, in order to reach the boat. They were the assailants; and their attack might have been legally repelled by Durfee, even to the destruction of their lives."

Digitized by Google

Further on Mr. Justice COWEN quotes from Puffendorf the rule applicable to cases of private or mixed war, as follows: "If the adversary be a foreigner we may resist him and repel him any way, at the instant he comes violently upon us; but we cannot, without the sovereign's command, either assault him while his mischief is only in machination, or revenge ourselves upon him after he hath performed the injury against us." Puff. b. 2, chap. 5, § 7. "The sovereign's command must," adds the learned justice, "in order to warrant such conduct in his subject, be a denunciation of war."

McLeod was accordingly remanded to take his trial in the ordinary course of law, and was tried and acquitted, having proved an alibi.

Nothwithstanding the deference which is to be paid to the opinion of so eminent a judge, it is believed that the grounds taken by him, in the language above quoted, are to a great extent fallacious.

1. In the first place it is to be observed that the juncture of circumstances which can alone tolerate the action of the law of self-defence, is by no means as clearly defined—at least in the United States—as the learned justice states it to be. It is true that, on the one hand, we find the rule stated in many cases, that the danger which alone will warrant a person in striking in his defence must be impending and about to fall at the time the act of defence is resorted to, or, at least, this must be apparent to the comprehension of a reasonable man. (People v. Sullivan, 3 Selden, 396; Harrison v. State, 24 Ala. 67; Creek v. State, 24 Ind. 151; Shorter v. People, 2 Comst. 193; Logue v. Com., 2 Wright, 265; State v. Scott, 4 Ired. 409; Dyson v. State, 26 Miss. 362; Cotton v. State, 31 Miss. 504; Wesley v. State, 37 Miss. 327; Evans v. State, 44 Miss. 762; Head v. State, 44 Miss. 731; Rippy v. State, 2 Head, 217; Williams v. State, 3 Heiskell, 376; Lander v. State, 12 Tex. 462.) These cases state the general rule, and the application of it is, of course, in criminal trials, left to the jury. So, it has been said that the right of attack for the purpose of defence does not arise until the person defending has done everything in his power to avoid its necessity. (People v. Sullivan, supra; State v. Shippey, 10 Minn. 223.) On the other hand, the doctrine of these last two cases is distinctly repudiated in three cases in Kentucky, where it is held that a person who has once escaped from assassination at the hands of a desperate and persevering enemy, may kill such enemy whenever and wherever he may chance to meet him, so long as such enemy gives evidence that his murderous purpose continues. (Philips v. Com., 2 Duvall, 328; Carico v. Com., 7 Bush, 124; Bohannon v. Com., 8 Bush, 481.) And in three other well-considered judgments, it has been declared that no general rule on the subject applicable to all cases can be laid down, but that each case must depend to a great extent upon its own exigencies. Cotton v. State, supra; Patterson v People, 18 Mich. 330, 334; Jackson v. State, Supreme Court Term, 1873.

2. If no settled rule can be laid down in advance which shall determine the exigencies in which a person will be permitted to strike in his private defence, the attempt to apply to a state of private or mixed war, the rules which are supposed to be settled in regard to private defence, must be entirely fallacious. Thus, in a state of civil society, we say, as was said by Mr. Justice COWEN in the case we are considering, that the right to strike in one's defence does not arise while the threatened danger exists in machination only; because, at this stage of the danger, it is always possible to appeal to the preventive arm of the law. But a state of war, be it public, private or mixed, brings with it an accumulation of mischief which the civil law is utterly powerless to prevent; and hence, in such cases the defender must be supposed to be remitted to a state of nature in respect of his right of defence; and in a state of nature, where there is no law to which the defender can appeal for prevention, it cannot be possible that he is obliged to sit passively and watch his enemy while he compasses his destruction, instead of attacking that enemy during his work of preparation. The principle laid down by Dr. RUTHERFORTH, as applicable to defence of life in a state of nature, would seem to be the reasonable and consistent rule to apply to such cases. He says: "This law [i. e., the law of nature] cannot be supposed to oblige a man to expose his life to such dangers as may be guarded against, and to wait till the danger is just coming upon him, before it allows him to secure himself." But he shows that in state of civil society he is obliged first to appeal to the civil magistrate before he can lawfully strike in defence against a mischief which is only in preparation. Ruth. Inst. b. 1, chap. 16, § 5.

The principles insisted on by Mr. Justice COWEN would have required Col. McNabb to attack the Caroline in his open boats in the middle of the Niagara river, or while moored under the guns of Navy Island, and to capture her, if at all, at a useless expenditure of the lives of his men; and this to satisfy a punctilious rule of supposed law, devised by some casuist in his library!

Applying these views to the case of the Virginius, if the Spanish admiral, though aware of her hostile character, could not, because of her American flag and register, seize her on the high seas, he could not, of course, pursue her into a friendly port and blockade her there; but would be obliged to allow her to steam quietly away, to run into some creek or bay under cover of night, and land her hostile expedition on the territory he was cruising to defend. Such a conclusion is opposed to all our ideas of the right of self-defence.

But if it were practicable to draw any illustrations from the principles of the common law applicable to defence by private persons which would be applicable to public defence against such an expedition as that of the Virginius, we should suppose that Americans would be content to rest the case upon that celebrated declaration of law by Sir MICHAEL FOSTER, which has always been a favorite rule with our jurists. That eminent judge thus laid down the principle of law applicable to defence against felonious assaults and attempts: "In the case of justifiable self-defence the injured party may repel force with force, in defence of his person, habitation or property, against one who manifestly intendeth and endeavoreth with violence or surprise to commit a known felony upon either. In these cases he is not obliged to retreat, but may pursue his adversary until he findeth himself out of danger; and if, in a conflict between them, he happeneth to kill, such killing is justifiable." Foster Crown Law, 273. This declaration of law has been frequently recognized by English and American jurists, and we believe has never been questioned. (See 1 East P. C. 271-2; Whart. Crim. Law, 7th ed. § 1019; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, 5th ed. § 853; Carroll v. The State, 23 Ala. 28; United States v. Mingo, 2 Curt. C. C. 1; Com. v. Selfridge, 1 Self-Defence Cases, 1; The State v. Thompson, 9 Iowa, 188; The State v. Kennedy, 20 Iowa, 569; The State v. Collins, 32 Iowa, 36; Com. v. Riley & Stewart, Thacher's Crim. Cases, 471; Bohannon v. Com. 8 Bush, Ky. 481; United States v. Wiltberger, 3 Wash. C. C. 515; Pond v. The People, 8 Mich. 150.) Now, applying this rule and the nomenclature of the common law to the case of the Virginius, it cannot be, and never has been, doubted that the persons on board that vessel at the time of her capture "manifestly intended and endeavored with violence or surprise to commit a known felony" against the government and citizens of Spain. At the moment of their being sighted by the Spanish admiral they were "manifestly intending and endeavoring" to land with a cargo of warlike material on the coast of Cuba for the purpose of engaging in private war against the government of Spain and those adhering to it. Viewed according to the common law, the attempt was in the highest degree felonious as to all engaged in it; for private war being unlawful and unauthorized war, or war waged by one without jurisdiction, as Grotius expresses it, it necessarily involves the violent felonies which the common law denominates murder and mayhem, and generally carries in its train those others which it respectively denominates rape, robbery, burglary and arson. Besides, all Spanish citizens on board were involved in an attempt to commit treason, a crime to which the common law assigns a higher degree and a more heinous dye than to any mere felony. Such being the nature of the attempt, the Spanish admiral might, according to this settled principle of the common law, "repel force by force," nor was he "obliged to retreat," but might lawfully "pursue his adversary" until he found himself, or the territory he was cruising to defend, "out of all danger."

Of course, what is here said has no reference to the summary execution of a portion of those found on board the Virginius, nor does Mr. Curtis or the other two writers to whom we have alluded speak of it except to condemn it. That question is supposed to depend upon other and distinct grounds of law. We may be permitted to suggest, however, that while our government has been swift to demand redress for an insult to its flag which had not been committed, it has been slow to demand reparation for the murder of its citizens by the authorities of Santiago de Cuba. We say murder, because it is believed that there can be no law—certainly none that Americans ought to recognize—which can sanction the putting to death by another nation of our citizens found on the high seas, upon the mere supposition, however well grounded it may be, that they intend to commit a crime against the municipal laws of such nation and within its territory.

Notes and Queries.

LITTLE ROCK, June 6, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Section 9, article 1, of the constitution of Arkansas contains the following provision: * * * "And no person, after having been once acquitted by a jury, for the same offence shall again be put in jeopardy of life or liberty." The constitution of Missouri contains a similar provision. In construing this section our supreme court held (GREGG and MCCLURE dissenting) that "where the indictment is sufficient in form and substance, and the defendant is arraigned, pleads, and the jury is empanelled and sworn to try the issue," a dismissal of the indictment without the consent of the defendant operates as an acquittal. Lee v. The State, 26 Ark. 260; McKenzie v. The State, ib. 334.

Digitized by Google

Has the Supreme Court of Missouri ever passed upon this clause in the constitution? Several volumes of the Missouri reports are missing from our library, or I would not trouble you with the question. G.

ANSWER.—We think there is no Missouri case in point. We have been unable to find any.

Legal News and Notes.

—HON. LUTHER S. DIXON, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, has resigned. He has held the office for fifteen years, and resigns it now to return to the practice of law, which he expects to find much more lucrative.

—CHIEF JUSTICE AGNEW, Henry W. Williams, of Tioga county, ex-Attorney-General Benjamin Harris Brewster, Hon. William A. Wallace, of Clearfield, Hon. W. H. Playford, of Fayette county, Attorney-General Samuel E. Dimmick, and Hon. A. T. McClintock, have been appointed by Governor Hartranft commissioners to propose amendments to the new constitution of Pennsylvania, under an act of the late legislature.

—IT appears from the preamble of the Tichborne and Doughty estates bill, recently introduced in the British parliament, that the expenses of the litigation occasioned by the claimant's proceedings, and which are payable by the present baronet, or, in the event of his death during minority, by the family, out of the estates, have already amounted to nearly £92,000. These are exclusive of the expenses of the prosecution for perjury, which were borne by the country.

—A CORRESPONDENT writes from Georgia that the bankrupt business in that state is flourishing. Everybody who is indebted seems eager to have all the property in his own possession, and in the possession of his friends, "assured" to himself, through the machinery of the bankrupt court. Our correspondent adds that the bankrupt law in Georgia is, in many respects, akin to the common recovery of old.

—IN the United States Circuit Court, at Portland, Maine, before Mr. Justice CLIFFORD, the case of Bradish Johnson v. Neal Dow was argued a few days ago. This was an action upon a judgment recovered by Johnson, who was a Union man, against Dow, in the sixth district of New Orleans, for sugar, silver spoons, knives, forks and a silver water pitcher, taken by a military expedition sent by Gen. Dow to the plantation of Johnson. The question was whether or not a Louisiana court had jurisdiction in the case.

—GOV. BAXTER, of Arkansas, has made the following appointments: E. H. English, chief justice, vice John McClure, impeached and suspended; Wm. M. H. Trapon, associate justice, vice M. L. Stephenson, resigned John T. Rearden, F. W. Compton, associate justices, vice Searle and Bennett, impeached and suspended; John J. Clenden, circuit judge, vice John Whytock, resigned; J. C. Davis, circuit judge, vice W. H. S. Clayton, resigned; Robert S. Fuller, circuit judge, vice George A. Kingston, resigned; J. N. Smithee, commissioner of immigration and state lands, vice Wm. H. Gray, impeached and suspended.

—THERE is no divinity that hedges a judge about and protects him from the catastrophes which are liable to befall other men. Some years ago Judge HARRIS, one of the most promising jurists on the supreme bench of Tennessee, lost his life by a steamboat explosion. More recently Judge PECKHAM, of the New York Court of Appeals, found a watery grave with the ill-fated Ville du Havre. And now we are obliged to add to the painful list Hon. CHARLES H. DOOLITTLE, of Utica, New York one of the justices of the Supreme Court of that state, who was lost at sea from the steamship Abyssinia, on the 21st of May. When his death occurred, he had been at sea but one day, the steamship having sailed on the 20th.

—SENATOR ROZIER recently delivered an argument before the Missouri state board of equalization, which is composed of the members of the state senate, in favor of assessing railroad property for taxation at the same rate at which other property is assessed. While it has been decided by the highest court in the Union that a special tax laid on railroad earnings for the purpose of liquidating the indebtedness of such railroad company to the state is valid, yet the mere mention of the proposition to tax railroad property for general purposes at a higher rate ad valorem than other property is taxed for like purposes, conveys an idea of injustice so obvious as to shock the conscience; and the fact that it was deemed necessary to make a speech against such a measure of taxation is one of the remarkable signs of the times. To tax one man's property at a higher rate than another's for the same purpose is not a whit better than highway robbery.

—THERE has been a conflict of authority between the civil and military authorities at Salt Lake. To appreciate the difficulty it should be understood that the civil authorities are Mormons. The telegraph states:

"A soldier from Camp Douglas was arrested for disorderly conduct. This morning General Morrow demanded the surrender of the soldier, to be tried by the military authorities. The surrender was refused, and Gen. Morrow ordered Captain Gordon, with a detachment of cavalry, to the city with orders to ask for the surrender of the soldier, and in case of refusal to release him by force. The surrender was refused, and the Captain proceeded to break open the jail and released the man, who is now in confinement at the military post. General Morrow some time since presented the subject of arrests by the civil authorities of soldiers to the war department, claiming that, under the articles of war, soldiers are to be tried by the military, and not by the civil authorities. The judge advocate general of the army approved of this view, and the secretary of war directed General Morrow to act accordingly. No resistance was made by the city authorities. The instructions from Washington in regard to the arrest and detention of soldiers by the Mormon authorities was printed in the papers here a day or two ago, and it is supposed a test case is intended to be made of the occurrence to-day, and that the surrender of the soldier was refused for that reason. The soldiers were cheered loudly by the assemblage of citizens witnessing the release."

—AN interesting suit has been on trial in the Fourth District Court of New Orleans, brought under the Louisiana civil rights law of 1869. The suit was brought by Capt. Peter Josephs, a colored police officer, who purchased a ticket of admission and presented it at the door of a theatre, and was refused admission unless he would consent to go to a part of the theatre other than the dress circle. The act in question gives to all parties a right of action for damages against the keepers of public establishments like hotels, theatres, steamboats, railroads, etc., who have excluded them from the legal enjoyment of the privileges of such establishments on account of race, color, or previous condition. This is the first tried of a number of suits which have been brought under the new law. The ticket expressed on its face the right of the proprietor to exclude the holder at his discretion, and assign him to a certain circle or part of the theatre different from that which he insisted on occupying. The court limited the plaintiff to proofs of breach of contract or claim for damages ex contractu. Theatre licenses, under the act in question, express the condition that the holders shall make no distinction of color, race or previous condition in the conduct of his business. Under the rulings of the court the plaintiff can only obtain such damages as he proves he actually incurred.

—THE manner in which the English courts keep the members of their bar in the straight and narrow path is aptly illustrated by what befell a solicitor the other day, as it is related by a leading English journal. If our own courts would be as strict in watching the members of their bar, the standard of the profession in this country would be greatly raised: "A motion was made before the Master of the Rolls to strike Mr. Greenhill off the rolls, on the ground that he had made alterations in an affidavit after it had been sworn. Mr. Greenhill's counsel admitted that he had done wrong, but as it was not done from any corrupt motive, but through excessive zeal for his client, it was hoped the court would not inflict a severe punishment. The Master of the Rolls said Mr. Greenhill was a solicitor of twenty years' standing, and therefore what he had done could not be attributed to want of experience. Although it was a case of excess of zeal, it could not be passed over. The court could not help feeling that Mr. Greenhill had no corrupt motive in making the alteration, but it was made in support of the affirmative of the main issue raised between his client and another party. That was a serious matter; and although he (the Master of the Rolls) did not intend to strike Mr. Greenhill off the roll, yet for the purpose of marking clearly his disapproval of Mr. Greenhill's conduct, he would order that he should be suspended from practicing as a solicitor for six months, and that he should pay the costs of this motion."

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JUNE 25, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

Municipal Debts — Mode of Enforcement Latest Phase of the Macoupin Case.

The Macoupin (Ill.) county bond troubles threaten to become as famous in legal history as those which have attracted attention originating in Wisconsin and Iowa. On the 18th inst. the United States Circuit Court (a full bench) granted a mandamus to compel the county board to levy a tax of one and three-fourth per cent. to pay the interest and principal of the court-house debt. Last year a similar mandamus was issued from the same court, which the board did not obey. At the last January term the supervisors, seventeen in number, were declared in contempt, were arrested and brought here by the United States marshal. They were fined $1,000 each, and the money was paid in to the clerk of the court. Afterwards the attorneys for the holders of the judgment against the county asked that the $17,000 be divided among the judgment-holders, alleging that the money was paid out of the county treasury. These facts were reported in the order of their occurrence, and it is reported that Judge DRUMMOND recently ordered that the money be so divided. He said the payment of the fine out of the funds of the county was not a satisfaction of the judgment for contempt, and that a capias would issue against the supervisors on that judgment, which he held to be still unsatisfied, so long as the allegation that the money was paid out of the public funds was not contradicted. The judgment for $1,000 now stands as a lien against the property of each of the supervisors, which can only be discharged by a personal payment of the amount.

Since the Watertown (Wis.) case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States (CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, ante, 161), more than unusual interest attaches to attempts to compel reluctant municipalities to levy and collect taxes by force of mandamus proceedings, and the above presents the latest phase of the Macoupin case.

Author and Continuer of Nuisance.

In the law of nuisance a question of very frequent discussion and somewhat variable decision has been, against whom an action is proper to be brought, where the property causing the nuisance has, since the creation of the nuisance, passed into new hands; in other words, whether the creation or the continuance of the nuisance is the substantial ground of action. The question has arisen alike with regard to the respective or concurrent liabilities of grantor and grantee, and of landlord and tenant.

In an old case the declaration alleged that the defendant kept and maintained a bank by which a brook was caused to flow around the plaintiff's land. The court said "there is not been any offence committed by the defendant, for he allegeth that he kept and maintained a bank, which is that he kept it as he found it, and it is not any offence done by him, for he did not do anything; and if it were a nuisance before his time, it is not any offence in him to keep it." The case is distinguished from those in which every using is a new nuisance, as the using of an aqueduct which takes water wrongfully from another. There, every turning of the cock to let the water flow is a new nuisance. Beswick v. Camden, Cro. Eliz. 520.

In M'Donough v. Gilman, 3 Allen, 264, it was held that in order to render a lessee liable as for a nuisance to a passageway for refitting a privy, the refitting must have rendered the privy more of a nuisance than it was before.

In Roswell v. Prior, 12 Mod. 635, the plaintiff recovered against the defendant for erecting a building which obstructed ancient lights. The defendant had leased the ground with the nuisance and contended that the action should be against the lessee. But the court said: "Surely this action is well brought against the creator, for before his assignment over he was liable for all consequential damages, and it shall not be in his power to discharge himself by granting it over, and more especially here where he grants over, reserving rent, whereby he agrees with the grantee that the nuisance should continue, and has a recompense, viz., the rent for the same; for thereby, when one erects a nuisance and grants it over in that manner, he is a continuer with an interest."

It is held that the lessor of premises for the purpose of carrying on a business necessarily injurious to the adjacent owners is liable as the author of the nuisance. Fish v. Dodge, 4 Denio, 311. See Brady v. Weeks, 3 Barb. 157; Kint v. McNeal, 1 Denio, 436 Also (in New York) that an action of nuisance against an assignee alone for maintaining a nuisance erected by his grantor was unknown to the common law, and is not authorized by the revised statutes. Brown v. Woodworth, 5 Barb. 550. So, if one erect a nuisance and then convey the land with warranty, he remains liable for a continuance of the nuisance. Waggoner v. Jermaine, 3 Denio, 306. A municipal corporation is liable for the continuance of a nuisance which it has created. Pennoyer v. Saginaw, 8 Mich. 534. More than 20 years before suit was brought, the defendant had constructed a sewer or water course through property owned and occupied by him. In 1845 he let a house, shop and cellar to the plaintiff (which he had previously occupied with the property). In 1851 the watercourse burst, damaging the plaintiff's cellar and goods. In an action for negligently and improperly constructing the sewer, and keeping and continuing it in that state, the jury found that it was not originally constructed with proper care, and it was proved that it had been continued in the same state. Held, the action was maintainable, both upon the ground of "sic utenetur," etc., and because it was in derogation of the demise to the plaintiff to allow what was before rightful to become wrongful to him. Alston v. Grant, 24 Eng. L. & Eq. 122.

The remedy for a nuisance, however, is concurrent. If the owner of land on which a nuisance is created lets the land, or if a tenant, after creating a nuisance, underlets, and the nuisance is continued, an action lies at the option of the party injured, either against landlord or tenant. Rex v. Pedly, 1 Ad. & Ell. 822; Staple v. Spring, 10 Mass. 72; Plumer v. Harper, 3 N. H. 88.

The action lies for the continuance of a nuisance, though the plaintiff has accepted money paid into court in full satisfaction of the original erection. Holmes v. Wilson, 10 Ad. & Ell. 503.

Digitized by Google

In Ryppon v. Bowles, Cro. Jac. 373, COKE, C. J., inclined to the opinion that a tenant for years is not liable for the mere occupation of a building erected by his lessor, and which obstructs the plaintiff's lights, because his taring down the building would be waste as to his landlord.

It is no defence to an action for continuing a nuisance, by acts done on the land of a stranger, that the defendant cannot enter to abate it without rendering himself liable to action by the owner of the land. Smith v. Elliott, 9 Barr, 345. If the plaintiff recover damages for a nuisance from a lessee, who afterwards underlets, the nuisance continuing, an action still lies against the lessee for the continuance. Rosewell v. Prior, Salk. 460. See 12 Mod. 635. In a late case it is held, that one who creates a nuisance is not liable for its continuance after parting with the property with which it is connected, unless he is benefitted by such continuance, or warranted the continued use of the property, as enjoyed in connection with the nuisance. Hanse v. Cowing, 1 Lans. 288. And, in another recent case, a lessee in possession under a lease which binds him to keep the premises in repair, is held liable for a nuisance, in connection with the general principle that control of the premises creates such liability. Fisher v. Thirkell, 21 Mich. 1.

In the case of French v. Richards (Leg. Intel.), partly, however, upon the ground of a statute of Pennsylvania, the lessee of premises destroyed by fire was held entitled to contribution from the lessor, for expenses incurred in the removal of a wall which was left in a dangerous condition. HARE, P. J., suggests the following important distinctions: "It is a general and invariable rule in equity that charges necessarily incurred for a common object, or in pursuance of a legal obligation, shall be so apportioned or distributed that those shall bear the burden who receive the benefit. Under this salutary and comprehensive principle insurers may be liable for goods stolen or destroyed during the process of removal from a building which is on fire; the ship-owner bound to contribute to a loss occasioned by a jettison of the cargo; a landlord compelled to refund taxes paid by his tenants; or a tenant for life or in common entitled to require that the co-tenant or remainder-man shall bear a due proportion of a charge or incumbrance resting on the land. A lessee from year to year has, by reason of the imbecility of his title, a stronger claim to protection against charges on the inheritance than a tenant for life. That the premises which he holds are destroyed by fire or devastated by a flood, will not, it is true, entitle him to call on the landlord for aid, or even suspend the rent. If he repairs the dykes or builds up the walls it must be at his own cost. If, however, under these circumstances, a duty is imposed by the law, which though primarily that of the lessor is yet obligatory on the tenant, and actually performed by him, the right to indemnity or contribution will be as clear as in the instances already cited; and such in effect is the case now in hand, because the walls being, according to the evidence, in a condition dangerous to all around, were a nuisance, requiring instant measures for its abatement. The obligation to do this devolved in the first instance upon the tenants, as the persons in possession, and who would have been liable civilly and criminally if injury had ensued. But inasmuch as the effect of removing walls that are unfit for use is to benefit the inheritance to the full extent of the expense incurred, the plaintiffs would probably have been entitled to call on the owners of the reversion for reimbursement, even if the duty of the latter had not been defined by statute."

It is generally held, in qualification of the liability for mere continuance of a nuisance erected by another, that the defendant had knowledge of its injurious character, or was notified or requested to remove it. Pickett v. Condon, 18 Md. 412; Brown v. Cayuga, 2 Kern, 486; Hubbard v. Russell, 24 Barb. 404; Caldwell v. Gale, 11 Mich. 77; Crommelin v. Coxs, 30 Ala. 318; Penruddock's Case, 5 Co. 100; Winsmore v. Greenbank, Willes, 583; Woodman v. Tufts, 9 N. H. 92.

In a late case, mere complaints and attempts forcibly to abate the nuisance were held not equivalent to the direct and unequivocal notice which the law requires. M'Donough v. Gilman, 3 Allen, 264. F. H.

Conclusiveness of Judgments of Sister States.

JOSEPH J. THOMPSON, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, v. JOHN WHITMAN.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 111, October Term, 1873.

1. Effect of Judgments of Sister States — Jurisdiction.—Neither the constitutional provision, that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedidgs of every other state, nor the act of congress passed in pursuance thereof, prevents an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court by which a judgment offered in evidence was rendered.

2. ——. ——. Record may be Contradicted.—The record of a judgment rendered in another state may be contradicted as to the facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction; and if it be shown that such facts did not exist, the record will be a nullity, notwithstanding it may recite that they did exist.

3. ——. ——. ——. In what Particulars.—Want of jurisdiction may be shown either as to the subject matter or the person, or, in proceedings in rem, as to the thing.

4. ——. ——. ——. Case in Judgment.—By a law of New Jersey non-residents were prohibited from raking clams and oysters in the waters of that state under penalty of forfeiture of the vessel employed, and any two justices of the county in which the seizure of the vessel should be made were authorized, on information given, to hear and determine the case: Held, that if the seizure was not made in the county where the prosecution took place, the justices of that county had no jurisdiction, and that this fact might be enquired into in an action for making such seizure brought in New York, notwithstanding the record of a conviction was produced which stated that the seizure was made within such county.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action of trespass for taking and carrying away goods, originally brought in the Superior Court of New York City, and removed by the defendant (now plaintiff in error) into the circuit court of the United States. The declaration charges that on the 26th of September, 1862, the defendant, with force and arms, on the high seas, in the outward vicinity of the port of New York, and within the southern district of New York, seized and took the sloop Ann L. Whitman, with her tackle, furniture, etc., the property of the plaintiff, and carried away and converted the same. The defendant pleaded not guilty and a special plea in bar. The latter plea justified the trespass by setting up that the plaintiff, a resident of New York, on the day of seizure, was raking and gathering clams with said sloop in the waters of New Jersey, to-wit, within the limits of the county of Monmouth, contrary to a law of that state, and that by virtue of said law the defendant, who was sheriff of said county, seized the sloop within the limits thereof, and informed against her before two justices of the peace of said county, by whom she was condemned and ordered to be sold. In answer to this plea the plaintiff took issue as to the place of seizure, denying that it was within the state of New Jersey, or the county of Monmouth, thus challenging the jurisdiction of the justices, as well as the right of the defendant to make the seizure. On the trial conflicting testimony was given upon this point, but the defendant produced a record of the proceedings before the justices, which stated the offence as having been committed, and the seizure as made, within the county of Monmouth, with a history of the proceedings to the condemnation and order of sale. The defendant claimed that this record was conclusive both as to the jurisdiction of the court and the merits of the case, and that it was a bar to the action, and requested the court so to charge the jury. But this was refused, and the court charged that the said record was only prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and threw upon the plaintiff the burthen of proving the contrary. The defendant excepted, and the jury, under the direction of the court, found for the plaintiff generally, and, in answer to certain questions framed by the court, found specially, first, that the seizure was made within the state of New Jersey; secondly, that it was not made in the county of Monmouth; thirdly, that the plaintiff was not engaged on the day of the seizure in taking clams within the limits of the county of Monmouth. Judgment being rendered for the plaintiff, the case is brought here for review.

Digitized by Google

The main question in the cause is, whether the record produced by the defendant was conclusive of the jurisdictional facts therein contained. It stated, with due particularity, sufficient facts to give the justices jurisdiction under the law of New Jersey. Could that statement be questioned collaterally in another action brought in another state? If it could be, the ruling of the court was substantially correct. If not, there was error. It is true that the court charged generally that the record was only prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein; but as the jurisdictional question was the principal question at issue, and as the jury was required to find specially thereon, the charge may be regarded as having reference to the question of jurisdiction. And if upon that question it was correct, no injury was done the to defendant.

Without that provision of the constitution of the United States which declares that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state," and the act of congress passed to carry it into effect, it is clear that the record in question would not be conclusive as to the facts necessary to give the justices of Monmouth county jurisdiction, whatever might be its effect in New Jersey. In any other state it would be regarded like any foreign judgment; and as to a foreign judgment it is perfectly well settled that the enquiry is always open, whether the court by which it was rendered had jurisdiction of the person or the thing. "Upon principle," says Chief Justice MARSHALL, "it would seem that the operation of every judgment must depend on the power of the court to render that judgment; or, in other words, on its jurisdiction over the subject-matter which it has determined. In some cases that jurisdiction unquestionably depends as well on the state of the thing as on the constitution of the court. If, by any means whatever, a prize court should be induced to condemn, as prize of war, a vessel which was never captured, it could not be contended that this condemnation operated a change of property. Upon principle, then, it would seem that, to a certain extent, the capacity of the court to act upon the thing condemned, arising from its being within, or without, its jurisdiction, as well as the constitution of the court, may be considered by that tribunal which is to decide on the effect of the sentence." Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch, 269 To the same effect see Story on the Constitution, chap. xxix.; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 540.

The act of congress above referred to, which was passed 26th of May, 1790 (1 Stat. 122), after providing for the mode of authenticating the said records and judicial proceedings of the states, declares, "and the acts, records, and judicial proceedings, authenticated as aforesaid, shall have such faith and credit given to them, in every court in the United States, as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from whence the said records are or shall be taken." It has been supposed that this act, in connection with the constitutional provision which it was intended to carry out, had the effect of rendering the judgments of each state equivalent to domestic judgments in every other state, or at least of giving to them in every other state the same effect, in all respects, which they have in the state where they were rendered. And the language of this court in Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 484, seemed to give countenance to this idea. The court in that case held that the act gave to the judgments of each state the same conclusive effect, as records, in all the states, as they had at home; and that nil debet could not be pleaded to an action brought thereon in another state. This decision has never been departed from in relation to the general effect of such judgments where the questions raised were not questions of jurisdiction. But where the jurisdiction of the court which rendered the judgment has been assailed, quite a different view has prevailed. Justice STORY, who pronounced the judgment in Mills v. Duryee, in his Commentary on the Constitution, after stating the general doctrine established by that case with regard to the conclusive effect of judgments of one state in every other state, adds: "But this does not prevent an enquiry into the jurisdiction of the court in which the original judgment was given, to pronounce it; or the right of the state itself to exercise authority over the person or the subject-matter. The constitution did not mean to confer [upon the states] a new power or jurisdiction; but simply to regulate the effect of the acknowledged jurisdiction over persons and things within their territory." Com. on Const. § 1313.

In the Commentary on the Conflict of Laws, § 609, substantially the same remarks are repeated, with this addition: "It" (the constitution) "did not make the judgments of other states domestic judgments to all intents and purposes; but only gave a general validity, faith and credit, to them, as evidence. No execution can issue upon such judgments without a new suit in the tribunals of other states. And they enjoy not the right of priority or lien which they have in the state where they ware pronounced, but that only which the lex fori gives to them by its own laws in their character of foreign judgments." Many cases in the state courts are referred to by Justice STORY in support of this view. Chancellor KENT expresses the same doctrine in nearly the same words, in a note to his Commentaries, vol. 1, p. 281. "The doctrine in Mills v. Duryee," says he, "is to be taken with the qualification that in all instances the jurisdiction of the court rendering the judgment may be enquired into, and the plea of nil debet will allow the defendant to show that the court had no jurisdiction over his person. It is only when the jurisdiction of the court in another state is not impeached, either as to the subject-matter or the person, that the record of the judgment is entitled to full faith and credit. The court must have had jurisdiction not only of the cause, but of the parties, and in that case the judgment is final and conclusive. The learned commentator adds, however, this qualifying remark: "A special plea in bar of a suit on a judgment in another state, to be valid, must deny, by positive averments, every fact which would go to show that the court in another state had jurisdiction of the person or of the subject-matter." See, also, 2 Kent's Com. 95, note, and cases cited.

In the case of Hampton v. McConnel, 3 Wheat. 234, this court reiterated the doctrine of Mills v. Duryee, that "the judgment of a state court should have the same credit, validity, and effect in every other court of the United States which it had in the state courts where it was pronounced; and that whatever pleas would be good to a suit therein in such state, and none others, could be pleaded in any court in the United States." But in the subsequent case of M'Elmoyle v. Cohen, 13 Peters, 312, the court explained that neither in Mills v. Duryee, nor in Hampton v. McConnell, was it intended to exclude pleas of avoidance and satisfaction, such as payment, statute of limitations, etc., or pleas denying the jurisdiction of the court in which the judgment was given; and quoted with approbation the remark of Judge STORY, that "the constitution did not mean to confer a new power of jurisdiction, but simply to regulate the effect of the acknowledged jurisniction over persons and things within the state."

Digitized by Google

The case of Landes v. Brant, 10 How. 348, has been quoted to show that a judgment cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding. There a judgment relied on by the defendant was rendered in the territory of Louisiana in 1808, and the objection to it was that no return appeared upon the summons, and the defendant was proved to have been absent in Mexico at the time; but the judgment commenced in the usual form, "And now at this day come the parties aforesaid by their attorneys," etc. The court pertinently remarked that the defendant may have left behind counsel to defend suits brought against him in his absence, but that if the recital was false, and the judgment voidable for want of no tice, it should have been set aside by audita querela or motion in the usual way, and could not be impeached collaterally. p. 371. Here it is evident the proof failed to show want of jurisdiction. The party assailing the judgment should have shown that the counsel who appeared were not employed by the defendant, according to the doctrine held in the cases of Shumway v. Stillman, 6 Wend. 453; Aldrich v. Kinney, 4 Conn. 380, and Price v. Ward, 1 Dutch, 225. The remark of the court that the judgment could not be attacked in a collateral proceeding was unnecessary to the decision, and was in effect overruled by the subsequent cases of D'Arcy v. Ketchum, and Webster v. Reid. D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. 165, was an action in the Circuit Court of the United States for Louisiana, brought on a judgment rendered in New York, under a local statute, against two defendants, only one of whom was served with process, the other being a resident of Louisiana. In that case it was held by this court that the judgment was void as to the defendant not served, and that the law of New York could not make it valid outside of that state; that the constitutional provision and act of congress giving full faith, credit and effect to the judgments of each state in every other state do not refer to judgments rendered by a court having no jurisdiction of the parties; that the mischief intended to be remedied was not only the inconvenience of re-trying a cause which had once been fairly tried by a competent tribunal, but also the uncertainty and confusion that prevailed in England and this country as to the credit and effect which should be given to foreign judgments, some courts holding that they should be conclusive of the matters adjudged, and others that they should be regarded as only prima facie binding. But this uncertainty and confusion related only to valid judgments; that is, to judgments rendered in a cause in which the court had jurisdiction of the parties and cause, or (as might have been added) in proceedings in rem, where the court had jurisdiction of the res. No effect was ever given by any court to a judgment rendered by a tribunal which had not such jurisdiction.

"The international law, as it existed among the states in 1790," say the court, "was that a judgment rendered in one state, assuming to bind the person of a citizen of another, was void within the foreign state when the defendant had not been served with process, or voluntarily made defence, because neither the legislative jurisdiction, nor that of courts of justice, had binding force. Subject to this established principle congress also legislated, and the question is whether it was intended to overthrow this principle and to declare a new rule which would bind the citizens of one state to the laws of another. There was no evil in this part of the existing law, and no remedy called for, and in our opinion congress did not intend to overthrow the old rule by the enactment that such faith and credit should be given to records of judgments as they had in the states where made. p. 176.

In the subsequent case of Webster v. Reid, 11 How. 437, the plaintiff claimed, by virtue of a sale made under judgments in behalf of one Johnston and one Brigham against "The Owners of Half-Breed Lands lying in Lee County," Iowa territory, in pursuance of a law of the territory. The defendant offered to prove that no service had ever been made upon any person in the suits in which the judgments were rendered, and no notice by publication as required by the act. This court held that, as there was no service of process, the judgments were nullities. Perhaps it appeared on the face of the judgments in that case that no service was made; but the court held that the defendant was entitled to prove that no notice was given, and that none was published.

In Harris v. Hardeman et al., 14 How. 334, which was a writ of error to a judgment held void by the court for want of service of process on the defendant, the subject now under consideration was gone over by Mr. Justice DANIEL at some length, and several cases in the state courts were cited and approved which held that a judgment may be attacked in a collateral proceeding by showing that the court had no jurisdiction of the person, or, in proceedings in rem, no jurisdiction of the thing. Amongst other cases quoted were those of Borden v. Fitch, 15 Johns. Rep. 141, and Starbuck v. Murray, 5 Wendell, 156; and from the latter the following remarks were quoted with apparent approval: "But it is contended that if other matter may be pleaded by the defendant he is estopped from asserting anything against the allegation contained in the record. It imparts perfect verity, it is said, and the parties to it cannot be heard to impeach it. It appears to me that this proposition assumes the very fact to be established which is the only question in issue. For what purpose does the defendant question the jurisdiction of the court? Solely to show that its proceedings and judgment are void, and, therefore, the supposed record is, in truth, no record. * * The plaintiffs, in effect, declare to the defendant, The paper declared on is a record, because it says you appeared, and you appeared because the paper is a record. This is reasoning in a circle."

The subject is adverted to in several subsequent cases in this court, and generally, if not universally, in terms implying acquiescence in the doctrine stated in D'Arcy v. Ketchum.

Thus, in Christmas v. Russell, 5 Wall. 290, where the court decided that fraud in obtaining a judgment in another state is a good ground of defence to an action on the judgment, it was distinctly stated in the opinion that such judgments are open to enquiry as to the jurisdiction of the court and notice to the defendant. p. 305. And in a number of cases, in which was questioned the jurisdiction of a court, whether of the same or another state, over the general subject-matter in which the particular case adjudicated was embraced, this court has maintained the same general language. Thus, in Elliott et al. v. Piersol et al., 1 Pet. 328, 340, it was held that the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky might question the jurisdiction of a county court of that state to order a certificate of acknowledgment to be corrected, and for want of such jurisdiction to regard the order as void. Justice TRIMBLE, delivering the opinion of this court in that case, said: "Where a court has jurisdiction it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause, and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, until reversed, is regarded as binding in every other court. But, if it act without authority, its judgments and orders are regarded as nullities. They are not voidable, but simply void."

The same views are repeated in The United States v. Aredondo, 6 Pet. 691; Voorhees v. Bank U. S., 10 Pet. 475; Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. 511; Shriver's Lessee v. Lynn, 2 How. 59, 60; Hickey's Lessee v. Stewart, 3 How. 762; and Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. 540. In the last case the authorities are reviewed, and the court say: "The jurisdiction of any court exercising authority over a subject may be enquired into in every other court when the proceedings in the former are relied upon and brought before the latter by a party claiming the benefit of such proceedings;" and "the rule prevails whether the decree or judgment has been given in a court of admiralty, chancery, ecclesiastical court, or court of common law, or whether the point ruled has arisen under the laws of nations, the practice in chancery, or the municipal laws of states."

Digitized by Google

But it must be admitted that no decision has ever been made on the precise point involved in the case before us, in which evidence was admitted to contradict the record as to jurisdictional facts asserted therein, and especially as to facts stated to have been passed upon by the court.

But if it is once conceded that the validity of a judgment may be attacked collaterally by evidence showing that the court had no jurisdiction, it is not perceived how any allegation contained in the record itself, however strongly made, can affect the right so to question it. The very object of the evidence is to invalidate the paper as a record. If that can be successfully done, no statements contained therein have any force. If any such statements could be used to prevent enquiry, a slight form of words might always be adopted so as to effectually nullify the right of such enquiry. Recitals of this kind must be regarded like asseverations of good faith in a deed, which avail nothing if the instrument is shown to be fraudulent. The records of the domestic tribunals of England and some of the states, it is true, are held to impart absolute verity as well in relation to jurisdictional as to other facts, in all collateral proceedings. Public policy and the dignity of the courts are supposed to require that no averment shall be admitted to contradict the record. But, as we have seen, that rule has no extra-territorial force.

It may be observed that no courts have more decidedly affirmed the doctrine that want of jurisdiction may be shown by proof to invalidate the judgments of the courts of other states than have the courts of New Jersey. The subject was examined and the doctrine affirmed, after a careful review of the cases, in the case of Moulin v. Insurance Co., 4 Zabriski, 222; and again in the same case in 1 Dutcher, 57, and in Price v. Ward, ib, 225; and as lately as November, 1870, in the case of Mackay et al. v. Gordon et al., 34 New Jersey Rep. 286. The judgment of Chief Justice BEASLEY in the last case is an able exposition of the law. It was a case similar to that of D'Arcy v. Ketchum, in 11th Howard, being a judgment rendered in New York, under the statutes of that state before referred to, against two persons, one of whom was not served with process. "Every independent government," says the chief justice, "is at liberty to prescribe its own methods of judicial process, and to declare by what forms parties shall be brought before its tribunals. But, in the exercise of this power, no government, if it desires extra-territorial recognition of its acts, can violate those rights which are universally esteemed fundamental and essential to society. Thus a judgment by the court of a state against a citizen of such state in his absence, and without any notice, express or implied, would, it is presumed, be regarded in every external jurisdiction as absolutely void and unenforceable. Such would certainly be the case if such judgment was so rendered against the citizen of a foreign state."

On the whole, we think it clear that the jurisdiction of the court by which a judgment is rendered in any state, may be questioned in a collateral proceeding in another state, notwithstanding the provision of the IVth article of the constitution and the law of 1790, and notwithstanding the averments contained in the record of the judgment itself.

This is decisive of the case; for, according to the findings of the jury, the justices of Monmouth county could not have had any jurisdiction to condemn the sloop in question. It is true she was seized in the waters of New Jersey, but the express finding is that the seizure was not made within the limits of the county of Monmouth, and that no clams were raked within the county on that day. The authority to make the seizure and to entertain cognizance thereof is given by the 9th section of the act, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of all sheriffs and constables, and may be lawful for any other person or persons, to seize and secure any such canoe, flat, scow, boat, or other vessel as aforesaid, and immediately thereupon give information thereof to two justices of the peace of the county where such seizure shall have been made, who are hereby empowered and required to meet at such time and place as they shall appoint for the trial thereof, and hear and determine the same; and in case the same shall be condemned, it shall be sold by the order of and under the direction of the said justices, who, after deducting all legal costs and charges, shall pay one half of the proceeds of said sale to the collector of the county in which such offence shall have been committed, and the other half to the person who shall have seized and prosecuted the same."

From this it appears that the seizure must be made in a county, and that the case can only be heard by justices of the county where it is made—"two justices of the peace of the county where such seizure shall have been made." The seizure in this case, as specially found by the jury, was not made in Monmouth county, but the justices who tried the case were justices of that county. Consequently the justices had no jurisdiction, and the record had no validity.

It is argued that the seizure was continuous in its character, and became a seizure in Monmouth county when the sloop was carried into that county. This position is untenable. Suppose the seizure had been made in Cumberland county, in Delaware bay, could the sloop have been carried around to Monmouth county and there condemned on the ground that the seizure was continuous and became finally a seizure in Monmouth county? This would hardly be contended. But it is said that the seizure was made within the state, off the county of Monmouth, and not within the limits of any county; and, hence, that Monmouth county was the first county in which the seizure took place. If this had been true (as it undoubtedly was), and the jury had so found, still it would not have helped the case. The major proposition is not correct. A seizure is a single act, and not a continuous fact. Possession, which follows seizure, is continuous. It is the seizure which must be made within the county where the vessel is to be proceeded against and condemned. The case may have a casus omissus in the law; it is certainly not included in it.

As this disposes of all the errors that have been assigned, the judgment must be affirmed.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

NOTE.—In Knowles v. Logansport Gaslight Co., determined by the same court at the same term, the following points were ruled:

1. A return to a summons by the sheriff that he has served the defendant personally therewith is sufficient, without stating that the service was made in his county. This will be presumed.

2. But, in an action on a judgment rendered in an other state, the defendant, notwithstanding the record shows a return of the sheriff that he was personally served with process, may show the contrary, namely, that he was not served, and that the court never acquired jurisdiction of his person. The previous decision in Thompson v. Whitman affirmed and applied.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

This was an action on a judgment recovered by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error and one Harvey, in the Circuit Court for Cass country, in the state of Indiana. The defence was that that court did not have jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. The record produced on the trial was somewhat anomalous. Three defendants were sued in the Cass county court—Bain, Knowles and Harvey—none of whom resided in Indiana. Bain was served with process in New York, and after a long struggle to get the proceedings dismissed as to himself, removed the cause into the Circuit Court of the United States under the act of 1866, and obtained a judgment in his favor. The cause was then remanded to the Cass county court, and judgment by default was rendered against Knowles and Harvey. In some respects the proceedings seem to have been conducted as a suit on attachment, the property of the defendants (who resided in Minnesota) being attached, and other creditors being allowed to come in to participate in the proceeds. Nevertheless the records of the proceedings contained, amongst other things, the copy of a summons in the case, issued to the sheriff of Cass county, against all of the defendants, and a return thereto in the following words: "I do hereby certify that I served the within writ on the 14th day of September, 1865, upon Alfred H. Knowles and Thomas Harvey, personally, by reading the same to them. And I further certify that John M. Bain cannot be found in my bailiwick." The return was signed by the sheriff's deputy. This is all that appeared in the record on the subject of service of process on Knowles and Harvey, or in reference to their appearance or non-appearanee to the action. The defendant on the trial of the present action, contended that the return of the sheriff was insufficient to charge him personally in the former action, inasmuch as it did not show that service had been made in the proper county, or where it was made; and, being overruled on this point, he offered to prove by himself and Harvey that neither of them had in fact been served with process, and that the return was false. This evidence was excluded on the ground that the record could not be contradicted a in collateral proceeding. She case is brought here on a bill of exceptions.

Digitized by Google

Upon the first point, that the return was insufficient, the plaintiff in error relies on a decision of Mr. Justice NELSON, at the circuit, in the case o Allen v. Blunt, 1 Blatchf. C. C. R. 480, in which it is supposed to have been held that a return of service by the United States marshal, without showing that the service was made in his district, was insufficient to give the court jurisdiction of the person. What Justice NELSON held in that case was this: that inasmuch as the 11th section of the judiciary act declares that "no suit shall be brought before either of said courts against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process in other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ;" therefore, the jurisdiction of said courts depends on service or inhabitancy in the district, one of which should appear of record; and inasmuch as the record of that case contained no allegation on the subject, and the jurisdiction of the court depended entirely on the marshal's return to the process, the return was insufficient to give it. This authority, therefor, is not in point. The case was in the United States court, and depended upon the peculiar phraseology of the act of Congress referred to therein; whereas the case in Cass county, now under consideration, was in a state court; and it is familiar law that a court of general jurisdiction will be presumed to have had jurisdiction of the cause and the parties until the contrary appears. In our judgment, therefore, the return on its face shows no ground of error. It will be presumed that the service was made in the proper county.

But the defendant also offered to prove by himself and Harvey that neither of them had ever in fact been served with process, and that, in consequence the court had never, as to them, acquired jurisdiction of the person.

As this subject has been fully considered by us in the case of Thompson v. Whitman, just decided, it is unnecessary to go over the subject again. In our opinion the defendant had a right to show by proof that he had never been served with process, and that the circuit court of Cass county never acquired jurisdiction of his person. As this was refused him on the ground that the evidence was inadmissible, the judgment must be reversed. We do not mean to say that personal service is in all cases necessary to enable a court to acquire jurisdiction of the person. Where the defendant resides in the state in which the proceedings are had, service at his residence, and perhaps other modes of constructive service, may be authorized by the laws of the state. But in the case of non-residents, like that under consideration, personal service cannot be dispensed with unless the defendant voluntarily appears.

Jugdment must be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

Removal of Causes from State to Federal Court —Power of a Federal Court Pending a Determination of the Question of Jurisdiction to Protect the Rights of the Parties.

GEORGE B. WARREN, COMPLAINANT, v. STEWART IVES et al., DEFENDNATS.

Circuit Court of the United States, Western District of Michigan, March 21, 1874.

Before Hon. SOLOMON L. WITHEY, District Judge.

1. Removal of Suits from State to Federal Court—Power of Federal Court to Protect the Rights of the Parties pending a Determination of the Question of Juris diction—Injunction.—When a cause has been removed from a state court to a federal court, and the jurisdiction of the federal court is objected to, the federal court has power, pending the determination of the question of jurisdiction, to protect the rights of the parties; and where land is the subject of the controversy, it will, on a proper showing, award an injunction to restrain waste.

In equity; motion for injunction.

Norris, Blair & Kingsley, of Grand Rapids, solicitors for complainant; Eggleston & Kleinhaus, of Grand Rapids, solicitors for defendants.

WITHEY, J.—In 1872 Stewart Ives commenced suit by bill in equity in the state court of Mecosta county, against George B. Warren and others, claiming to be the owner of a tract of some four thousand acres of land, by title derived from Chauncy P. Ives, and alleging that said Chauncy P. Ives, prior to the conveyance to Stewart Ives, had, by deed, absolute on its face, of date July 15th, 1859, conveyed same land to George B. Warren and Frederick B. Leonard, to secure indebtedness from the grantor to the grantees. The bill claims such prior conveyance to be but a mortgage, prays for an accounting, offers to pay any balance found due to Warren and Leonard, and asks that the deed to them be decreed to be cancelled.

Warren and the other defendants, being citizens of New York, petitioned to have the cause removed to this court, which was opposed, but the state court held the petition to be sufficient and ordered the removal. In May, 1873, the papers were presented and allowed to be filed in this court. This was followed by a motion of Ives to remand for non-compliance with the act of congress providing for the removal of causes from the state to the national courts. After hearing that motion, my impression was that the cause ought to be remanded, but the question raised was new and the case an important one. I therefore reserved the motion for hearing before the circuit judge, and ordered it placed on the reserved list. Owing to Judge EMMONS' continued absence the motion has not been heard.

On the 25th February last, the cause and parties being thus situated, Mr. Warren, by leave, filed his cross-bill in this court against Stewart Ives and others, in which he sets up his title in fee to the land in question; claims the conveyance of July 15th, 1859, from Chauncy P. Ives to Warren and Leonard, was not only absolute in form, but made, executed and delivered as such, and not for the purpose of securing indebtedness. Statements are made in the bill for the purpose of showing the absolute character of the deed, and of the intention of the parties to it. The lands are shown to be principally valuable for their standing pine timber, and defendants, or some of them, have, during the winter 1873–4, cut and removed a large quantity of the timber, and were, when the bill was filed, still at work cutting and removing the timber. Complainant prays that his title be confirmed, and that defendants be restrained from committing waste, and from sawing, selling or using the saw-logs already removed, etc. A provisional injunction was issued, and an order granted on defendants to show cause. They have answered, and filed affidavits against the injunction. The showing is conclusive on the question of waste, and if the court has power to protect the lands from depredation, pending a settlement of the question of title, it should be exercised.

Jurisdictional questions are urged by defendants' counsel, and these I proceed first to dispose of. It is claimed that the bill filed by Warren is a cross-bill, and as such cannot be sustained, for the reason that there has been no removal of the cause of Ives against Warren and others from the state court. Again, that as an original suit, this court has no jurisdiction of complainant's bill, inasmuch as it covers the same subject-matter and is between the same parties in interest as the suit brought by Ives in the state court.

When the bill of complaint of Warren was presented to me for leave to file, and for an order for a provisional injunction against waste, I understood it to be framed with a double aspect, asking that the bill stand as a cross-bill if the motion to remand was denied, or as an original bill in case that motion should prevail. By reference to page 26 of the printed bill it will be seen that such must have been the original intention of the pleader, but its language very singularly asks that the bill may stand as a cross-bill in either event. Thus framed, the clause wants appropriateness and proper expression. After what complainant's counsel has said at the argument, that the bill was designed to be in the alternative, I shall so regard the case, and permit an amendment at once and without terms.

Digitized by Google

Touching the status of the suit brought by Mr. Ives in the state court, and sought to be removed to this by Warren and others, it is urged that inasmuch as I intimated the petition to be defective, on the argument of the motion to remand, any exercise of jurisdiction now by the court over that case would be inconsistent with such expressed views, and prima facie unauthorized. This objection assumes the bill filed by Warren to be a cross-bill and nothing more, whereas it was, as already explained, presented and allowed to be filed either as a cross-bill or as an original bill, depending upon the disposition which should ultimately be made by Judge EMMONS of the motion to remand. As I shall show when the second objection is discussed, jurisdiction attaches to Mr. Warren's bill as an original bill if the suit by Ives is dismissed to the state court. But I entertain the view that, as a cross-bill, the court would be justified in asserting jurisdiction. The question is new, for I find no authorities to govern me; but prima facie, the suit of Mr. Ives has been removed from the Mecosta Circuit Court and is pending here. That court ordered the cause removed, and it was so far consummated that the papers were taken from that into this court, and are here filed and the case docketed. The state tribunal, by an order of removal granted after a hearing, judicially declared itself without further jurisdiction, and would not now probably assert further jurisdiction. The case is one clearly within the act of congress providing for the removal, and defendants in that suit have attempted, and, as they claim, successfully, to comply with the statute. This court has so far entertained the cause as to hear a motion to remand, after allowing the papers to be filed, and without deciding the motion, has allowed a provisional injunction to protect rights for the time being. The simple fact that the jurisdiction of this court is challenged does not raise a prima facie case against it, nor do I quite appreciate why a previous intimation against retaining the cause, but which intimation is not a decision, should have the effect claimed of preventing the court from giving such incidental protection as the rights of the parties require, while the jurisdictional question is pending and undetermined. For the present the controversy is pending here prima facie, and while courts are careful not to exercise a doubtful jurisdiction, they will not, while parties are before them under a claim of right, refuse to protect the interests of the parties in an emergency like the present one, from the fact that jurisdiction is questioned or even doubtful.

But, as I have already said, the bill by complainant Warren is not to be regarded merely as a cross-bill for the purposes of this motion. Whether it will stand here as a cross or as an original bill depends upon the future disposition of the motion to remand. It is claimed, however, that by the well-recognized rule of comity, this court will not entertain a suit where it appears the same parties in interest are litigating the same subject-matter in a state court. The proposition is fully conceded, and if we are to regard this bill as an original and not as a cross-bill, then the rule of comity insisted upon fails to defeat jurisdiction, for the reason that it appears that the question of an injunction to restrain waste is not involved in the suit by Ives against Warren and Leonard, and although the title to the land is in controversy in that suit, this court may properly entertain a suit between the same parties having for its object the prevention of waste pending the litigation in the state tribunal. Citizenship of the parties and the amount in controversy, as well as the subject-matter, injunction, gives to complainant the right to invoke the jurisdiction and power of this court to protect his rights in the land, and so far as those rights are not involved in the other suit, this court has no right to refuse what the act of congress imposes as a duty.

It is true this bill is framed to meet an emergency, and, therefore, is not more than an injunction-bill, inasmuch as it asks other relief than an injunction. The undetermined question on the motion to remand the Ives suit induced and justified framing the bill in this present aspect.

Should the Ives suit be remanded, it would be competent for complainant to so amend the prayer of his bill as to render it simply an injunction-bill, and under the circumstances attending the case, the court would so administer the rules of practice as to accomplish the end and purpose of jurisdiction instead of defeating them. It is one of the distinguishing features of equity that it adapts itself to the circumstances and rights of parties, when once its jurisdiction attaches, so that if it cannot give the precise remedy asked, it will grant such as the very right of the matter demands under the general prayer for other relief. Upon the whole I am not in doubt as to jurisdiction.

Authorities were cited and discussion had touching the abolute or conditional character of the deed of July 15th, 1859, by Chauncy P. Ives to Warren and Leonard; it is enough to dispose of that question for the present, that the showing here leaves that consequence in doubt. "Who owns the land?" is the principal and vital question at issue, and when the evidence shall be before the court, it can be more intelligently determined. Thus far the showing on both sides is necessarily incomplete, and, as it is ex parte, is unsatisfactory for the purpose of passing on the absolute or conditional character of such deed. This belongs to the final hearing, and should await that stage of the cause. Meanwhile neither party ought to be suffered to remove the timber, which is the chief value of the land. So far I feel constrained to go under the showing. But Mr. Ives having been suffered to remove timber during the winter of 1873-4, and having a steam-mill to be stocked from the logs got in part from the lands in question, to enjoin him from sawing and disposing of this lumber, would work great, if not irreparable injury to him. I am not disposed to do that which will break up his business, under all the facts and circumstances of the case. Mr. Warren is not without remedy at law for the value of the timber cut, or by replevin for the logs, if he is owner. If the deed is but a mortgage, then the land and remaining timber, worth not less than one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, are ample security for his debt.

The injunction will be modified to prevent cutting the timber, and continued.

INJUNCTION AWARDED.

Power of Married Women to Borrow Money in Mississippi.

VISER v. SCRUGGS.

Supreme Court of Mississippi, April Term, 1874.

1. Contracts of Married Women—Mississippi Statute.—The statute respecting the separate estate of married women, and their power over it, is enabling, and confers a legal capacity to make the class of contracts therein mentioned.

2. ——. ——. Power of Feme Covert to Borrow Money.—A feme covert has not the general power to borrow money, although it is specified in the note (signed by herself and husband) to be for one of the purposes for which she may make a valid contract.

3. ——. ——. ——. If, however, it is shown that the money was actually used for such purpose, her promise to repay would be binding. The actual use to which the money was put makes the liability.

4. ——. Liability of Husband.—A note given for money loaned the wife, signed by husband and wife, may not be binding on wife, but it is nevertheless good against the husband. In such case a deed in trust on wife's property encumbers the income.

Opinion of the court by Mr. Justice SIMRALL.

It is not now controverted that the statutes respecting a married woman's separate estate, and her power of disposing of and binding it and herself by contracts, are enabling, in derogation of the rights of the husband as at common law, and confer upon her legal capacity which she did not before have. In determining, therefore, her responsibility for a debt, it must be ascertained what was the subject-matter and consideration. If it comes within the statute, and is of the class of those for which she could bind her separate estate, then it is a legal demand, enforceable in a court of law. The statutes, so far as they go, relieve from disability and confer legal capacity.

Digitized by Google

Considering the note and deed of trust in this case as the promise and security therefor, given by the wife for a loan of money by Viser to her, two enquiries arise. First, has she capacity to borrow money at all? and, secondly, how is the question affected if borrowed for any of the purposes set forth in the statute? The purpose and consideration stand out prominently as the test and criterion of the validity. It does not at all advance the argument whether the contract is by promissory note, bond, or verbal. If a married woman can incur the debt at all, she may make a memorial of it in any form and dignity of writing.

Manifestly a married woman has no power to bind her estate for borrowed money, for that is not one of the obligations which she may incur within either the 24th or 25th sections of the statutes of 1857. Code, p. 336. She may contract for "family supplies or necessaries, wearing apparel for herself and children, or for their education." * * * (Last clause of § 25.) If she is under an obligation already to pay such a debt, she might, in order to discharge it, borrow money, and so apply it. The lender of the money in such case would be substituted to the merit of the debt of the original creditor. The transaction would not impose an additional burden on her property. The effect would be merely to shift a meritorious debt from one person to another. It might be very beneficial to her, by avoiding the expense and vexation of a suit, and procuring a postponement until her resources would be available. She might borrow money to defray domestic and family expenses, and apply it from time to time as exigencies required. The debt in this instance would be to the lender, instead of to the person who furnished the necessaries.

The general proposition remains true that the wife cannot borrow money. If that were all that was shown, no liability would be imposed upon her estate. But if the money was actually used to pay debts already existing for the domestic purposes named in the statute, or if borrowed so that the ready money might be paid for such expenses, and was [illegible] paid, it would be within the equity and policy of the statute to hold her estate bound to the lender. The merit and validity of such contract depend exclusively on the fact that the money in the first case actually extinguished a charge upon her estate, and in the second, that it was used to defray the expenses of the family. It is the use, and that only, to which the money is put, that makes the debt meritorious. This question arose in Brown and Wife v. Thomas E. Helm (MS. opinion). It was conceded that the feme covert did not, under the statute, have the power to borrow money. "But," said the court, "if the money was used in making purchases or discharging obligations which were within her power to make or incur, and the separate estate shall have received the benefit of it, she would be liable; but she should not be liable for any more of such money than was used by her as aforesaid." The principle is, that whilst a married woman cannot bind her estate for money loaned, nevertheless, if the lender can show that it was really applied to discharge a debt for which her estate was already bound, or to make purchases for the objects enumerated in the statute, then the lender may recover.

In making the loan, Viser took the risk that Mrs. Scruggs would devote the money to the purposes recited in the note—"purchasing family supplies and necessaries, wearing apparel for herself and children." If the money was not appropriated to exonerate her estate from valid debts, or to improve per property, or for the objects named in the note, or other objects for which she would incur liability, there is none resting upon her or her estate. The appellant, Viser, has failed to show such use of the money. It would follow, then, that the decree of the chancery court is right unless Mrs. Scruggs is responsible upon some other view of the case.

It has been strenuously pressed in argument that Mrs. Scruggs is bound by the recitals in the note and deed in trust, and that they operate by way of estoppel. Mrs. Scruggs could no more borrow money for the purposes named than for any other. The circumstance that charges her estate is not the intent or use to which the loan was to be put, but how was it used? Was it employed to relieve her estate from debt, or for any of the objects named in the statute? If not, the estate is not chargable. It is not a question of good faith, but a capacity to make a particular contract. Viser occupies no better position than if he had made the loan without a specification of the purposes. Suppose Mrs. Scruggs had given a warrant that she would apply the money as recited in the note, could a suit be maintained upon it? That would not be pretended. The recital of the objects for which the money was procured gives no validity to the promise. If there had been a verbal statement of the reasons for borrowing, and the note had omitted the recitals, containing simply the promise to pay, it would have been this transaction in legal effect. The right of recovery depends on the fact of how the money was used.

We are thus brought to the conclusion that the note, and deed in trust to secure it, considered exclusively with reference to Mrs. Scruggs' power to borrow money, would be null and of no effect.

2d. The next question is, is the deed in trust a valid security, regarding the note as the debt of the husband? It was ruled in Sessions et ux. v. Bacon et al., 23 Miss. 273, and other cases, that inasmuch as the wife had the power under the act of 1839 to convey her property absolutely, she had the lesser power of making a conditional conveyance—that she could mortgage for her husband's debt. This construction enabled her to pledge the entire separate property, its corpus and title in fee. This decision was made in 1852. Prior to this, in Berry v. Bland, 7 S. & M. 83, and Frost v. Doyle & Co., et ux., 7 S. & M. 75, 76, and other cases, it had been held that the debts of the wife could not be chargeable upon her separate estate held under the statute except in the mode therein mentioned. It was in this condition of the law that the revision of 1857 was made, which enacts, "and no conveyance or encumbrance for the separate debts of the husband shall be binding on the wife beyond the amount of her income." Last clause of sec. 23, p. 336, code. The first clause provides that the wife's property shall not be taken for the husband's debts, "nor shall such property, or any part, * * be sold, conveyed, encumbered or mortgaged, unless the wife shall join in the conveyance." We take the last clause as a limitation upon the right to encumber or mortgage for the separate debts of the husband. Although the notes are not obligatory on Mrs. Scruggs, there is no doubt they are on the husband. Whitworth v. Carter, 43 Miss. 66. Being void as to her, does that make them the separate debts of the husband, within the statute? Aside from this, we think that the preponderance of testimony is that the loan was made to the husband on the credit and faith of the deed in trust on the wife's property. In her original bill Mrs. Scruggs gives that complexion to the transaction. "She merely signed the notes and deed in trust for her husband, and as his security." In her amended bill she makes substantially the same statement—denies that any money was ever paid to her, or advanced to her to buy family supplies. The testimony sustains her pleading. The meaning of the words "separate debts" in the statute, is those debts for which there is no liability upon the wife or her property—debts for which the husband alone is responsible. Debrell v. Carlisle, 48 Miss. 691. In that case the note was signed by husband and wife, and secured by mortgage on her separate property. Part of the note was for a separate liability of the husband, and part was valid against the wife. Held, that the mortgage pledged the corpus of the property for so much of the debt as the wife could contract. But as to the residue, which was only obligatory on the husband, it would stand as security on the income. It was so ruled, also, in Foxworth v. Magee, 44 Miss. 432–4.

Digitized by Google

Under the statute of 1857 the wife may encumber her estate for all the liabiliites which she can by the statute incur. Such encumbrance extends to the corpus of the property. But for the debts of the husband the wife can only mortgage or encumber the income.

If Mrs. Scruggs were, through her separate estate, bound for this debt, then the deed in trust would take hold of the corpus of the estate to the full extent of her interest; but inasmuch as the debt was the husband's alone, the deed in trust encumbered no more than the income.

Wherefore the decree is reversed and cause remanded.

REVERSED AND REMANDED.

Removal of Causes from State to Federal Courts.

FARMERS' LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY v. SAMUEL MAQUILLAN.

United States Circuit Court, District of Kansas, June Term, 1874.

Before Mr. Justice MILLER, and DILLON, Circuit Judge.

1. Removal of Causes from State Courts—Act of March 2, 1867—Corporations—Affidavits.—Corporations are within the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stats. at Large, 558), in respect to the removal of causes from state to federal courts, and on a petition, and the making by the proper officer of the corporation of the required affidavit, are entitled to the benefit of the act.

The plaintiff is a New York corporation and commenced this suit in one of the state courts of Kansas, and afterwards made an application in the state court to remove the same to this court. The petition and affidavit for removal were made under the act of congress of March 2, 1867. The state court ordered the removal; and in this court the defendant moves to remand the cause to the state court. The ground of the motion is that corporations are not within the act of March 2, 1867.

Doniphan & Reed, for the plaintiff; Nathan Price, for the defendant.

Mr. Justice MILLER, orally delivering the opinion of the court, in substance said:

I think this motion must be denied. A great proportion of causes in the federal courts are those in which corporations are parties, and which come by transfer from the state court, and it was never before claimed to me that they were not within the acts of congress on that subject, or within the act of March 2, 1867. My impression in favor of the jurisdiction in this particular class of cases was so strong that I should have overruled the motion at once but for the circumstance that a decision of the Court of Appeals of New York, and a decision of the Supreme Court of Minnesota, were produced, the former doubtfully, the latter positively, denying to corporations the right to remove cases under the act of March 2, 1867, 14 Stats. at Large, 558.

I have considered the opinions in those cases, and with great respect for the courts whose judgments they pronounce, I think their views upon this subject are not sound, and that, not unnaturally, perhaps, they incline too much to narrow and cripple the federal jurisdiction. The history of the state court decisions on the subject of federal jurisdiction from the case of Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 464, shows that, if the state courts could have defined the limits of that jurisdiction, the fabric of federal jurisprudence, as it exists to-day in this country, would have been shorn of its beauty and symmetry, and the system of its efficacy and usefulness.

I am not impressed with the soundness of the argument that because corporations cannot make an affidavit, except through the proper officers, they were not within the contemplation of congress. I think that the proper officers of corporations may make the necessary affidavit to procure the removal.

I do not join in the condemnation of the act of 1867. It does not allow the removal solely on the ground of citizenship. It requires the requisite citizenship to exist, and in addition thereto requires the existence of prejudice or local influence to be shown by affidavit. In this respect the policy of that act is not unlike that which prevails in perhaps all the states in regard to the change of venue from one county, or one judicial district, to another. Johnson v. Monell, 1 Woolw. 390. The object in each case is to secure an impartial tribunal, and the federal courts are not courts for non-residents more than for residents, and no injustice is done to the latter to be compelled there to litigate controversies which they may have with citizens of other states.

DILLON J., concurs. MOTION DENIED.

Correspondence — An American Lawyer in London—A Day at the Old Bailey.

LONDON, May, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I said in a former letter to you I was pleased with the administration of law here. I had heard a great deal said before I came here about the "Old Bailey." It was always represented as an altogether unseemly place—a place where cases were disposed of in a summary manner and insufficient opportunity given to the defendant to be heard in his defence; where mostly atrocious men and women were atrociously tried; where the fact that the defendant had been complained of and brought into court to answer to the complaint was deemed to be prima facie evidence that he was guilty; the presiding justice sometimes propounding to the already confounded defendant the perplexing conundrum—"if you are not guilty, what are you here for?" Many a fourth of July oration would have lost its point if the fancied statements contrasting the way of doing these things in England with that of doing them in the United States had been omitted. Yet I have seen a judge in Massachusetts, who, when a jury returned a verdict acquitting a defendant, contrary to the tendency of his charge and expectation, look and act, for all the world, as though he had sustained a personal loss; or, for example, not unlike a hitherto hopeful administrator de bonis non when all of a sudden he discovered there were no goods to be administered. And more recently than that, I have heard a district attorney in Boston, in summing up, and when there was no opportunity to reply, say to a jury that he was justified in pronouncing certain papers that had been offered in the case to be forgeries, when in truth he had seen the papers and knew them to be genuine. Perhaps a little reflection ought to have satisfied me that there must be reasonable fairness, at least, in trials in England at this time. But I was desirous to see for myself. I had attended the courts at Westminster, and seen how admirably cases were heard and determined there—about which I may at another time write you.

Accordingly, with a friend from California, on Monday the 4th of May, I walked from Charing Cross up to Oxford street, down Holborn, over the Viaduct to Newgate and the Old Bailey. The exterior has an uninviting aspect. The same old, high, black wall, flush with the street, encloses the prison and the court on that side. Within, the court is separated from the prison by a court-yard. The jurisdiction of the court is defined by act of parliament. It is called in the act the Central Criminal Court. It has jurisdiction of cases arising in the police courts of the city of London, and certain metropolitan police courts. In point of fact, I believe its jurisdiction covers certain offences committed within ten miles of St. Paul's. The presiding judge is the Right Honorable RUSSELL GURNEY, the recorder of London. He has an assistant, Sir T. CHAMBERS, the common seargeant of the corporation of London. I sent my card to the sheriff, and was admitted. Mr. Justice GURNEY was presiding. A woman was set to the bar to be tried. The indictment charged her with the larceny of certain books. She pleaded "not guilty." A jury was empanneled. The counsel for the government stated the case briefly and very fairly. He introduced a witness by whose statement it appeared that the books belonged to the firm named in the indictment as the owners, and that they had been stolen by some person or persons from their store. Another witness testified that he saw the books on a barrow on the sidewalk, and the barrow was upset and the books spilled out, and that a man and the defendant were standing near by, and that one of them—the woman, I believe—took hold of the barrow to right it. He also testified that he had some conversation with the woman in which she denied that the man was her husband, whereas the man insisted that the woman was his wife. The witness also testified to some conversation with the woman in respect to the barrow and the books; but his testimony failed to show any original taking of the books by the woman or the possession, either alone or in conjunction with the man, afterward. The defendant was about to put some questions to the witness, when the judge very considerately said to her, the evidence thus far failed to connect her with the crime, and perhaps it were best to leave it as it was, which the poor woman had sense enough to do. Another witness was called, but he, too, failed to show recent possession of the stolen property by the defendant. Still another witness was introduced, who testified to conversations with the defendant at the time of her arrest, but this testimony only went to show that she made contradictory and incredible statements with reference to her relationship with the man near the barrow. The counsel then offered the examination of the defendant before the lower court as taken down at the trial; but the presiding judge, after argument and inspection of the examination, deemed it inadmissible, and excluded it. At the close of the government's evidence, the judge instructed the jury that there was no evidence to warrant a conviction; and they returned verdict of a "not guilty." I stayed to see another case tried in part. I was the more interested in the judge because he was one of the "joint high commission," and had, when in Boston on his way back to England, visited our own supreme court. His manner at this trial was admirable, having respect to the counsel, respect for the law and the rights of the defendant as well as those of the government. So fair a mind must have been fair as a member of the commission; and I am willing to believe his government appointed him thereto not merely because they knew him to be able, but because he was known to be honorable and fair also. I observed, too, that the jurors were attentive to the evidence, but asked no questions; the counsel for the government was respectful and gentlemanly, and where I had been told to look only for what is coarse, I found instead only elegance and refinement. PELHAM.

Digitized by Google

Important Bankruptcy Decision—The Amendatory Act of 1873 Unconstitutional.

Chief Justice WAITE, sitting in the United States court at Richmond, has recently delivered an important opinion in the case of Daniel Deckert holding that the amendatory bankrupt act of 1873, so far as it seeks to give effect to the exemption laws of a state, different from that which is given by the state itself, is unconstitutional. We have not seen the full opinion, nor do we know whether a written opinion was rendered; but we learn from the Albany Law Journal that the chief justice said that by article XI of the constitution of Virginia, adopted in 1869, every householder or head of a family was entitled, in addition to the articles then exempt from levy or distress for rent, to hold exempt from levy and sale under execution, etc., issued on demand for any debt theretofore or thereafter contracted, his real and and personal property, etc., to the value of $2,000, to be se lected by himself. By an act of the general assembly, approved June 27, 1870, effect was given to this provision. Under the original bankrupt law there was exempted from assignment by a bankrupt such property as was exempt from levy and sale under the execution by the laws of the state in which the bankrupt had his domicile when proceedings in bankruptcy were begun, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by the state exemption laws in force in 1871. In 1872 the Court of Appeals of Virginia unanimonsly decided (22 Gratt. 266) that the provision of the constitution referred to, and the statute giving effect to the same, so far as they applied to contracts entered into, or debts contracted before their adoption, were in violation of the constitution of the United States, and therefore void. On March 3, 1873, congress passed another act declaring the exemptions allowed by the state laws existing in 1871 should be valid against debts contracted before or after the adoption of such state constitution and laws.

The first question, the chief justice said, was whether the act of 1873, in so far as it seeks, in the administration of the bankrupt law, to give an effect to the exemption laws of a state different from that which is given by the state itself, is unconstitutional. Congress has the power to "establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." A bankrupt law, to be constitutional, must be uniform, and whatever rule it prescribes for one it must for all. If it provides that property exempt from execution, shall be exempt from assignment in one state, it must in all. If it provides that certain kinds of property shall not be assets under the law in one place, it must make the same provision for every other place within which it is to have effect. It is quite proper to confine the operation of the bankrupt law to such property as other legal process could reach. The act of 1872 excepts from the operation of the assignment not only such property as was actually exempted by virtue of the exemption laws, but more. It does not provide that the exemption laws as they exist shall be operative and have effect under the bankrupt law, but that in each state property specified in such laws, whether actually exempted by virtue thereof or not, shall be excepted. It in effect declares its own enactment, without regard the laws of the states, that there shall be one amount or description of exemption in Virginia and another in Pennsylvania. In this we think it is unconstitutional, and therefore void. It changes existing rights between the debtor and creditor. Such changes to be warranted by the constitution, must be uniform in their operation. This is not. The consequence is that the act of 1872 remains unchanged, notwithstanding its attempted amendment in 1873.

The act of 1872 gives effect to the exemption laws of Virginia as they existed in 1871. The bankrupt claims his exemption under a law passed in 1870, which does not apply to contracts made or debts incurred previous to the time the new constitution went into effect. That certainly was not before July 6, 1869, and certain of the debts were incurred previous to that time, so that the bankrupt is not entitled to the benefit of the exemption.

One of the contracts made by the bankrupt was entered into November 15, 1869, and the claim under it required that the time when the constitution went into effect should be determined. The chief justice, after reviewing the history of the constitution, said: "In our opinion the constion of Virginia took effect, so far as it related to the provision for exemptions, on the 6th of July, 1869, the day of its ratification by the people. It follows that the exemption laws passed to give effect to that are to become operative for the benefit of its citizens from that date." Since the foregoing was written, the Chicago Legal News of June 29, has come to hand, containing the full opinion.

Tribunals of Commerce.

The report of the royal commissioners on this subject, dated January 21, 1874, has lately been issued, and twenty-four out of the twenty-seven commissioners appointed, whilst expressing themselves as quite alive to the evils occasionally resulting from cases being tried at nisi prius before a court having no special knowledge of the trade or business necessary for a proper determination, yet, at the same time, deny the expediency of establishing tribunals of commerce. We may perhaps remind our readers that the reports of the select committee of the house of commons on tribunals of commerce made in 1871, drew attention to the very general dissatisfaction existing among the commercial community as to the manner in which mercantile cases are often decided in the superior courts—dissatisfaction caused principally by the delay and expense attendant on the bringing of the question in dispute before the court in a satisfactory manner. To remedy this state of things the committee advocated the establishment of tribunals of commerce. These courts, which were to be set up in various large towns in different parts of the country, were to be composed partly of legal, and partly of mercantile members, and they were to take cognizance, and, in fact, have exclusive jurisdiction over all causes that might be classified as commercial. The majority of the royal commissioners, as above stated, have reported unfavorably to this scheme, but have advised that in cases where there appears to be a necessity for it, merchants shall be appointed as assessors or advisers of the legal judge, thus preserving uniformity of judicial decision. The three commissioners who dissent are Lord Penzance, Sir Sydney Waterlow and Mr. Ayerton, whose opinions, of course, carry with them great weight and authority. Lord Penzance reports favorably of the plan on the ground of its greater speed and less expense; Sir Sydney Waterlow sees its advantage in the fact that friendly business relations where a dispute has arisen, would be sooner resumed, if the differences between two firms were settled by brother merchants, and not subjected to the prolonged ordeal of an action at law; and Mr. Ayerton that the scheme proposed would provide for commercial disputes that special treatment which they require whilst under adjudication.

Digitized by Google

The government will, no doubt, adopt the report, and in fact the judicature act already contains provisions by which the judges may sit with skilled assessors having technical knowledge or practical experience of the matter in hand.—Banker's Magazine.

Book Notices.

THE LAW OF DESIGN PATENTS. Containing all reported decisions of the United States courts and the patent office in design cases in A. D. 1874, with digests and treatise. By WILLIAM EDGAR SIMONDS, counselor at law. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co. 1874.

This is one of those compilation of cases on a special subject which cannot fail to be useful. The collection of court cases and patent office decisions is full and complete, excepting that the case of Binns v. Woodruff, 4 Wash. 52, is omitted from the former; for though this case was decided before the act of 1842—the present design act—it is quite as important as if it were subsequent. In the court cases drawings of the devices have been introduced, thus giving a clearer understanding of the decisions, but thereby making the omission of such from the patent office decisions more marked. The index is not as full as it might, with a little more labor, have been made. For instance, there is no reference to any place where the fees required for design patents are given. A little attention would have avoided the use in the running head-line of p. 145 of the words "patent office," instead of "courts;" and a laudable desire to impart information would have suggested the propriety of indicating in which of the supreme court reports the case of Gorham Mfg. Co. v. White might be found, inasmuch as it is the leading case on this subject. These, however, are minor defects—errors of omission rather than commission, which, while they make a defect in the book, do not detract from its intrinsic value. Of the remainder of the book, consisting of 40 pages, in which the compiler essays the more difficult role of author, we cannot be quite so charitable, since it presents some propositions which, though most certainly "novel," are anything but "useful." On page 181, he says: "This latest act [1870] expressly makes design patents, granted under the act of 1842, extensible." If this were true it would be a strange piece of legislation, working serious results to the community, but happily the law does no such thing. The act of 1842, § 3, granted a term of seven years, with no extension. The act of 2d March, 1861, § 11, superseded this section, granting a different term, with privilege of extension to subsequent patents. The act of 1870 repeals all prior acts, gives the same term as that of 1861, but no extension, save to design patents issued prior to 2d March, 1861, and to these only "in the same manner and under the same restrictions as are provided for the extension of patents for inventions." Looking at the law to see what these "restrictions" are, we find that the "application shall be filed * * * not less than 90 days before the expiration of the original term of the patent, and no extension shall be granted after the expiration of the original term." Now, then, as the act of 1842 granted a term of but seven years, with no extension, and the act of 1861, superseding this act, authorized the extension of subsequent patents only, there could not have been a patent granted under the act of 1842 whose original term had not expired by March 2, 1868, and, consequently, no such patent could, under the act of 1870, be extended, unless in the face of the express prohibition of that act, that "no extension shall be granted after the expiration of the original term." Gorham Mfg. Co. v. White, p. 30 (14 Wallace, 511), is the leading case on the point of patentability and infringement, or test of identity, and yet the author strangely misstates this decision, and, as a consequence, deduces certain erroneous rules, or tests of patentability. On page 195, he says the supreme court in this case decides that "'pleasing appearance' is the chief end of patentable designs;" whereas, not only does the court decide no such thing, but does not even use the word "pleasing" anywhere in the opinion. It does decide, however, that "sameness of appearance" and "the resultant effect" are the true tests. If it were "pleasing" appearance only that was within the purview of the law, one half, perhaps more, of the articles now covered, or that might be protected by design patents, would be excluded. In summing up the result of his researches (p. 195), the author lays down these tests: "1. Substantially unlike any previous design." If we insert "appear" before "substantially," no objection can be found to this. "2. Not absolutely frivilous in its character." This is too broad, inasmuch as in regard to only two of the ten different subjects of design patents enumerated on page 179, need the question of utility be considered at all. "3. Gives pleasing appearance in any degree, etc." This qualification, "pleasing," as we have shown, has nothing to do with the matter, and cannot be a test. We can scarcely acquiesce in the doctrine enunciated on p. 194 as to the similarity of functional and design patents in respect to the question of double use, but quite agree with him in the result of his argument in chapter 7, that the law of 1870 does not destroy the right of extension of patents granted under the act of 1861, and think the true ground for such conclusion is that the law does not attempt to do so, not that congress had no power to take this right away; for, since a notable decision of the supreme court, it may be questionable whether the old phrase "obligation of contracts" has not become obsolete as regards the acts of that body of law-makers. S S. B.

SENEY'S CIVIL CODE OF OHIO. The Code of Civil Procedure of the state of Ohio, and subsequent amendments and supplementary acts and statutes regulating the practice. With notes of the decisions of the courts of Ohio. By Hon. GEORGE E. SENEY. Second edition, revised and enlarged. 1 vol. 8vo. pp. 880. Price $7.50. Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co. 1874.

We quite concur in a view expressed by Dr. Hammond when he edited the Western Jurist, that the reviewer of a book ought to examine it as patiently and give his views concerning its merits or demerits as candidly as though he were writing a private letter to a friend who had asked his opinion about the propriety of purchasing it. But it is obvious that in most cases it will be impossible for an editor of a weekly law journal thus to notice the many books which are sent to him for that purpose; and the difficulty becomes greater when the book in question is one relating to local practice with which he is not familiar. Such is the book now on our desk, and therefore it cannot be expected that we shall be able to say anything concerning it which will be of value to the Ohio practitioner, or which will convey more than a general notion of its character to others.

Seney's Ohio Code resembles in its construction Voorhis' New York Code—a book which, we believe, has gone through eleven editions, and has, nevertheless, not got its growth. It simply gives the code of procedure of Ohio, amended and brought down to the present time, and collates under each section the decisions of the courts of Ohio in which such section has received exposition, or in which the same subject-matter has been ruled upon. The sections of the code are numbered and preceded by titles in small-capitals, indicating their substance; and the notes are likewise numbered, and catchwords in small-capitals are thrown in for convenience of reference. The index is nearly 90 pages in length, and appears to be all that could be desired. We do not observe any table of cases, but perhaps in a work of this kind the usefulness of such a table would not compensate for the increased bulk. We believe it is Mr. Bishop who has compared a table of cases in a law book to the hair on the back of a man's hand; its use is not obvious to the superficial observer, but the practitioner well understands it. The observation, however, would seem to be applicable not so much to works of this kind as to general treatises, where the searcher may frequently wish to ascertain the manner in which the author has presented or discussed the doctrine of a familiar case, or what other cases he has grouped with it. Of course a table of cases would possess some value in a work of this kind, but in a lesser degree than in a treatise, or even in a general digest.

The publishers say in their prospectus: "Thirteen years have elapsed since the publication of the first edition. During this period numerous changes have been made in the code by amendment, also by supplemental and other statutes; while its provisions, in many particulars, have received a settled construction by judicial decisions. These changes and decisions are found, amid other matter, dispersed through seventy volumes of statutes and reports. This work presents a complete copy of the code as it now stands, with notes of all the judicial decisions in Ohio, which, in any way influence its construction. By thus presenting in this volume, and as near as possible, at one view, all that is authoritative upon the code of civil procedure, it is believed that great labor and research will be saved to the profession." We quite concur in the last observation. It will be indispensable to the Ohio practitioner, and of great use to practitioners in other states, whose system of procedure is similar to that of Ohio.

Considering the slovenly manner in which books of a local character are generally manufactured, Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co. deserve the thanks of the profession for the excellent manner in which they have performed their share of this work.

Digitized by Google

THE FIRE GUARD.—A monthly journal devoted to fire insurance. Saint Louis: L. L. and Moses King editors and publishers. Terms, $1 per annum; single copies 10 cents.

This handsome monthly has now reached its third number, and has grown from a quarto of eight to sixteen pages. The matter is varied and interesting, but appears to be devoted chiefly to the very important subject of the prevention and extinguishment of fires. The information on that subject in the present number will be well worth the dollar of every subscriber. The youthful editors have favored us in this number with their portraits, handsomely engraved, one of which looks familiar. Although we have never had the pleasure of the acquaintance of either of them, yet from what we have heard of them, we believe they have begun the battle of life in the right way; and unless their fame exceeds their deserts, St. Louis will one day number them among her most honored citizens.

Notes of Cases.

Bankrupt Act—Waiver of Exemption.—Chief Justice WAITE sitting in the circuit court at Richmond, Virginia, has recently given an opinion in the case of Joseph Solomon, a bankrupt, in which the district court had declared that the provisions of the state law of June, 1870, allowing a waiver of he exemption, were unconstitutional. The bankrupt had, under the law, waived his right by a clause in a note to his creditors. The chief justice said that the exemption laws did not intend to exempt absolutely, but gave a householder the right to claim an exemption. This he must do before a sale, or he could not have an exemption. If he has the right to waive at the time of sale by refusing to select, there is no reason why he cannot waive before. The chief justice decided that the legislature acted within the scope of its constitutional powers in passing the law of 1870, and reversed the judgment of the district court.

Liability of a Public Corporation to a Contractor where the Specifications of the Engineer of the Corporation Cannot be Carried Out.—An interesting case (Thow v. The Corporation of London) has recently been decided in the English Court of Exchequer, before the Lord Chief Baron and Barons PIGOTT and AMPLETT. The point ruled is that where a contractor contracts to do a peice of work for a public corporation, according to specifications submitted by the engineer of the corporation, and in the progress of the work it is found impracticable to carry out the specifications, and the contractor, at the suggestion of the engineer, proceeds to complete the work in a different manner from the original specifications, whereby more time is consumed than would have been consumed had the original specifications proved practicable, he cannot recover of the corporation damages for the increased time thus expended. The lord chief baron in giving his judgment said that the corporation employed an engineer to prepare the necessary specifications for the building of the proposed bridge, and caused advertisements to be issued inviting tenders for the building, and stating that the specifications were prepared and could be inspected. Thereupon, the plaintiff came forward, having, as must be assumed, carefully considered the proposals and the specifications, and he accepts to execute the work on the terms proposed and signs the contracts accordingly. The work was commenced in due course, and at a particular period of the work the plaintiff found that the original plans could not be carried out. The engineer of the defendants proposes a new mode of working, which entails upon the plaintiff great extension of time, and during that period the plaintiff entails serious monetary loss by reason of not being able to enter into other contracts. The plaintiff then complains and insists that the reason of the delay was the insufficiency of the specification, though nothing relating to that is to be found in the contract. The plaintiff urges that there was an implied term [condition] that the plans were such as were reasonably practicable, and could be carried out within the time mentioned in the contract, but no authority has been cited during the argument to show that in such a contract there is such an implied term. What, then, are the principles of the law on the subject? None are known which import any such implied undertaking, and to import it into the present contract would be to make a new contract between the parties. The corporation relied on the skill of the engineer by whom the plans and specifications were prepared, and had no means of knowing whether the plans could be carried out within the stated time, and the corporation was no more liable than was the contractor for the failure of the plans. Whether the plans had been badly or improperly prepared was a matter between the corporation and the engineer. The plaintiff has failed to show that he is entitled to the judgment of the court.

Baron PAGOTT agreed with the Lord Chief Baron, holding that while the plaintiff might have some claim in honor or equity, there was no legal claim against the corporation. Of the same view was Baron AMPLETT, who said that the case would be different in case the plans had been fraudulently put forward by the corporation, or by the engineer himself, with the view of imposing upon the plaintiff.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE 23d volume of Grattan's Virginia Reports will make about 1000 pages. About 800 pages are now printed.

—THE lawyers of Iowa have organized a state bar association, the first, we believe, that has yet been organized in this country.

—DR. Ernest Uhling has been sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment by the Court of General Sessions of New York city for the crime of burying a box of bricks. The point is that the box was shaped like a coffin, and the "doctor" held a policy of insurance on the life of a young woman whom he fraudulently represented to be dead and buried in the coffin.

—THE article in another column as to the respective liability of the author of a nuisance connected with property, and the continuer of the nuisance, when the property has, by conveyance or demise passed into other hands, is from the pen of the well-known author of the Law of Torts—Francis Hilliard, Esq., of Worcester, Mass. We shall be glad to hear from him often, and hope he will favor our readers with frequent articles.

—WE have received, through the courtesy of Julius L. Brown, Esq., of Atlanta, Georgia, a pamphlet containing the constitution and by-laws of the Atlanta bar association. This association is organized "to promote social intercourse among its members, advance their interests, and increase their usefulness to the public in the administration of justice." The officers are, L. E. Bleckley, president; D. F. Hammond, first vice-president; S. Weil, second vice-president; Julius. L. Brown, recording secretary; John Milledge, corresponding secretary; A. Stephens, treasurer.

—THE following is the text of the British demand upon Spain for compensation for the execution of British subjects found on board the Virginius, as couched in a dispatch from Lord Granville to Mr. Layard, the British envoy to Spain, dated February 20: "Her majesty's government consider that they are justified in demanding a reparation from the Spanish government for the execution of the British subjects in question, both in the form of a national recognition of the wrong done, and also of compensation to the relatives of the persons executed. Her majesty's government do not take the ground of complaining of the seizure of the Virginius, nor of the detention of the passengers and crew. The real ground of complaint her majesty's government hold is: that, even assuming the vessel to have been lawfully seized, and the crew properly detained, there was no justification for their summary execution, after an irregular proceeding before a drumhead court martial. No possible aspect of the Virginius and her crew could authorize or palliate such conduct on the part of the Cuban authorities. There was no pretence for treating such an expedition as piracy jure gentium." The British government have recently renewed this demand, stating that it has hitherto failed to press for an answer on account of the "grave difficulties with which the Spanish government has had to contend." In the meantime, what is our government doing to compel Spain to award compensation for the massacre of its citizens?

—IN 1854 the British parliament passed an act (17 and 18 Vict., ch. 36.) by the terms of which every bill of sale, or a true copy thereof, must be filed in the Queen's Bench office within twenty-one days of execution, otherwise it will be null and void against assignees in bankruptcy and execution creditors. Parties have found a device to evade this law by holding the bill without filing it until the twenty one days had nearly expired, and then executing a new bill, and so repeating this operation as long as it should serve their purpose. A bill has now been introduced in parliament to amend this act, which provides that "whenever hereafter a bill of sale is executed in consideration of or to secure a debt, and afterwards another bill of sale is executed in consideration of or to secure the same debt or any part thereof, the subsequent bill of sale, so far as regards a property in or right to the possession of any personal chattels comprised in or made subject to the former bill of sale, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes as against the same persons, and to the same extent as the former bill of sale shall, under the provisions of the act of 1854, or of the new act, be null and void, notwithstanding the requirements of the act of 1854 or of the new act shall be complied with as to the subsequent bill of sale, or the twenty-one days for complying therewith shall not have elapsed."

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JULY 2, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION:
$8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

THE NEW BANKRUPT LAW.—We print in this number the full text of the new bankrupt act. In order to lay this important law before our readers at the earliest date, we have set it up from a copy furnished by our correspondent at Washington, which is vouched for as correct, and we have no doubt of its entire accuracy. In a few days, however, we shall have an authenticated copy from the state department, and if, on comparison, any inaccuracies should be detected in the law as we now print it, our readers will be advised of it.

INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—NUMBER OF CREDITORS.—We publish in this number a very late opinion of Mr. District Judge BLODGETT upon the effect of the recent amendment of Sec. 39 of the bankrupt act as to pending cases of involuntary bankruptcy commenced since December 1, 1873, concerning the number of creditors who must join in the proceeding. The learned judge holds that the petition, in cases thus pending, must be amended or made to show that one-fourth in number and one-third in value of the creditors concur.

FEDERAL JURISDICTION UNDER THE 14TH AMENDMEMT, AND THE ACT OF APRIL 20, 1871, TO ENFORCE ITS PROVISIONS.—Under the existing railway regulation laws of Illinos, the state in its own name commenced, in one of the courts of the state, a prosecution against the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company, to enforce the law, and the company sought to transfer the cause to the federal circuit court, under the act of April 20, 1871 (17 Stats. at Large, 13). In an opinion delivered by DRUMMOND, circuit judge, on the 18th instant, and in which it stated that Mr. Justice DAVIS concurred, it was held that the cause could not be transferred, and the jurisdiction of the federal court was denied. The opinion of the learned judge is withheld until next week to enable us to get a correct copy.

"Township" Railroad Bonds Under the Missouri Act of March 23, 1868—Remedy of Bondholder—Cass County Case.

A subscriber has desired us to publish the opinion of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri on the subject of the validity of township bonds and the liability of counties therefor, and the remedy of the bondholder thereon, delivered at the November term, 1873, in the case of Jordan v. Cass County. We had intended to publish the opinion before this, but want of space has prevented. We give now a condensed statement of the case. The action was against the county of Cass upon bonds of the following tenor:

$1,000 "STATE OF MISSOURI.
Cass County Bond.

"Know all men, etc., that the county of Cass, in the State of Missouri, acknowledges itself indebted and firmly bound to the Pacific Railroad of Missouri, in the sum of $1,000, which sum the said County of Cass, for and on account of Mt. Pleasant township, hereby promises to pay said company, or bearer, at, etc., seventeen years after date, with interest, etc. This is one of twenty five bonds for $1,000 each issued pursuant to an order of the county court of the said county of Cass, made by authority of an act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, entitled 'An act to facilitate the construction of railroads in the state of Missouri,' and approved on the 23d day of March, A. D., 1868, and authorized by a vote of more than two-thirds of the voters of said township, to aid in the construction of the Pleasant Hill and Lawrence branch of the Pacific Railroad of Missouri."

The bonds were signed by the presiding justice and attested by the clerk and sealed by the seal of the county court of Cass county.

The petition asked judgment against the county for the amount of the coupons in suit, with interest, damages and costs.

The court (DILLON and KREKEL, JJ.) ruled the following points on a demurrer to the petition:

1. The act of the general assembly of Missouri, of March 23, 1868 (Laws 1868, p. 927; 1 Wagner's Stats. 312), authorizing township aid to railways, is not in conflict with the constitution of the state.

2. Art. II, sec. 14, of the constitution of the state, which prohibits the legislature from authorizing any "county, city or town" to subscribe for the stock of any railroad company, unless authorized by two-thirds of the qualified voters therein, does not restrain the legislature from authorizing township aid to railways, if two-thirds of the voters of the township shall sanction the proposition.

3. Whether the legislature could, in the case of townships, dispense with the popular sanction, doubted but not decided.

4. As townships were not incorporated bodies, the act of March 23, 1868, above mentioned, when the proposal had been adopted by the voters of the township, authorized the county court to issue bonds, in the name of the county, on behalf of the township voting the aid. Held (construing the legislation of Missouri):

(1.) That the owner of bonds thus issued by a county (or a township) had no remedy by action against the township, or taxable inhabitants theirein.

(2.) That the remedy of the owner of the bonds was by mandamus to the county court, to compel it to levy and collect the special tax which the act provided as the means to pay the bonds and interest thereon.

(3.) That such an owner could sue the county in whose name the bonds were issued, in the federal court, and recover judgmeut thereon; but that such judgment could not be enforced against the county or its property, or the tax-payers of the county at large, but only by mandamus to the county court to compel the levy and collection of a special tax, according to the statute in such case provided.

The demurrer was overruled and judgment was rendered accordingly in this special form. The opinion in the case concludes in these words:

"Upon the whole, our judgment is that the action is well brought against the county; that the county may make defence, but if the plaintiff shall be found entitled to recover, he may have judgment against the county for his debt, damages and costs, to be enforced, if necessary, by mandamus against the county court or the judges thereof, to compel them to levy and collect a special tax according to the statute in such case provided, and not otherwise."

The principle asserted in the above case that debts iccurred by or in the name of a public or quasi corporation cannot be enforced against the private property of the inhabitants, has since then been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Rees v. Watertown (Central Law Journal, ante, p 161.).

Digitized by Google

Exemptions Under the Bankrupt Law—Act of March 3, 1873.

It is well known that under the bankrupt law, as originally enacted, there was exempted from the assignment of property required to be made by the bankrupt to his assignee, among other, such property as was exempt from levy and sale under execution by the laws of the state in which the bankrupt had his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such state exemption laws in force in the year 1864.

By an amendatory act passed on the 8th June, 1872, this provision was changed so as to give the bankrupt the benefit of exemptions under laws in force in 1871. In 1872 the Court of Appeals of Virginia unanimously decided (22 Gratt. 266) that the provision of the constitution just referred to, and the statute giving effect to the same, so far as they applied to contracts entered into, or debts contracted before their adoption, were in violation of the constitution of the United States, and therefore void. After this decision, on the 3d of March, 1873, congress passed another act in the following words:

"Be it enacted, etc., That it was the true intent and meaning of an act approved June 8, 1872, entitled, etc., that the exemptions allowed the bankrupt by the said amendatory act should and it is hereby enacted, that they shall be the amount allowed by the constitution and laws of each state respetively, as existing in the year 1871; and that such exemptions be valid against debts contracted before the adoption and passage of such state constitution and laws, as well as those contracted after the same, and against liens by judgment or decree of any state court, any decison of any such court rendered since the adoption and passage of such constitution and laws to the contrary notwithstanding."

On the 6th day of July, 1869 the new constitution of Virginia took effect, in which it was provided that every householder or head of a family should be entitled, in addition to the articles then exempt from levy or distress for rent, to hold exempt from levy and sale under execution, etc., issued on any demand for any debt theretofore or thereafter contracted, his real and personal property, etc., to the value of $2,000, to be selected by him. An act of the general assembly of Virginia, approved June 27, 1870, gave effect to this provision by prescribing in what manner and upon what conditions such householder could set apart and hold such exemption.

The validity of the act of March 3, 1873, recently came before Chief Justice WAITE and BOND, circuit judge, in the U. S. circuit court in Virginia, in the case of Daniel Deckert, a bankrupt, a synopsis of which we published last week. After affirming that it was competent for congress to adopt the exemption laws in force in the several states, though the amount exempted was different (In re Beckerford, 1 Dillon 45), the court proceeded to notice the act of 1873, and held that it violates the principle of uniformity required by the constitution (Art. 1. § 8.) Speaking of this subject, the chief justice says:

"The act of 1873 goes further, and excepts from the operation of the assignment not only such property as was actually exempted by virtue of the exemption laws, but more. It does not provide that the exemption laws as they exist shall be operative and have effect under the bankrupt law, but that in each State, the property specified in such laws, whether actually exempted by virtue thereof or not, shall be excepted. It in effect declares by its own enactment, without regard to the laws of the states, that there shall be one amount or description of exemption in Virginia and another in Pennsylvania. In this we think it is unconstitutional, and therefore void. It changes existing rights between the debtor and creditor. Such changes, to be warranted by the constitution, must be uniform in their operation. This is not. The consequence is that the act of 1872 remains unchanged, notwithstanding its attempted amendment in 1873."

Deckert became a bankrupt March 31, 1873, and on the 20th day of August, 1873, filed his petition claiming a homestead under the new constitution of Virginia and the act of congress of March 3, 1873. Applying the principles above stated it was held that as to all debts contracted by the bankrupt prior to July 6, 1869, the bankrupt was not entitled to the homestead exemption, but was thus entitled as to all debts contracted after that time.

Admissions to the Bar.

Considerable discussion is going on in some of the law journals with reference to the practice of admitting candidates to the bar upon no other guaranty of fitness than the diploma of a law school. The law journals which have discussed the propriety of this practice, have, so far as we know, taken grounds against it. The Albany Law Journal, The Legal Intelligencer, the Washington Law Reporter, and the Daily Register have recently called attention to the practice, taking ground in favor of its abolishment.

The Albany Law Journal for May 23 contained a brief but pointed reference to this subject, which has called forth two or three commendatory letters. It said: "Within the past two weeks the ranks of the legal profession in this state have been swelled by the admission to the bar of about four hundred gentlemen. It is, however, doubtful whether the profession is to be congratulated for this accession. In 1871 the legislature provided that a term of three years' study should be necessary to qualify a person for admission to the bar, but at the same time excepted the law schools of the state from the provisions of the act. As the graduates of these schools are entitled, by statute, to admission to the bar, and as the term of study in some of them covers only nine months, and in none of them exceeds two years, the practical effect of the act has been to drive students to the law schools as a short-cut to the bar. These schools are good so far as they go, but that they are equal to the proper preparation of young men for the practice of the legal profession is not true. The instruction of the school combined with that of the office is to be preferred to the instruction of either alone; but if a young man can avail himself of only one, he would much better take that of the office. He will there get some experimental knowledge along with his theories, which he never can do at a school. We believe that no man should be admitted to the bar without having first studied the law for at least three years, and that at least a year of that term should be spent in the office of a practicing attorney. Anything short of this is an injury to the student himself. Every lawyer who has turned his attention to the matter knows that a premature rushing into practice without a competent knowledge of the law has blasted the hopes and ruined the expectations of hosts of young men who, properly instructed, might have acquitted themselves creditably. It is an old observation, and one generally true, that if a man does not obtain a character in any profession soon after his entrance therein he is not likely ever to obtain one."

Digitized by Google

The Daily Register pithily says: "The question then resolves itself into this: Who shall stand as sentinels at the entrance to the bar—members in active practice of the law and identified with the honor and dishonor of the profession, or those who have studied the theory of the law only and teach it to all comers who can pay the matriculation fee?"

It seems that in New York a law exists which provides that a certificate of certain law schools, setting forth the fact that the holder has studied law for two years, shall be held to be sufficient to entitle the presenter thereof to be admitted to the practice of the law in any of the state courts. Concerning this law, the Daily Register says:

"This law virtually denies to the judges on the bench and the lawyers practicing at the bar any authority to pass upon the qualifications, either mental or moral, of candidates for admission, except such as have studied for three years in some law office. We will not now stop to speak of this invidious distinction, but confine ourselves to the question: Is it wise in the profession to part, without a struggle, with the power to examine, by a committee of members in good standing, into the qualifications of men seeking admission to the most conservative, the most influential and the most honorable of all the learned professions? We think that a sufficient number of unworthy members have crept in under the system which this law overrides, and society has grievously suffered at the hands of those ignorant and bad men, but open wide the gate and let a professor's certificate insure ready admission to the bar and soon you will have our courts filled with mere theorists and speculators, whose blunders and mispleadings will cause great confusion and serious losses."

The New York bar association have recently had the matter under discussion, but with what result we are not informed. At a recent meeting of the Washington bar association a resolution was passed for the appointment of a committee to wait upon the judges, and to urge that the rule of court under which graduates from the various law schools in that city are admitted to the bar without examination, be so modified as to require a reference of the applications of such graduates to examining committees, for action and report as in other cases.

In St. Louis candidates for admittance to the bar must undergo a rigid examination before the five circuit judges, unless they are attorneys of some other court of Missouri, or have been graduated from one of the two law schools of this state. Out of each class of candidates examined, a large per centage is usually rejected; and candidates are not unfrequently rejected who have diplomas from the leading law schools of the country. It looks odd to see lawyers who have had twenty years' successful practice in other states sit down with the tyros and undergo a searching examination in the elements of the law; but justice to the public and to the bar require that all should go through this ordeal. And it has happened in these examinations that old lawyers, or at least that old men claiming to be old lawyers, have been rejected, and not improperly; and it has not unfrequently happened that young men who came armed with the diplomas of law schools, have betrayed in these examinations scarcely the faintest glimmering of legal knowledge.

Whether the diploma of a law school ought, without further examination, to entitle its possessor to admittance to the bar, is a question of much interest to the bar, and also to the public. Much, doubtless, could be said in favor of such a regulation, as well as against it. Considering the great work which law schools are expected to accomplish in the training of scientific lawyers, it has no doubt been thought wise to encourage their attendance by young men seeking admittance to the bar, by making a certificate of graduation a passport to its honors. But it would really seem that such effect ought not to be given to the diplomas of law schools whose course of study is only one year in duration, or to those of schools whose course is nominally two years, but whose yearly terms are but six or eight months in length. It is impossible that the best intellects, in so short a space of time, can do more than learn how to study the law; to say nothing of acquiring sufficient knowledge to entitle them to hold themselves out to the public as persons learned in the law; to advise clients and manage causes in matters involving life, liberty and property, and the dearest interests of society.

In Massachusetts, whose bench and bar have always maintained a high standard and exerted a great power upon the jurisprudence of the whole country, it seems that the diploma of no law school—not even that of Cambridge, renowned for its eminent professors, and for its thorough course of study, lasting three years—will entitle its possessor to admittance to the bar. A correspondent in the Albany Law Journal, of June 20, says: "Even if a student spend a three-years' course and graduates from the Cambridge law school, still he is obliged to submit himself to an examination by a committee of the supreme court, or by a judge of that court, and on written questions at that—questions numbering upwards of two hundred, and covering the broad fields of topics and subjects which are usually taught at schools of law—before he can be admitted to practice in the courts of the state. I speak from personal experience." We should suppose that if even Cambridge may not claim for the possessors of its diplomas an unquestioned admittance to the honors and profits of the Massachusetts bar, the lesser law schools throughout the country might submit to the same rule with advantage to the public, to the bar, and especially to their students, although it is quite likely that it might diminish their annual receipts.

Taxation—The Illinois "Grab Law" of 1869 Unconstitutional.

RUFUS N. RAMSAY v. CHARLES HOEGER, COLLECTOR OF TAXES.

Supreme Court of Illinois, Springfield, June Term, 1874.

Hon. SIDNEY BREESE, Chief Justice.
" PINKNEY H. WALKER,
" BENJAMIN R. SHELDON,
" JOHN M. SCOTT,
" W. K. MCALLISTER,
" A. M. CRAIG,
" JOHN SCHOLFIELD,
} Judges.

1. Taxation—Illinois Act of 1869 Unconstitutional.—The act of the Illinois legislature in force April 16, 1869, which provided that whenever a county, township, town, or city shall aid a railroad, the increase of revenue which shall accrue from such county, township, town or city, together with such revenue as shall accrue from the taxation of such railroad within the same shall be appropriated and set apart by the state for the liquidation of the registered bonds of such county, township, town or city, instead of being applied to general purposes, is in conflict with § 6 of article 9 of the constitution of 1870, and is therefore inoperative and void.

Digitized by Google

2. Exemption from Taxation--Contract.—A law exempting several municipalities from taxation does not create a contract between the state and municipality, although debts may have been contracted upon the faith of such exemption.

This was an agreed case appealed from Clinton county,

G. Van Hoorebeke, for the appellant; F. A. Lietze, for the appellee.

SCHOLFIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The question is presented by this record whether under the constitution and laws in force when the tax sought to enjoined was levied, a higher rate of taxation can be imposed for state purposes on taxable property in counties which have no outstanding indebtedness incurred in aid of the construction of railways than is imposed on taxable property in counties which have such indebtedness. That the tax levied by the act in force July 1, 1873, has been so apportioned is admitted by both parties, and it is claimed by the appellee to be justified by the provisions of an act in force April 16, 1869, entitled "an act to fund and provide for paying the railway debts of counties, townships, cities and towns." The only sections of this act bearing on the question are the first, fourth, fifth and ninth, and are as follows:

"SECTION 1. Whenever any county, township, incorporated city, or town shall have created a debt which still remains unpaid, or shall create a debt, under the provisions of any law of this state, to aid in the construction of any railway or rail ways that shall be completed within ten years after the passage of this act, whose line shall run near to or into, or through said county, township, city, or town, it shall be lawful for the state treasurer, and he is hereby required, immediately upon receiving the revenue of each year, to place to the credit of such county, township, city, or town, so having incurred such indebtedness in the state treasury, annually, for and during the term of ten years, all the state taxes collected and paid into the state treasury on the increased valuation of the taxable property of said county, township, city, or town as shown by the annual assessment rolls over and above the amount of the assessment rolls of the year 1868, excepting the state school tax and the two-mill tax provided for by the constitution of this state for the payment of the state debt; and whenever any county, township, city, or town shall have created a debt as aforesaid, it shall also be lawful for the collector of the taxes, and he is hereby required annually for and during the term of ten years, to pay into the state treasury all the tax collected for any purpose whatever on the assessment of the railway or railways for whose aid the said debt was incurred, including the roadbed and superstructure, and all fixtures and appertunances thereof—the locomotives, cars, machinery, and machine-shops, depot, and all other property real and personal of said railway companies within such county, township, city, or town, and immediately upon receiving the same the state treasurer shall place to the credit of such county, township, city, or town in the state treasury the whole amount so received, except the state school tax and the two mill tax provided by the constitution of the state for the payment of the state debt; and it shall be the duty of said collector of taxes to furnish the state auditor a separate and detailed account of taxes collected from said railway or railways at the time of his annual settlement with the state auditor; and the state treasurer shall give to said collector separate receipts for the respective amounts paid into the state treasury to the credit of said county, and said receipts shall be taken and received by the county court, or other legal authorities, as vouchers for the amount collected on account of the county and local assessment on said railway property in the annual settlement with such collector, and the several amounts of money in this section provided and ordered to be placed to the credit of such county, township, city, or town, shall be applied by the state treasurer to the payment of the bonded railway debt of such county, township, city, or town, as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 4. When the bonds of any county, township, city, or town shall be so registered, the state auditor shall annually ascertain the amount of interest for the current year due and accrued and to accrue upon such bonds, and from the amount so ascertained he shall deduct the amount in the state treasury placed to the credit of such county, township, city, or town, as herein provided and directed, and from the basis of the certificate of valuation of property heretofore provided to be transmitted to him, or in case no such certificate shall be filed in his office, then upon the basis of the latest assessment of such county, township, city, or town for the year next preceding, he shall estimate and determine the rate per centum on the valuation of property to meet and satisfy the amount of interest unprovided for, together with the ordinary cost to the state of collection and disbursement of the same, to be estimated by the auditor and treasurer, and shall make and transmit to the county clerk of such county, or to the officer in authority, whose duty it shall be to prepare the estimates and books for the collection of state taxes in such county, township, city, or town, a certificate stating such estimated requisite per centum for such purpose to be filed in his office, and the same per centum shall thereupon be deemed added to a part of the per centum which is or may be levied, as provided by law for the purpose of state revenue, and shall be so treated by the clerks or officers in authority in making such estimates for the collection of taxes; and the said tax shall be collected with the state revenue, and all relating to the state revenue shall apply thereto, except as herein otherwise provided.

"SEC. 5. The state shall be deemed the custodian only of the several taxes so collected and credited to such county, township, city, or town, and shall not be deemed in any manner liable on account of any such bonds; but the tax and funds so collected shall be deemed pledged and appropriated to the payment of interest and principal of the registered bonds herein provided for until fully satisfied. The state shall annually collect and apply all the said taxes and funds placed to the credit of such county, township, city or town, for and during the term of eight years, to the payment of the annual interest on such registered bonds of such county, township, city or town, in the same manner as interest on the bonds of the state, or may be collected and paid out in like moneys as shall be receivable in payment of state taxes, and for and during which said registered bonds shall remain unpaid the funds provided in the first section of this act, accruing from taxes collected from the property of said railway or railways, and the surplus of any of the other funds provided in this act remaining after the payment of interest on the bonds, shall be applied to the payment of the principal of said registered bonds, on presentation at the state treasury; or the treasurer shall purchase the same in open market at not more than par, and upon such payment or purchase of the said bonds, the amount paid upon the principal of said bonds shall be endorsed thereon, and receipts therefor shall be taken and filed in the office of the state treasurer, and the interest coupons or bonds, when fully paid, shall be returned to the office of the state treasurer, and shall be canceled and destroyed in the same manner as those appertaining to the state debt; and the fund derived from the taxes collected on the increased assessment over the year 1868, and the tax levied to meet the interest on said registered bonds shall continue to be annually applied to the interest of said bonds; and the said taxes and funds required in this act to be placed to the credit of counties, townships, cities and towns, shall be applied by the state treasurer to the payment of the registered railway bonds of such counties, townships, cities and towns equally and without discrimination.

"SEC. 9. The state auditor, from the total value of all the property in the state, after the same shall have been equalized in accordance with the provisions of 'an act to amend the revenue laws and to establish a state board of equalization of assessments,' approved March 8, 1867, shall deduct the amount of said increased valuation of the taxable property above the valuation of the year 1868, in such counties, townships, incorporated cities and towns as may be entitled to the benefits of this act, and the taxes upon which are herein directed to be credited to counties, townships, cities and towns, and upon the amount remaining he shall cause to be collected such a per cent. as shall be sufficient to pay the appropriations and other demands upon the treasury due to the end of each fiscal year, and the same per cent. shall also be collected on the said increased valuation above the valuation of 1869, and applied as herein provided."

Digitized by Google

It cannot be held, as insisted by the counsel for the appellee, that this statute constitutes a contract between the state and the creditors of the counties, townships, cities and towns intended to be aided, for the plain reason that the legislature was prohibited from making such a contract by article 3 of the constitution of 1848, which declares that the credit of the state shall not in any manner be given to or in aid of any individual, association or corporation. It is impossible to say that such creditors can have a claim upon the state unless its credit was in some manner given, nor can we conceive how there can be a vested right in that which cannot be granted. The necessary effect of the act was to exempt tax-payers in the counties, townships, cities and towns included in its provisions from the payment of so much of the state tax as is appropriated to the particular counties, townships, cities and towns. The debts in aid of which the appropriation is made are local only. Dunnovan et al. v. Green, 57 Ills. 63. They are created by municipal authority for what are, at least theoretically, municipal purposes, and therefore, for a sufficient consideration received by the municipality. It is upon this hypothesis, alone, that such corporations have been held to possess power to subscribe for shares of capital stock in railway companies and incur indebtedness to pay the subscription. Prettyman v. The Supervisors of Tazewell Co., 19 Ill. 406; Robertson v. The City of Rockford, 21 Id. 457; Johnson v. County of Stark, 24 Id. 85. It cannot be denied that at the date of this enactment the state possessed power to require that full and equal taxation should be levied for state purposes upon all the taxable property in the state, without regard to the indebtedness of the particular counties, townships, cities and towns favored by the act; and since the taxpayer is, aside from the act, liable to be taxed for the payment of the debts of the county, township, city or town in which his property is subject to taxation, it cannot be said that the state has received any consideration for the exemption granted by the act. We cannot, then, otherwise regard the exemption from state taxation, as contemplated by the act, than as mere gratuity, the continuance of which rested in the pleasure of the legislature and the sovereign power of the state. No doubt many persons have been, through a misapprehension of its proper construction or effect, induced to vote to incur indebtedness by particular counties, townships, cities and towns to a greater extent than they otherwise would, but we can perceive no difference between their condition and that of the individual who, relying on the continuance of the bounty of a friend or relative, contracts debts which the subsequent withdrawal of that bounty leave him to pay from his own limited resources. The rule is that exemptions from taxation are always subject to be recalled when they have been granted as a mere privilege and not for a sufficient consideration. Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 383. It is manifest, therefore, that a system of taxation enforced either by a new constitution, or by an act of the general assembly, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, would necessarily to that extent render it inoperative, although there might be no professed design to repeal it. Hills v. Chicago, 60 Ill. 86. It is argued that it was not intended by those who framed the present constitution to repeal any of the provisions of the act of 1869; that it was only intended to ordain a revenue system which should apply to the future. This may be so; yet if the language of that instrument is clear and free from ambiguity or doubt, it must control whatever may have been the design of those by whom it was framed. Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 69. It cannot be denied that when the general assembly did, subsequent to its adoption, enact a revenue system, such system was required to conform to its provisions. It surely cannot be claimed that, under the guise of enacting laws to give effect to the provisions of a constitution, principles can be perpetuated in diametrical opposition to those provisions. The present constitution contains the following, section 6, article 9: "The general assembly shall have no power to release or discharge any county, city, township, town or district whatever, or the inhabitants thereof, or the property therein, from their proportionate share of the taxes to be levied for state purposes; nor shall the commutation for such taxes be authorized in any form whatsoever." Section 1 of the same article requires the general assembly to provide such revenue as may be needful, by levying a tax by valuation, so that every person or corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his property. The language of these sections is so clear and unambiguous that there can be no necessity of resorting to the debates of the constitutional convention to ascertain their plain, obvious and natural meaning. The tax involved in the present suit is levied by virtue of an act in force July 1st, 1873, which is as follows:

"There shall be raised by levying a tax by valuation upon the taxable property in this state the following sums for the purpose hereinafter set forth for general state purposes, to be designated a revenue fund: $2,500,000 upon the assessed value of 1873, and $1,500,000 annually thereafter; for state school purposes, to be designated a state school fund in lieu of the two mill tax therefor, $1,000 000 annually."

"Sec. 2. The governor and auditor shall annualiy compute the separate rates of per centage required to produce not less than the above amounts, anything in any other act providing a different manner of ascertaining the amonnt of revenue required to be levied for state purposes to the contrary notwithstanding, and when so ascertained the auditor shall certify to the county clerks the proper separate rates per cent. therefor, and also such definite rate as now or hereafter may be provided by law to be levied and collected as state taxes."

This tax is levied on all the taxable property in the state, and it is not admissible either under the language of the act of the constitution that the proportional amount of each taxpayer, as determined with reference to such valuation in some counties, townships, cities or towns, there shall only be required to pay one-half or one-third, while in other counties, townships, cities and towns shall be required to pay that much more.

The duties of the governor and auditor in respect to this levy were purely ministerial. They had no authority to do more than compute the separate rates of per centage required to produce the amount of the levy, and when this was done, and the result certified to by the auditor to the county clerks, there was no authority in the law or under the constitution to extend it otherwise than equally upon all taxable property, in proportion to its value, as ascertained and determined by those upon whom the law imposes the duty of assessing it. Section 4 of the act of 1869, it will have been observed, requires the auditor and treasurer, after ascertaining the deficiency in the amount necessary to pay the interest upon the indebtedness of any county, township, city, or town, incurred in aid of the construction of railways for the current year, after deducting the sum which may have been received for that purpose, under section 1, to estimate and determine the rate per centum on the valuation of property within such county, township, city, or town required to meet and satisfy the amount of interest unprovided for, together with the ordinary cost to the state of collection and disbursement of the same, to be estimated by the auditor and treasurer, and shall make and transmit to the county clerk of such county a certificate of such estimated requisite per centum for such purpose, to be filed in his office, and the same per centum shall thereupon be deemed added to and a part of the per centum which is or may be levied and provided by law for the purposes of state revenue, and shall be so treated by such clerk, etc. This clearly authorizes the levy and collection of the amount necessary to supply the deficiency in the payment of the interest due upon the indebtedness of such counties, townships, cities, and towns, incurred in aid of the construction of railways, as state revenue; but it is expressly limited to the county, township, city, or town by which the particular indebtedness is incurred, and so far as the last clause of section 2 of the act in force July 1, 1873, can have any reference to the act of 1869, it must relate to this section. It certainly confers no authority to extend a tax levied for the purpose of paying municipal indebtedness incurred by one county, township, city, or town upon the taxable property of a different county, township, city, or town; nor does it authorize the $3,500,000 to be apportioned otherwise than equally upon the assessed value of all the taxable property in the state. No words that we can conceive can add force of expression to the language of the constitution before quoted: "but the general assembly shall have no power to release or discharge any county, city, township, town, or district whatever, or the inhabitants thereof, or the property therein, from their or its proportionate share of taxes to be levied for state purposes." Even the general assembly, which levied the present tax, derived its existence from the provisions of the same constitution, and if this provision was not binding upon it, it is impossible to conceive that it ever can have any obligatory force. It is impossible for us to escape the conclusion that under the constitution and law now in force, so much of the act of 1868, as requires the state revenue to be collected on the valuation of the taxable property in the state remaining after deducting in counties, townships, cities, and towns which have outstanding indebtedness incurred in and for the construction of railways, the increased valuation of the taxable property over that of the year 1868, is abrogated and cannot be enforced. The same question substantially as that represented by the present case was before this court in People ex rel. v. Kaskaskia Navigation Co., at the June term, 1872, and the views here expressed are in harmony with what was there said. We forbear the expression of any opinion as to whether so much of the $3,500,000 actually and legally levied for state purposes, as shall be collected from the increased valuation over that of 1868, which is claimed to be appropriated to the particular counties, townships, cities, and towns, can be maintained as a standing appropriation, as that question is not now before us. The decree of the court below is reversed and the case remanded with directions to that court to ascertain the rate per cent. required to produce the sum levied by the act in force July 1, 1873, for state purposes; to enjoin the collection of all state taxes levied on the property of the appellee in excess of that rate.

Digitized by Google

SCOTT, J., dissenting.

REVERSED AND REMANDED.

Forms of Action in the Territorial Courts—Mingling of Legal and Equitable Remedies.

JAMES HORNBUCKLE et al. v. JOHN TOOMBS.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 139, October Term, 1873.

1. Procedure in Territorial Courts—Forms of Action—Mingling of Legal and Equitable Remedies.—There is nothing in the process act of 1792, nor in the act organizing the territory of Montana, which prohibits the territorial legislature from passing an act providing that in the territorial courts legal and equitable remedies may be pursued in the same suit.

2. ——. ——. ——. Whether this would be so where the territorial courts sit as federal courts in cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, as distinguished from cases arising under the territorial municipal laws, quære.

3. Cases Overruled.—Orchard v. Hughes, 1 Wall. 77, and Dunphy v. Kleinsmith, 11 Wall. 610, overruled.

4. Dictum—Statement of the General Rule.—The court conclude that the practice, pleadings, forms and modes of proceeding of the territorial courts, as well as their respective jurisdictions, were intended to be left to the legislative action of the territorial assemblies, and to the regulations which might be adopted by the courts themselves, subject to a few express or implied conditions in their organic acts.

In error to the Supreme Court of the territory of Montana.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion.

This was an action brought by Toombs, the defendant in error, against the plaintiff in error in a district court of the territory of Montana, for damages caused by the diversion of a stream of water, by which the plaintiff's farm was deprived of irrigation, and for an adjudication of his right to the stream, and an injunction against further diversion. The action was framed and conducted in accordance with the practice as established by the legislative assembly of the territory, of which the following are the material provisions:

"Section 1. There shall be in this territory but one form of civil action for the enforcement or protection of private rights and the redress or prevention of private wrongs."

"Sec. 2. In such action, the party complaining shall be known as the plaintiff, and the adverse party as the defendant."

"Sec. 38. The only pleadings on the part of the plaintiff shall be the complaint, demurrer, or replication to the defendant's answer; and the only pleadings on the part of the defendant shall be a demurrer to the complaint, or a demurrer to the replication, or an answer to the complaint." * * *

"Sec. 155. An issue of fact shall be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial is waived, or a reference be ordered, as provided in this act."

The case was tried by a jury, who found for the plaintiff, assessed his damage at one dollar, and decided that he was entitled to seventy inches of the water. Upon this verdict the court gave judgment, and awarded an injunction as prayed.

The only errors assigned are based on the intermingling of legal and equitable remedies in one form of action.

Such an objection would be available in the circuit and district courts of the United States. The process act of 1792 (1 Stat. 275) expressly declared that in suits in equity, and in those of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, in those courts, the forms and modes of proceeding should be according to the principles, rules, and usages which belong to courts of equity and to courts of admiralty respectively, as contradistinguished from courts of common law, subject to such alterations and additions as the said courts respectively should deem expedient, or to such regulations as the supreme court should think proper to prescribe. The supreme court in prescribing rules of proceeding for those courts, has always followed the general principle indicated by the law. Whether the territorial courts are subject to the same regulation is the question which is now fairly presented.

In the case of Orchard v. Hughes (1 Wall. 77) a majority of this court was of opinion that the territorial courts were subject to the same general regulations in equity cases which govern the practice in the circuit and district courts. That was the case of a forclosure of a mortgage in the territorial court of Nebraska, and the court, under a territorial law, not only decreed a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises, but gave a personal decree against the defendant for the deficiency. We had decided in Noonan v. Lee, 2 Black, 499, that under the equity rules prescribed for the circuit and district courts, such a decree could not be made. The majority of the court now applied the same rule in the case of Orchard v. Hughes, although it was decided by territorial court. Following out the principle involved in that decision, we subsequently, in the case of Dunphy v. Kleinsmith, 11 Wall. 610, reversed a judgment of the Supreme Court of Montana, on the ground that the case (being in nature of a creditor's bill, filed to reach property which the debtor had fraudulently conveyed) was a clear case of equity, whilst the proceedings therein exhibited no resemblance to equity proceedings, there being a trial by jury, a verdict for damages, and a judgment on the verdict.

Digitized by Google

On a careful review of the whole subject we are not satisfied that those decisions are founded on a correct view of the law. By the 6th section of the organic act of the territory of Montana (13 Stat. 85), with which that of Nebraska substantially agreed, it was enacted, "that the legislative power of the territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act." By the 9th section it was provided "that the judicial power of said territory shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and in justices of the peace," and that the "jurisdiction of the several courts herein provided for, both appellate and original, and of that of the probate courts and justices of the peace, shall be limited by law; Provided, [that] the said supreme and district courts respectively shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction."

Now, here is nothing which declares, as the process act of 1792 did declare, that the jurisdictions of common law and chancery shall be exercised separately, and by distinct forms and modes of proceeding. The only provision is, that the courts named shall possess both jurisdictions. If the two jurisdictions had never been exercised in any other way than by distinct modes of proceeding, there would be ground for supposing that congress intended them to be exercised in that way. But it is well known that in many states of the Union the two jurisdictions are commingled in one form of action. And there is nothing in the nature of things to prevent such a mode of proceeding. Even in the circuit and district courts of the United States the same court is invested with the two jurisdictions, having a law side and an equity side; and the enforced separation of the two remedies, legal and equitable, in reference to the same subject-matter of controversy, sometimes leads to interesting exhibitions of the power of mere form to retard the administration of justice. In most cases it is difficult to see any good reason why an equitable right should not be enforced, or an equitable remedy administered in the same proceeding by which the legal rights of the parties are adjudicated. Be this, however, as it may, a consolidation of the two jurisdictions exists in many of the states, and must be considered as having been well known to congress; and when the latter body, in the organic act, simply declares that certain territorial courts shall possess both jurisdictions, without prescribing how they shall be exercised, the passage by the territorial assembly of a code of practice which unites them in one form of action, cannot be deemed repugnant to such organic act.

A clause in the 13th section of the act, however, has been referred to, by which it is declared "that the constitution and all laws of the United States, which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said territory of Montana as elsewhere in the United States;" and it is argued, that by virtue of this enactment, all regulations respecting judicial proceedings which are contained in any of the acts of congress, are imported into the practice of the territorial courts. But this proposition is not tenable. Laws regulating the proceedings of the United States courts are of specific application, and are, in truth and in fact, locally inapplicable to the courts of a territory. There is a law authorizing this court to appoint a reporter. In one sense this law is not locally inapplicable to the supreme court of the territory; but in a just sense it is so. The law has a specific application to this court, and cannot be applied to the territorial court without an evident misconstruction of the true meaning and intent of congress in the clause of the 13th section above referred to. That clause has the effect, undoubtedly, of importing into the territory the laws passed by congress to prevent and punish offences against the revenue, the mail service, and other laws of a general character and universal application; but not those of specific application.

The acts of congress respecting proceedings in the United States courts are concerned with, and confined to, those courts, considered as parts of the federal system, and as invested with the judicial power of the United States expressly conferred by the constitution, and to be exercised in correlation with the presence and jurisdiction of the several state courts and governments. They were not intended as exertions of that plenary municipal authority which congress has over the District of Columbia and the territories of the United States. They do not contain a word to indicate any such intent. The fact that they require the circuit and districts courts to follow the practice of the respective state courts in cases at law, and that they supply no other rule in such cases, shows that they cannot apply to the territorial courts. As before said, these acts have specific application to the courts of the United States, which are courts of a peculiar character and jurisdiction.

Whenever congress has proceeded to organize a government for any of the territories, it has merely instituted a general system of courts therefor, and has committed to the territorial assembly full power, subject to a few specified or implied conditions, of supplying all details of legislation necessary to put the system into operation, even to the defining of the jurisdiction of the several courts. As a general thing, subject to the general scheme of local government chalked out by the organic act, and such special provisions as are contained therein, the local legislature has been entrusted with the enactment of the entire system of municipal law, subject also, however, to the right of congress to revise, alter, and revoke at its discretion. The powers thus exercised by the territorial legislatures are nearly as extensive as those exercised by any state legislature; and the jurisdiction of the territorial courts is collectively co-extensive with and correspondent to that of the state courts—a very different jurisdiction from that exercised by the circuit and district courts of the United States. In fine, the territorial, like the state courts, are invested with plenary municipal jurisdiction.

It is true that the district courts of the territory are, by the organic act, invested with the same jurisdiction in all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States as is vested in the circuit and district courts of the United States, and a portion of each term is directed to be appropriated to the trial of causes arising under the said constitution and laws. Whether, when acting in this capacity, the said courts are to be governed by any of the regulations affecting the circuit and district courts of the United States, is not now the question. A large class of cases within the jurisdiction of the latter courts would not, under this clause, come in the territorial courts; namely, those in which the jurisdiction depends on the citizenship of the parties. Cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States would be composed mostly of revenue, admiralty, patent, and bankruptcy cases, prosecutions for crimes against the United States, and prosecutions and suits for infractions of the laws relating to civil rights under the XIVth and XVth amendments. To avoid question and controversy as to the modes of proceeding in such cases, where not already settled by law, perhaps additional legislation would be desirable.

From a review of the entire past legislation of congress on the subject under consideration, our conclusion is that the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding of the territorial courts, as well as their respective jurisdictions, subject, as before said, to a few express or implied conditions in the organic act itself, were intended to be left to the legislative action of the territorial assemblies, and to the regulations which might be adopted by the courts themselves. Of course, in case of any difficulties arising out of this state of things, congress has it in its power at any time to establish such regulations on this, as well as on any other subject of legislation, as it shall deem expedient and proper.

Digitized by Google

The judgment is affirmed.

Chief Justice WAITE did not sit in this case and took no part in the decision.

Hornbuckle v. Toombs, No. 139. Davis v. Bilsland, No. 141. Hirshfield v. Griffith, No. 208.

DAVIS and STRONG, JJ.—We dissent from the judgments in these cases, for the reason that this court has several times decided that claims at law and claims in equity cannot be united in one action, even in the territorial courts. And we think, if a change in the rule is to be made, it should be made by congress.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

Descent and Distribution of Property Among the Wyandott Indians.

PAMELA GRAY v. JACOB COFFMAN et al.

United States Circuit Court, District of Kansas, June Term, 1874.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge.

1. Wyandott Indians—Construction of Treaty.—The treaty of March 17, 1842 (7 Stats. at Large, 608, § 14), and of January 31, 1855 (10 Ib. 1159), between the United States and the Wyandott Indians in respect to the grant to members of the tribe, of a right to select and locate a section of land, construed.

2. ——. ——. Reservations.—The treaty of 1855 requires the patent to issue in the name of the reservee, though, if he be dead, the selection may be made by his "heirs or legal representatives," to be determined by the laws, usages and customs of the tribe. Whether a patent issued in the name of the heirs of the reservee is void, quære?

3. ——. Indian Wills—Devise of "Float."—A will of the right to this "float" made and executed according to the laws of the tribe, and proved and allowed by the proper tribunal of the tribe, is valid and will be respected by the civil courts. See Mackey v. Coxe, 18 How. 100.

4. Relation of the Wyandott Indians to the civil laws of the territory of Kansas, in respect to the disposition of property before and after the treaty of 1855, considered.

This is an action of ejectment for lands situate in Lyon county, in the state of Kansas. The case was tried upon testimony submitted to the court, a jury having been waived. The evidence was voluminous, but the material facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

R. M. Ruggles and Clough & Wheat, for the plaintiff; Wilson Shannon, W. P. Montgomery, and E. S. Waterbury, for the defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—To determine the title to the land here in controversy involves the necessity of deciding several novel and highly interesting questions.

The plaintiff claims title under a patent dated the 3d day of May, 1861, reciting the treaties of 1842 and 1855, below mentioned, between the United States and the Wyandott nation of Indians, and which patent was issued to the heirs of John Hicks. John Hicks was a Wyandott Indian.

It is necessary briefly to refer to the history of the Wyandott tribe and their removal to Kansas. In 1825 the Kansas Indians ceded, with the exception of a limited reservation, this country to the United States. 7 Stats. at Large, 244. In 1830 congress adopted the policy of causing Indian tribes residing east of the Mississippi to be removed to specified reservations west of the Missouri. 4 Stats. at Large, 411. The Wyandott Indians were the last tribe in Ohio which ceded their reservations in that state to the United States. This was done in 1842 by the treaty of Upper Sandusky, of March 17th of that year. 7 Stats. at Large, 608. By the 14th section of that treaty, the United States agree to grant to the above named John Hicks, to his heirs, and to thirty-five other specified persons of the Wyandott nation, one section of land: "The land hereby granted to be selected by the grantees, surveyed and patented at the expense of the United States, but never to be conveyed by them or their heirs without the permission of the president of the United States."

The next year, 1843, the Wyandott Indians, including John Hicks, removed to their reservation in Kansas. Here he lived with the tribe until 1853, when he died. On the 10th day of January, 1853, a short time before his death, he made his last will in writing. It was drawn up with all the usual formalities of such instruments, by Governor William Walker, an educated Wyandott Indian, attested by him and signed by the testator. The third clause of this will is in these words: "I will and bequeath unto my sons, Francis A. Hicks, and John Hicks, Jr., the section of land granted to me by the treaty of Upper Sandusky, dated March 17, 1842." This instrument is produced and bears upon it this endorsement: "The within will and testament was read in open court, and allowed probate and ordered recorded. Wyandott Council, February 16, 1853."

JOHN D. BROWN, Principal Chief.

"JOEL WALKER, Clerk pto tem."

It is indisputably established by evidence aliunde that the will was presented to the Wyandott Council at that date, and was regularly allowed by it as the will of John Hicks, Sr.

These devisees, John Hicks, Jr., and Francis A. Hicks, were the only living children of John, Sr., but there were then living grandchildren by two of his deceased children.

On the 31st day of January, 1855 (10 Stats. at Large 1159), another treaty was made with the Wyandott Indians, which was ratified March 1st of that year. The first article states that "The Wyandott Indians having become sufficiently advanced in civilization, and desirous of becoming citizens, it is hereby agreed and stipulated that their organization and their relations with the United States as an Indian tribe, shall be dissolved and terminated on the ratification of this agreement, except so far as the further and temporary continuance of the same may be necessary in the execution of some of the stipulations herein; and from and after the date of such ratification the said Wyandott Indians, and each and every one of them, except as hereafter provided, shall be deemed and are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, to all intents and purposes; and shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges and immunities of such citizens; and shall in all respects be subject to the laws of the United States and the territory of Kansas, in the same manner as other citizens of said territory; and the jurisdiction of the United States and of said territory shall be extended over the Wyandott country in the same manner as over other parts of said territory." Then follows a provision excepting, for the time, from the above provision as to citizenship, such Indians as may apply for it.

The treaty makes provision for the survey, platting and partition of their reservation, and for lists of the members of the tribe, divided into three classes: 1st. Of those who are able to control and manage their affairs and interests. 2d. Those who are not. 3d. Orphans, idiots and insane persons. Lists of the second and third classes were to be furnished by the Wayandott council, under whose supervision and guardianship the treaty continues them.

The eighth article of the treaty defines the persons entitled to money and lands thereunder "to be such only as are actual members of the Wyandott nation, their heirs and representatives, and as are entitled to share in the property and funds of the said nation, according to the laws, usages and customs thereof."

Article 9, which is important, is in these words: "Each of the individuals to whom reservations are granted by the 14th article of the treaty of March 17, 1842 (of Upper Sandusky), or their heirs or legal representatives, shall be permitted to select and locate said reservations, on any government land west of Missouri and Iowa subject to pre-emption and settlement; said reservations to be patented by the United States in the names of the reservees; and the reservees, their heirs and proper representatives shall have the unrestricted right to sell and convey the same; but in cases where any of the said reserves may not be sufficiently prudent and competent to manage their affairs in a proper manner, which shall be determined by the Wyandott council, or where any of them have died, leaving minor heirs, the said council shall appoint proper and discreet persons to act for such imcompetent persons and minor heirs in the sale of the reservations, and the custody and management of the proceeds thereof; the persons so appointed to have full authority to sell and dispose of the reservations, and to make and execute a good and valid title thereto."

Digitized by Google

On the 30th day of May, 1854—the year preceding this treaty—congress passed the act organizing the territory of Kansas, but previous to this the public lands therein had been thrown open to pre-emption and settlement, and these Wyandott "floats," by which 640 acres could be secured for town sites, instead of 320 acres, were in great request. Francis A. Hicks, one of the devisees of the John Hicks' "float," died August 16, 1855, a few months after the treaty of that year, leaving children and grandchildren. He made a will on the 7th day of August, 1855, and therein directs "the one-half of the section of land willed to him by his father, under the treaty of March 17, 1842, to be sold, and the avails thereof to be applied to the liquidation of his debts and liabilities," and appoints Joel Walker his executor.

Now at the date of the death of Francis A. Hicks, on the 16th day of August, 1855, no statute of descents or will had yet been passed by the territorial legislature of Kansas. The council still continued to act, and the will of Francis A. Hicks was admitted to probate September 25, 1855, the executor gave bond, and was authorized by the council to act as such. Subsequently, to-wit, January 5, 1863, the will was presented to the regular probate court of Wyandott county, and proved and allowed, but without any notice being published or otherwise given, so far as appears of record. Joel Walker, the executor of Francis A. Hicks, pursuant to directions in his will, sold the testator's undivided half of this 640 acre "float" to Jacob Ulrich for $1,000, and reduced the contract to writing. Ulrich located the float on the land in question, which was approved, and the patent issued, as above mentioned, May 3, 1861, to the heirs of John Hicks, Sr. Subsequently, conveyance was made to Ulrich's estate, for this interest, and the heirs of Ulrich conveyed the land in question to the defendant.

The plaintiff claims a title through conveyances from granchildren of John Hicks, Sr., who, if his will and the will of Francis A. Hicks are valid, had no title. In other words, the right of the plaintiff to recover is based upon the proposition that these two wills are nullities; that, though made, executed and probated according to the laws, customs and usages of the Wyandott nation of Indians, to which they belonged, these instruments have, in law, no legal effect in determining the rights of the parties.

The Wyandott Indians, before their removal from Ohio, had adopted a written constitution and laws, and among others, laws relating to descent and wills. These are in the record, and are shown to have been copied from the laws of Ohio, and adopted by the Wyandott tribe, with certain modifications, to adapt them to their customs and usages. One of these modifications, was that only living children should inherit, excluding the children of deceased children, or grand children.

The Wyandott council, which is several times referred to in the treaty of 1855, was an executive and judicial body, and had power, under the laws and usages of the nation, to receive proof of wills, etc.; and this body continued to act, at least to some extent, after the treaty of 1855.

The first question arises under the patent. The treaty of 1855 required the patent to be issued in the name of the reservee. The patent of May 3, 1861, was in fact issued not to John Hicks, the reservee, but to the heirs of John Hicks. If it had been issued in the name of John Hicks, though he was then dead, it would, under the act of 1836, have inured to his heirs, devisees or assignees, (5 Stats. at Large, 31.) What is the effect of its being issued as it was to the heirs of John Hicks? The plaintiff contends that the patent was rightfully issued, and that under it the heirs of John Hicks take by purchase. That to ascertain who are his heirs, resort must be had, not to Indian laws, but to the laws of Kansas at the time, and that the legal effect of the patent is the same as if the children or heirs of John Hicks, Sr., had been named therein, which, if true, would cut off the rights of the creditors, devisees or assignees of John Hicks, Sr.

On the other hand the defendant insists, inasmuch as it is true, that if the patent is valid, the heirs of John Hicks take by purchase, that the patent is void because it was not issued, as the treaty specifically required, in the name of the reservee.

The issuing of a patent is a ministerial act, and a patent issued without authority is void.

I am inclined to think that the departure of the patent in respect to the name of the grantee from the requirements of the treaty is material, and that the patent is therefore a nullity. The effect of this would be that the legal title is still in the United States, and, of course, the plaintiff could not recover in ejectment.

But this point I leave undetermined, preferring to rest my judgment upon the ground that under the circumstances, the court must give effect to the well established laws, customs, and usages of the Wyandott tribe of Indians in respect to the disposition of property by descent and will.

John Hicks, Jr., had a valuable right given by the treaty of 1842—a right to select and locate 640 acres of land—not land but "a float," or right to land. He died in 1853, within the limits of what afterwards became the territory of Kansas. There is no national law of descent and wills, none regulating the rights of members of Indian tribes. The treaty of 1855 recognizes and provides in several places for the rights of the heirs or legal representatives of the reservees under the treaty of 1842. These must mean heirs and legal representatives "according to the laws, usages and customs" of the tribe. See articles 8 and 9 of the treaty of 1855.

The government was aware that between 1842, when the right was given, and 1855, when the second treaty was made, that some of the reservees were dead, and it provided carefully for this contingency by authorizing their heirs or legal representatives to select and locate the section of land. It is hardly possible to suppose that congress meant to refer to the law of Missouri territory of 1815, to ascertain who were the heirs or legal representatives of the deceased reservees. There is but one way to determine this and that is by the laws, customs and usages of the tribe. If this is so, then the will of John Hicks, Sr., made and allowed in 1853, was valid and gave the right to his sons, John, Jr., and Francis A. If the will of the elder Hicks is valid, so likewise is the will of Francis A., whose death occurred previous to the enactment of any statute of wills or descents in Kansas, but after the ratification of the treaty of 1855.

The dates are as follows: the treaty was ratified March 1st, 1855; Francis A. Hicks, died August 16, 1855; the territorial statute of Kansas concerning wills was approved August 30, 1855 (Laws of Kansas, 1855, p. 753-761.) The will of Francis A. Hicks was admitted to probate by the Wyandott council Sept. 25, 1855.

If the foregoing views are correct, the will of Francis A. Hicks was valid when he died, because it conformed to the laws and usages of his tribe, and there were no laws of either the United States or the territory of Kansas upon the subject.

Passing the question whether it is necessary to valid action by an executor, under a will, that his appointment should be ratified by some court with probate powers, the only remaining inquiry would be, must Indian wills, after the ratification of the treaty of 1855, be presented to and allowed by the civil tribunals, before acts done thereunder and authorized thereby, can be treated as valid?

Digitized by Google

Notwithstanding the broad language of the first article of the treaty of 1855 as to the dissolution of the tribal relation of the Wyandott Indians, and as to their becoming citizens of the United States and subject to its laws and the laws (prospective) of the territory of Kansas, it is evident from the view of the whole treaty that their property rights were regulated by it, and that the Wyandott council, which was a tribunal with executive and judicial functions, was still to continue in force, at least for a time.

Francis A. Hicks died, leaving a will made and executed in due form, according to the laws of the tribe, before there were any laws of Kansas on the subject of the descent of property or of wills. The Wyandott council, with jurisdiction over wills, continued to act.

Wills which would be formal and valid by the laws of usages of the tribe, might be, and probably would be, informal when tested by territorial laws subsequently enacted. The foregoing views find strong, if not, indeed, full support in the case of Mackey v. Coxe, 18 How. 100.

I am of opinion, therefore, that both wills are valid, and that the plaintiff, whose case rests upon the hypothesis of their nullity has no title to the land in controversy. Accordingly, there will be a judgment for the defendant.

JUDGMENT FOR DEFENDANT.

Important Decision under the New Bankrupt Law — Petition must show Requisite Number of Creditors.

In re SCAMMON.

United States District Court, Northern District of Illinois, June 26, 1874.

1. Bankrupt Act, § 39 — Petition must show requisite number of Creditors.—By the amendment of section 39 of the Bankrupt act recently passed, creditors to the extent of one-fourth in number and one-third in value must petition for the adjudication, and this provision is applied by the act to all cases of involuntary bankruptcy commenced since December 1, 1873: Held, that not only in new cases, but in those pending when the amendment took effect, brought since December 1, 1873, the petition must show affirmatively that the requisite number of creditors join in the proceeding.

BLODGETT, J.—By the recent amendment to the bankrupt law, some radical changes are made in the proceedings of voluntary or compulsory bankruptcy.

The 39th section has been practically repealed, and a new section substituted. By this section, as it now stands amended, various acts are declared acts of bankruptcy, and the law then proceeds to say that any person guilty of said acts, or any of them, "shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed, and shall be adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one or more of his creditors, who shall constitute one-fourth thereof at least in number, and the aggregate of whose debts provable under this act amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable." * * * *

And the provisions of this section shall apply to all cases of compulsory or of involuntary bankruptcy commenced since the 1st day of December, 1873, as well as those commenced hereafter. And in all cases commenced since the first of December, 1873, and prior to the passage of this act, as well as those commenced hereafter, the court shall, if such allegation as to the number or amount of petitioning creditors be denied by a statement in writing to that effect, require him to file in court forthwith a full list of his creditors, with their places of residence, and the sums due them respectively, and shall ascertain, upon reasonable notice to the creditors, whether one-fourth in number and one-third in amount have petitioned that the debtor be adjudged bankrupt. * * * *

The question now raised is, whether cases pending, which have been commenced since the first of December last, can proceed without an amendment of the petition, so as to show affirmatively that the requisite number of creditors desire the debtor to be adjudicated bankrupt, or must the debtor in such cases object in the first instance, and file a schedule of his creditors.

There is no doubt in my mind that in new cases the petition must show affirmatively that the requisite number of creditors join in the petition. Not that the creditors petitioning must swear positively that they constitute a fourth in number and a third in value of a debtor's creditors, but they should at least allege it according to their best information and belief, because we all know that debtors frequently misstate the amount of the debts to their creditors, and creditors have no means in the first instance of verifying the truth of the debtors' statements to them. So that I think an allegation that those petitioning constitute a fourth in number of the creditors, and a third in value of the provable debts, would make a good prima facie case, so far as this clause is concerned. If the debtor comes in and denies this allegation, then he can be ruled to file a correct list of his creditors, with their residences and the amount due them respectively, and a time is given in which to obtain the report of the requisite number of them to the proceeding.

The evident spirit and intent of the amendment is that all cases pending, commenced since the 1st of December last, shall conform to, and proceed upon the requirements of the law in the same manner as new cases. The language is: "If the allegation as to the number or amount of petitioning creditors be denied by the debtor." And this is declared to apply as well to pending cases as to those hereinafter commenced. Now, by all the analogies from the rules of pleading, a party is not required to deny an allegation which has not been made. It seems to me it would be basurd to require a debtor to come in and deny the allegation that a fourth in number and third in amount of his creditors had not joined in the proceedings against him when the record contained no such allegation. The creditors should first make the allegation, and then it will be time for the debtor to deny it and furnish a correct list of his creditors.

Nor do I see that there is any hardship in this. It being clear that the proceedings cannot go on without the assent of the requisite number of creditors, their assent seems to me indispensable to enable the court to retain jurisdiction of the case, and the petitioning creditor may as well amend his petition in the first instance by obtaining the assent of the requisite number as to require the debtor to exhibit his schedule. As I construe the law, the debtor is not obliged to give a schedule of his creditors until a prima facie case is made against him. Certainly a debtor against whom a new petition is filed cannot be compelled to disclose the names and residences of his creditors, and amounts due to each without such prima facie case being made, and I do not see why any different rule should apply to one against whom proceedings were pending when the law passed.

I therefore conclude that in all cases pending which have been commenced since the first of December last, the petitioning creditor should take steps to secure the joining of a fourth in number and third in amount of the creditors within some reasonable time, and that the debtors are entitled to a rule that unless the requisite number of creditors do so join within such time as the rule may require, the proceeding shall be dismissed.

This saves the rights of creditors in all cases when the limitations of the law would apply if the petitions should be dismissed and new proceedings commenced.

—JUDGE DANIELS, in accordance with the verdict previously rendered, has sentenced the Brooklyn charity commissioners to pay a fine of two hundred dollars each. The Herald says: "The punishment is a gentle one, but it brands the men for all time to come as offenders against the law, and prevents them forever from holding office. Judge DANIELS throughout this trial has comported himself well, and, in spite of all the influence which was brought to bear upon him, he has been true to himself and faithful to the people. A pure and incorruptible bench is the best safeguard of the Republic."

Digitized by Google

The New Bankrupt Act.

§ 1. Receiver to take possession of property and carry on business, when.
§ 2. Amends § 1 of act of 1867; suits in state courts to collect bankrupt's debts.
§ 3. Amends § 2 of act of 1867.
§ 4. Sales by assignee; notice; supervisory power of court over; assignee's account of expenditures; removal of assignee for neglect of duties, etc.; assignee fraudulently or corruptly selling, subject to removal, forfeiture of fees, fine and imprisonment; punishment of his confederates; reports of assignee; quarterly settlements of assignee—to account for interest and benefits—oath to be taken, and penalty for swearing falsely.
§ 5. Amends § 11 of Act of 1867; notice to creditors by publication.
§ 6. Amends § 20 of act of 1867 with reference to offsets.
§ 7. Amends § 21 of Act of 1867; waiver of right of action by creditor.
§ 8. Amends § 26 of act of 1867; bankrupt or other parties competent witnesses.
§ 9. Repeals § 33 of act of 1867; what per centum of indebtedness to be covered by assets, and consent of what number of creditors necessary to entitle bankrupt to discharge.
§ 10. Amends § 35 of act of 1867, by reducing periods within which property fraudulently conveyed may be recovered or discharge may be contested respectively to two and three months.
§ 11. Makes other specific amendments to § 35 of the act of 1867.
§ 12. Amends § 39 of the act of 1867; what shall be deemed acts of bankruptcy; number and amount of creditors who must join in petition; within what time petition to be brought; proceedings with reference to the number and amount of petitioning creditors; effect of payment or conveyance where proceeding is arrested on proof that the requisite number and amount of creditors have not joined; what creditors counted in estimating requisite number.
§ 13. Amends § 40 of act of 1867, as to number and amount of creditors.
§ 14. Amends § 41 of Act of 1867; trial by jury of facts set forth in petition; dismissal; discontinuance.
§ 15. Amends §§ 11 and 42 of act of 1867; inventory and valuation.
§ 17. Supplements § 43 of Act of 1867; compositions with creditors.
§ 18. Fees and emoluments; register, clerk, etc., not to be interested in or of counsel for, estates, etc.
§ 19. Annual report of marshal, register, assignee and clerk.
§ 20. Proof of debts may be taken before notary public.
§ 21. General repealing clause.

[General Nature, No. 74.]

An act to amend and supplement an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled, That the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, amended and supplemented as follows: That the court may in its discretion, on sufficient cause shown, and upon notice and hearing, direct the receiver or assignee to take possession of the property, and carry on the business of the debtor, or any part thereof, under the direction of the court, when, in its judgment, the interest of the estate as well as of the creditors will be promoted thereby, but not for a period exceeding nine months from the time the debtor shall have been declared a bankrupt: Provided, That such order shall not be made until the court shall be satisfied that it is approved by a majority in value of the creditors.

Sec. 2. That section one of said act be, and it is hereby amended by adding thereto the following words: "Provided, That the court having charge of the estate of any bankrupt may direct that any of the legal assets or debts of the bankrupt, as contradistinguished from equitable demands, shall, when such debt does not exceed $500, be collected in the courts of the state where such bankrupt resides having jurisdiction of claims of such nature and amount."

Sec. 3. That section two of said act be, and it hereby is, amended by striking out, in line ten, the words, "the same," and inserting the word "any;" and by adding next after the words "adverse interest," in line twelve, the words "or owing any debt to such bankrupt."

Sec. 4. That unless otherwise ordered by the court, the assignee shall sell the property of the bankrupt, whether real or personal, at public auction, in such parts or parcels, and at such times and places as shall be best calculated to produce the greatest amount with the least expense. All notices of public sales under this act by any assignee or officer of the court shall be published once a week, for three consecutive weeks, in the newspaper or newspapers, to be designated by the judge, which, in his opinion, shall be best calculated to give general notice of the sale. And the court on the application of any party in interest, shall have complete supervisory power over such sales, including the power to set aside the same and to order a re-sale, so that the property sold shall realize the largest sum. And the court may, in its discretion, order any real estate of the bankrupt, or any part thereof, to be sold for one-fourth cash at the time of sale, and the residue within eighteen months, in such instalments as the court may direct, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per centum per annum, and secured by proper mortgage or lien upon the property so sold. And it shall be the duty of every assignee to keep a regular account of all moneys received or expended by him as such assignee, to which account every creditor shall at reasonable times have free access. If any assignee shall fail or neglect to well and faithfully discharge his duties in the sale or disposition of property as above contemplated, it shall be the duty of the court to remove such assignee, and he shall forfeit all fees and emoluments to which he might be entitled in connection with such sale. And if any assignee shall, in any manner, in violation of his duty aforesaid, unfairly or wrongfully sell or dispose of, or in any manner fraudulently or corruptly combine, conspire, or agree with any person or persons, with intent to unfairly or wrongfully sell or dispose of the property committed to his charge, he shall, upon proof thereof, be removed, and forfeit all fees or other compensation for any and all services in connection with such bankrupt's estate, and, upon conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be liable to a fine of not more than $10,000, or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding two years, or both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court. And any person so combining, conspiring, or agreeing with such assignee for the purpose aforesaid shall, upon conviction, be liable to a like punishment. That the assignee shall report, under oath, to the court at least as often as once in three months, the condition of the estate in his charge, and the state of his accounts in detail, and at all other times when the court, on motion or otherwise, shall so order. And on any settlement of the accounts of any assignee he shall be required to account for all interest, benefit or advantage received, or in any manner agreed to be received, directly or indirectly, from the use, disposal, or proceeds of the bankrupt's estate. And he shall be required, upon such settlement, to make and file in court an affidavit declaring, according to the truth, whether he has or has not, as the case may be, received, or is or is not, as the case may be, to receive, directly or indirectly, any interest, benefit, or advantage from the use or deposit of such funds; and such assignee may be examined orally upon the same subject, and if he shall willfully swears falsely, either in such affidavit or examination, or to his report provided for in this section, he shall be deemed to be guilty of perjury, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one and not more than five years.

Sec. 5. That section 11 of said act be amended by striking out the words ,' as the warrant specifies" where they first occur, and inserting the words "as the marshal shall select, not exceeding two;" and inserting after the word "specifies," where it last occurs, the words "But whenever the creditors of the bankrupt are so numerous as to make any notice now required by law, to them, by mail or otherwise, a great and disproportionate expense to the estate, the court may, in lieu thereof, in its discretion, order such notice to be given by publication in a newspaper or newspapers, to all such creditors whose claims, as reported, do not exceed the sums, respectively, of fifty dollars."

Sec. 6. That the first clause of section 20 of said act be amended by adding, at the end thereof, the words "or in cases of compulsory bankruptcy, after the act of bankruptcy upon or in respect of which the adjudication shall be made, and with a view of making such set-off."

Sec. 7. That section 21 of said act be amended by inserting the following words in line six, immediately after "thereby:" "But a creditor proving his debt or claim shall not be held to have waived his right of action or suit against the bankrupt, where a discharge has been refused, or the proceedings have been determined without a discharge."

Sec. 8. That the following words shall be added to section 26 of said act: "That in all causes and trials arising or ordered under this act, the alleged bankrupt, and any party thereto, shall be a competent witness."

Sec. 9. That in cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy, the provisions of said act, and any amendment thereof, or of any supplement thereto, requiring the payment of any proportion of the debts of the bankrupt, or the assent of any portion of his creditors, as a condition of his discharge from his debts, shall not apply; but he may, if otherwise entitled thereto, be discharged by the court in the same manner and with the same effect as if he had paid such per centum of his debts, or as if the required proportion of his creditors had assented thereto. And in cases of voluntary bankruptcy, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to 30 per centum of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he shall be liable as principal debtor, without the assent of at least one-fourth of his creditors in number, and one-third in value; and the provision in section 33 of said act of March 2, 1867, requiring 50 per centum of such assets, is hereby repealed.

Sec. 10. That in cases of involuntary or compulsory bankruptcy, the period of four months mentioned in section 35 of the act to which this is an amendment, is hereby changed to two months; but this provision shall not take effect until two months after the passage of this act. And in the cases aforesaid, the period of six months mentioned in said section 35 is hereby changed to three months; but this provision shall not take effect until three months after the passage of this act.

Digitized by Google

Sec. 11. That section 35 of said act be, and the same is hereby amended, as follows: First, after the word "and" in line eleven, insert the word "knowing;" secondly, after the word "attachment" in the same line, insert the words "sequestration, seizure;" thirdly, after the word "and," in line twenty, insert the word "knowing." And nothing in said section 35 shall be construed to invalidate any loan of actual value, or the security therefor, made in good faith upon a security taken in good faith on the occasion of the making of such loan.

Sec. 12. That section 39 of said act of March 2, 1867, be amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 39. That any person residing, and owing debts, as aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, shall depart from the state, district, or territory of which he is an inhabitant, with intent to defraud his creditors; or, being absent, shall, with such intent, remain absent; or shall conceal himself to avoid the service of legal process in any action for the recovery of a debt or demand provable under this act; or shall conceal or remove any of his property to avoid its being attached, taken, or sequestered on legal process; or shall make any assignment, gift, sale, conveyance, or transfer of his estate, property, rights, or credits, either within the United States or elsewhere, with intent to delay, defraud, or hinder his creditors; or who has been arrested and held in custody under or by virtue of mesne process or execution, issued out of any court of the United States, or of any state, district, or territory within which such debtor resides or has property, founded upon a demand in its nature provable against a bankrupt's estate under this act, and for a sum exceeding $100, and such process is remaining in force and not discharged by payment, or in any other manner provided by the law of the United States or of such state, district, or territory, applicable thereto, for a period of 20 days, or has been actually imprisoned for more than 20 days in a civil action founded on contract for the sum of $100 or upward; or who, being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, shall make any payment, gift, grant, sale, conveyance, or transfer of money or other property, estate, rights, or credits, or confess judgment, or give any warrant to confess judgment, or procure his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors, or to any person or persons who are or may be liable for him as indorsers, bail, sureties, or otherwise, or with the intent, by such disposition of his property, to defeat or delay the operation of this act; or who, being a bank, banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, has fraudulently stopped payment; or who, being a bank, banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment, within a period of forty days, of his commercial paper (made or passed in the course of his business as such), or who, being a bank or banker, shall fail for forty days to pay any depositor upon demand of payment lawfully made, shall be deemed to have commttted an act of bankruptcy, and subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed, shall be adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one or more of his creditors, who shall constitute one-fourth thereof, at least, in number, and the aggregate of whose debts provable under this act amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable; Provided, That such petition is brought within six months after such act of bankruptcy shall have been committed. And the provisions of this section shall apply to all cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy commenced since the 1st day of December, 1873, as well as to those commenced hereafter. And in all cases commenced since the 1st day of December, 1873, and prior to the passage of this act, as well as those commenced hereafter, the court shall, if such allegations as to the number or amount of petitioning creditors be denied by the debtor, by a statement in writing to that effect, require him to file in court forthwith a full list of his creditors, with their places of residence and the sums due them respectively, and shall ascertain, upon reasonable notice to the creditors, whether one-fourth in number and one-third in amount thereof, as aforesaid, have petitioned that the debtor be adjudged a bankrupt. But if such debtor, shall, on the filing of the petition, admit in writing that the requisite number and amount of creditors have petitioned, the court (if satisfied that the admission was made in good faith), shall so adjudge, which judgment shall be final, and the matter proceed without further steps on that subject. And if it shall appear that such number and amount have not so petitioned, the court shall grant reasonable time, not exceeding in cases heretofore commenced, twenty days, and in cases hereafter commenced, ten days, within which other creditors may join in such petition. And if at the expiration of such time so limited, the number and amount shall comply with the requirements of this section, the matter of bankruptcy may proceed; but if, at the expiration of such limited time, such number and amount shall not answer the requirements of this section, the proceedings shall be dismissed, and, in cases hereafter commenced, with costs. And if such person shall be adjudged a bankrupt, the assignee may recover back the money or property so paid, conveyed, sold assigned or transferred contrary to this act; Provided, That the person receiving such payment or conveyance had reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent, and knew that a fraud on this act was intended; and such person, if a creditor, shall not, in cases of actual fraud on his part, be allowed to prove for more than a moiety of his debt. And this limitation on the proof of debts shall apply to cases of voluntary as well as involuntary bankruptcy; and the petition of creditors under this section may be sufficiently verified by the oaths of the first five signers thereof, if so many there be. And if any of said first five signers shall not reside in the district in which such petition is to be filed, the same may be signed and verified by the oath or oaths of the attorney or attorneys, agent or agents, of such signers. And in computing the number of creditors, as aforesaid, who shall join in such petition, creditors whose respective debts do not exceed $250 shall not be reckoned. But if there be no creditors whose debts exceed said sum of $250, or if the requisite number of creditors holding debts exceeding $250 fail to sign the petition, the creditors having debts of a less amount shall be reckoned for the purposes aforesaid."

Sec. 13. That section 40 of said act be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: "And if, on the return day of the order to show cause as aforesaid, the court shall be satisfied that the requirement of section 39 of said act as to the number and amount of petitioning creditors has been complied with, or if, within the time provided for in section 39 of this act, creditors sufficient in number and amount shall sign such petition so as to make a total of one-fourth in number of the creditors and one-third in the amount of the provable debts against the bankrupt, as provided in said section, the court shall so adjudge, which judgment shall be final; otherwise it shall dismiss the proceedings, and, in cases hereafter commenced, with costs."

Sec 14. That section 41 of said act be amended as follows: After the word "bankruptcy," in line eight, strike out all of said section and insert the words "Or, at the election of the debtor, the court may, in its discretion, award a venire facias to the marshal of the district, returnable within ten days before him for the trial of the facts set forth in the petition, at which time the trial shal be had, unless adjourned for cause. And unless, upon such hearing or trial, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said court, or of the jury, as the case may be, that the facts set forth in said petition are true, or if it shall appear that the debtor has paid and satisfied all liens upon his property, in case the existence of such liens was the sole ground of the proceeding, the proceeding shall be dismissed, and the respondent shall recover costs; and all proceedings in bankruptcy may be discontinued on reasonable notice and hearing, with the approval of the court, and upon the assent, in writing, of such debtor, and not less than one-half of his creditors in number and amount; or, in case all the creditors and such debtor assent thereto, such discontinuance shall be ordered and entered; and all parties shall be remitted, in either case, to the same rights and duties existing at the date of the filing of the petition for bankruptcy, except so far as such estate shall have been already administered and disposed of. And the court shall have power to make all needful orders and decrees to carry the foregoing provision into effect."

Sec. 15. That section 11 of said act be amended by inserting the words "and valuation" after the word "inventory" in the twenty-first line; and taht section 42 of said act be amended by inserting the words "and valuation" after the word "inventory" in the fifteenth line.

Sec. 16. That section 49 of said act be amended by striking out, after the word "the," in line five, the words "supreme courts," and inserting in lieu thereof "district courts," and in line six, after the word "states," inserting the words "subject to the general superintendance and jurisdiction conferred upon circuit courts by section 2 of said act."

COMPOSITION WITH CREDITORS.

Sec. 17. That the following provisions be added to section 43 of said act: That, in all cases of bankruptcy now pending, or to be hereafter pending, by or against any person, whether an adjudication in bankruptcy shall have been had or not, the creditors of such alleged bankrupt may, at a meeting called under the direction of the court, and upon not less than ten days notice to each known creditor of the time, place, and purpose of such meeting, such notice to be personal or otherwise, as the court may direct, resolve that a composition, proposed by the debtor, shall be accepted in satisfaction of the debts due to them from the debtor. And such resolution shall, to be operative, have been passed by a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors of the debtor assembled at such meeting either in person or by proxy, and shall be confirmed by the signatures thereto of the debtor and two-thirds in number and one-half in value of all the creditors of the debtor. And in calculating a majority for the purposes of a composition under this section, creditors whose debts amount to sums not exceeding fifty dollars shall be reckoned in the majority in value, but not in the majority in number; and the value of the debts of secured creditors above the amount of such security, to be determined by the court, shall, as nearly as circumstances admit, be estimated in the same way. And creditors whose debts are fully secured shall not be entitled to vote upon or to sign such resolution without first relinquishing such security for the benefit of the estate.

Digitized by Google

The debtor, unless prevented by sickness or other cause satisfactory to such meeting, shall be present at the same, and shall answer any enquiries made of him; and he, or, if he is so prevented from being at such meeting, some one in his behalf, shall produce to the meeting a statement showing the whole of his assets and debts, and the names and addresses of the creditors to whom such debts respectively are due.

Such resolution, together with the statement of the debtor, as to his assets and debts, shall be presented to the court; and the court shall, upon notice to all the creditors of the debtor of not less than five days, and upon hearing, enquire whether such resolution has been passed in the manner directed by this section; and, if satisfied that it has been so passed, it shall, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, and upon being satisfied that the same is for the best interest of all concerned, cause such resolution to be recorded and statement of assets and debts to be filed; and until such record and filing shall have taken place, such resolution shall be of no validity. And any creditor of the debtor may inspect such record and statement at all reasonable times.

The creditors may, by resolution passed in the manner and under the circumstances aforesaid, add to or vary the provisions of, any composition previously accepted by them, without prejudice to any persons taking interests under such provisions who do not assent to such addition or variation. And any such additional resolution shall be presented to the court in the same manner, and proceeded with in the same way and with the same consequences as the resolution by which the composition was accepted in the first instance. The provisions of a composition accepted by such resolution in pursuance of this section shall be binding on all the creditors whose names and addresses and the amounts of the debts due to whom are shown in the statement of the debtor produced at the meeting at which the resolution shall have been passed, but shall not affect or prejudice the rights of any other creditors.

Where a debt arises on a bill of exchange or promissory note, if the debtor shall be ignorant of the holder of any such bill of exchange or promissory note, he shall be required to state the amount of such bill or note, the date on which it falls due, the name of the acceptor and of the person to whom it is payable, and any other particulars within his knowledge respecting the same; and the insertion of such particulars shall be deemed a sufficient description by the debtor in respect to such debt.

Any mistake made inadvertantly by a debtor in the statement of his debts may be corrected upon reasonable notice, and with the consent of a general meeting of his creditors.

Every such composition shall, subject to priorities declared in said act, provide for a pro rata payment or satisfaction, in money, to the creditors of such debtor in proportion to the amount of their unsecured debts, or their debts in respect to which any such security shall have been duly surrendered and given up.

The provisions of any composition made in pursuance of this section may be enforced by the court, on motion made in a summary manner by any person interested, and on reasonable notice; and any disobedience of the order of the court made on such motion shall be deemed to be a contempt of court. Rules and regulations of court may be made in relation to proceedings of composition herein provided for in the same manner and to the same extent as now provided by law in relation to proceedings in bankruptcy.

If it shall at any time appear to the court, on notice, satisfactory evidence, and hearing, that a composition under this section cannot, in consequence of legal difficulties, or for any sufficient cause, proceed without injustice or undue delay to the creditors or to the debtor, the court may refuse to accept and confirm such composition, or may set the same aside; and, in either case, the debtor shall be proceeded with as a bankrupt in conformity with the provisions of law, and proceedings may be had accordingly; and the time during which such composition shall have been in force shall not, in such case, be computed in calculating periods of time prescribed by said act.

Sec. 18. That from and after the passage of this act the fees, commissions, charges, and allowances, excepting actual and necessary disbursements, of, and to be made by the officers, agents, marshals, messengers, assignees, and registers in cases of bankruptcy, shall be reduced to one-half of the fees, commissions, charges and allowances heretofore provided for or made in like cases Provided, That the preceding provision shall be and remain in force until the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States shall make and promulgate new rules and regulations in respect to the matters aforesaid, under the powers conferred upon them by sections 10 and 47 of said act, and no longer, which duties they shall perform as soon as may be. And said justices shall have power under said sections, by general regulations, to simplify and so far as in their judgment will conduce to the benefit of creditors, to consolidate the duties of the register, assignee, marshal, and clerk, and to reduce fees, costs, and charges, to the end that prolixity, delay, and unnecessary expense may be avoided. And no register or clerk of court, or any partner or clerk of such register or clerk of court, or any person having any interest with either in any fees or emoluments in bankruptcy, or with whom such register or clerk of court shall have any interest in respect to any matter in bankruptcy, shall be of counsel, solicitor, or attorney, either in or out of court, in any suit or matter pending in bankruptcy in either the circuit or district court of his district, or in an appeal therefrom. Nor shall they, or either of them, be executor, administrator, guardian, commissioner, appraiser, divider, or assignee of or upon any estate within the jurisdiction of either of said courts of bankruptcy; nor be interested, directly or indirectly, in the fees or emoluments arising from either of said trusts. And the words "except such as are established by this act or by law," in section 10 of said act, are hereby repealed.

Sec. 19. That it shall be the duty of the marshal of each district, in the month of July of each year, to report to the clerk of the district court of such district, in a tabular form, to be prescribed by the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, as well as such other or further information as may be required by said justices,

First, the number of cases in bankruptcy, in which the warrant prescribed in section 11 of said act has come to his hands during the year ending June 30, preceding;

Secondly, how many such warrants were returned, with the fees, costs, expenses, and emoluments thereof, respectively and separately;

Thirdly, the total amount of all other fees, costs, expenses, and emoluments, respectively and separately, earned or received by him during such year from or in respect of any matter in bankruptcy;

Fourthly, a summarized statement of such fees, costs and emoluments, exclusive of actual disbursements in bankruptcy, received or earned for such year;

Fifthly, a summarized statement of all actual disbursements in such cases for such year.

And in like manner every register shall, in the same month and for the same year, make a report to such clerk of,

First, the number of voluntary cases in bankruptcy coming before him during said year;

Secondly, the amount of assets and liabilities, as nearly as may be, of the bankrupts;

Thirdly, the amount and rate per centum of all dividends declared;

Fourthly, the disposition of all such cases;

Fifthly, the number of compulsory cases in bankruptcy coming before him in the same way;

Sixthly, the amount of assets and liabilities, as nearly as may be, of such bankrupts;

Sevently, the disposition of all such cases;

Eighthly, the amounts and rate per centum of all dividends declared in such cases;

Ninthly, the total amount of fees, charges, costs, and emoluments of every sort, received or earned by such register during said year in each class of cases above stated.

And in like manner, every assignee shall, during said month, make like return to such clerk of,

First, the number of voluntary and compulsory cases, respectively and separately, in his charge during said year;

Secondly, the amount of assets and liabilities therein, respectively and separately;

Thirdly, the total receipts and disbursements therein, respectively and separately;

Fourthly, the amount of dividends paid or declared, and the rate per centum thereof, in each class, respectively and separately;

Fifthly, the total amount of all his fees, charges, and emoluments, of every kind therein, earned or received;

Sixthly, the total amount of expenses incurred by him for legal proceedings and counsel fees;

Seventhly, the disposition of the cases respectively;

Eighthly, a summarized statement of both classes as aforesaid.

And in like manner the clerk of said court, in the month of August in each year, shall make up a statement for such year, ending June 30th, of,

First, all cases in bankruptcy pending at the beginning of the said year;

Secondly, all of such cases disposed of;

Thirdly, all dividends declared therein;

Fourthly, the number of reports made from each assignee therein;

Fifthly, the disposition of all such cases;

Digitized by Google

Sixthly, the number of assignee's accounts filed and settled;

Seventhly, whether any marshal, register, or assignee has failed to make and file with such clerk the reports by this act required, and, if any have failed to make such reports, their respective names and residences.

And such clerk shall report in respect of all cases begun during said year.

And he shall make a classified statement, in tabular form, of all his fees, charges, costs, and emoluments, respectively, earned or accrued during said year, giving each head under which the same accrued, and also the sum of all moneys paid into and disbursed out of court in bankruptcy, and the balance in hand or on deposit.

And all the statements and reports herein required shall be under oath, and signed by the persons respectively making the same.

And said clerk shall, in said month of August, transmit every such statement and report so filed with him, together with his own statement and report aforesaid, to the attorney-general of the United States.

Any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall, on motion made under the direction of the attorney-general, be by the district court dismissed from his office, and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year.

Sec. 20. That in addition to the officers now authorized to take proof of debts against the estate of a bankrupt, notaries public are hereby authorized to take such proof, in the manner and under the regulations provided by law; such proof to be certified by the notary and attested by his signature and official seal.

Sec. 21. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby repealed.

Approved June 22, 1874.

Correspondence — An American Lawyer in London—English Courts and Lawyers.

LONDON, May, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—It seems me there is no lack of business among the London lawyers. Apparently, here as elsewhere, so far as I know, they are among the busiest of men. London is a great city. According to the census of 1871, its population then was upwards of three and a quarter millions. It is said the increase is at the rate of about 42,000 per annum, which would give a present population of about three and a half millions. Then there are at all times, but especially at this season of the year, a great many strangers in the city not included in the census, a considerable part of whom are here on busines; so that while it would not be quite correct to say the number of people here is infinite, it is, at least, pretty safe to say, it is indefinite. And when it is said, by some one who knows little, there are in London, 3,000 attorneys and 3,900 barristers, to "aggravate or settle the little differences," it ought to be added by some one who knows more and better, that a large proportion of the population of London is engaged in traffic, and that, as in the United States, so here in England, to no profession or class are the people so much indebted for their well-being as to lawyers.

The leading lawyers here are usually occupied in some one of the courts or at chambers or before some master in some trial, hearing or examination from ten to four. The two hours from four to six are usually devoted to office consultations, mostly by prior appointment. The house of parliament usually sits at six, and such lawyers as are members attend such sittings at that hour. These sittings sometimes last into the morning. Most lawyers of note belong to some club. The principle clubs are about forty in number. One of them, it is said, has two thousand members; several others have nearly as many. Most of the club houses are delightfully located; they are generally very large, and sumptuously fitted and furnished. Membership, I should think, must be expensive; but such lawyers as are members are doubtles in the receipt of large incomes. The salary of the lord high chancellor is £10,000, equal to $50,000 in gold; the salary of the chief justice of the Queen's Bench is £8,000; that of the lord chief baron of the Exchequer, £7,000; and that of the lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, £7,000. Yet I am told the fees of some of the London lawyers in full practice aggregate annually more than the largest of these sums. But such cases I think must be rare, and will be found only where laborious and steady application is conjoined with great ability. The receipts of most lawyers are doubtless considerably less than the smallest of these sums. Yet I believe, as a rule, the lawyers in London are better paid than lawyers in the leading cities of the United States for like service. Mr. Webster said his observation led him to believe that most good lawyers in America worked hard, lived well and died poor. I should not be surprised to learn that such was the history of lawyers here.

There are now four courts sitting at Westminster Hall—the Court of Chancery, the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer. Besides these, there is the Vice Chancellor's Court, that sits at Lincoln's Inn; the "Crown Cases Reserved Court;" the Court of Appeals in Chancery; the Courts of Probate and Divorce and Matrimonial Causes; the High Court of Admiralty; the London Bankruptcy Court; the Rolls Court; the City and Metropolitan Courts, and some others whose names I do not remember; besides associate judges sitting at chambers, masters' and auditors' hearings, and the like. And over all these, in the last resort, the House of Lords is the court of appeals from the Exchequer, in error; from the Queen's Bench and Common Pleas; from the decrees of the equity courts in England, including appeals in bankruptcy; from the decisions of the courts for matrimonial causes, or petitions for dissolution of marriage; from the orders of the courts of probate, and from the courts of Scotland and Ireland. It is also the court for the trials of impeachments. It sits in its own house, and the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, at present the Rt. Hon. ROUNDELL, BARON SELBORNE, presides.

PELHAM.

Book Notice.

BYLES ON BILLS. By the Hon. Sir JOHN BARNARD BYLES, late one of the judges of Her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas. 6th American from the 11th London edition, with notes illustrating the law and practice in the United States, by the Hon. GEORGE SHARSWOOD of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia: T. & J. W. Johnson & Co. 1874. pp. 783.

This treatise has a distinctive character among the works on Notes and Bills. The first edition appeared over forty-five years ago, and the eleventh London edition passed under the eye of the venerable author in 1873. When it first appeared the elaborate work of Mr. Chitty was, with the exception of the small volume of Mr. Justice BAYLEY, almost the only one then in use. Mr. Chitty's work is very full, and laboriously collects nearly all the English cases upon the subject which had then been reported; and the purpose of Mr. Justice BYLES was to produce a treatise of a different character, namely, "a plain and brief summary of the practical points relating to bills and notes, supported by a reference to the leading or latest authorities." Whoever examines the work will find abundant evidence that it was written by an experienced and practical hand for practical use. It is not enriched by mere learning and philosophic discussion like the Commentaries of Mr. Justice STORY, nor does it aim, like the treatises of Chitty and Parsons, to supply a library on the subject of Commercial Paper, and to bring into view the fine distinctions with which, on many points of minor consequence the cases abound. A leading point of merit in the work is that it is not too large, and to us its chief value consists in giving, in so excellent and reliable a form, the condensed essence of the English law of negotiable paper, by a judge of great ability, and whose performance has maintained it in favor with the profession for near half a century.

Summary of Our Exchanges.

The Chicago Legal News, June 20th, publishes Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Baring, Supreme Court U. S., holding that maritime liens constitute an insurable interest. Also, Burke v. Tigre, same court, relating to the question when the functions of the Provisional Court of Louisiana cease—in other words, when the war ceased and civil authority was restored in that state. Also the opinion of Chief Justice WAITE, sitting in the Eastern Virginia Circuit Court, in the case of Daniel Deckert, a bankrupt, holding that the amendatory bankrupt act of 1873 is unconstitutional in so far as it exempts against the creditors of a bankrupt a different amount of property in one state from the amount it exempts in another. Also, The People v. Chicago and Alton R. R. Co., U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of Illinois, DAVIS, DRUMMOND and TREAT, JJ., which involves a construction of the act of congress of April 20, 1871, being the act to enforce the 14th amendment, relative to the removal of causes from the state courts to the federal courts.

The state commenced a prosecution in its own name against the railroad company, a corporation of the state, for a violation of the state act of May 2

Digitized by Google

1873, in the Circuit Court of Sangamon County. After the action was commenced the defendant, in vacation, filed a petition, verified by affidavit, with the clerk of this court, which alleged, in substance, that the railroad company claimed the rights, privileges and immunities secured by the constitution of the United States, and that, under the color of the act of this state, above mentioned, the company was subject to be deprived of the same, and asking for a writ of certiorari to the state court, where the action was pending; the clerk accordingly issued the writ of certiorari, requiring the state court to send to the court the record and proceedings in the cause. The court hold that certiorari will not lie to the state court in such a case, and that the remedy remains as before the act of 1871, by writ of error under the 25th section of the judiciary act. The Legal News also prints notes of several Michigan cases by Mr. Chaney, and also Mrs. Lockwood's brief holding that "Queen Victoria controls parliament, the legislative power of England."

The Albany Law Journal for June contains an editorial article on "The Contract of Marriage," the occasion of which is the Brinkley divorce case, in which it takes a similar view of that case to the view taken by this journal in a previous number, and in which it also commends the New York rule on the subject of marriage as the preferable one. It concludes by saying: "We hope our legislature will never enact that, to constitute a valid contract of marriage, there must be the sanction of a priest, or the warrant of a magistrate, or a permission from the state, or the consent of parents, or a previous announcement to the public in any way of the intention to enter into such a contract." The Albany Law Journal also contains an article on "Ancient Lights," by J. Alexander Fulton, Esq., of Dover, Delaware. This reminds us that we have had on our desk, for some time, the "Opinion of Hon. DANIEL M. BATES, Chancellor of the State of Delaware, in the case of James E. Clawson v. Joseph Primrose, Kent County, September term, 1873," in which Mr. Fulton was counsel for the complainant, and for which we are indebted to his courtesy. This case holds that the English doctrine upon the subject of ancient lights is in force in Delaware. We have not been able to publish this opinion on account of its length.

In the article in the Albany Law Journal, Mr. Fulton says: "In Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, South Carolina, Louisiana, Illinois and Delaware, the principle has been recognized and enforced as a rule of property. In Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Maine and West Virginia it has been repudiated. In the other states there are no reported cases, so far as we are aware. It is to be noted, however, that the law has been changed in Massachusetts by positive enactment; while in New York, Maryland and South Carolina, it has been changed or modified by judicial departure. In New Jersey, Delaware, Illinois and Louisiana the law remains undisturbed in all its vigor. What it may be in the states yet to hear from can only be matter of conjecture. The opinion of the bar is somewhat divided, but the large preponderance is in favor of the common law principle. As one evidence of this, it may be noted that no exception was taken or dissatisfaction expressed for more than sixty years after our revolution."

We may add that the doctrine has been repudiated in Texas by judicial decision; although the common law is in force in that state, having been introduced by statute in 1840.

Mr. Fulton concludes his article as follows:

"The general doctrine in England, and the states which have adopted the common law principle, has evolved a prime and several incidental rules, which may be conveniently reduced to these formulæ:

"1. The uninterrupted use and enjoyment of light and air flowing into one's apartment over another's land for a period of twenty years or upwards, gives an indefeasible right to its future use and enjoyment.

"2. It is not necessary, to the acquisition of the right, that the ancient light should be on the division line between the two lots; if near enough to be materially affected by the new erection, it is sufficient

"3. The enlargement of the light will not enlarge the right, and if the increased flow cannot be obstructed without obstructing the ancient light as well, the right is lost, as the fault was with the owner of the ancient light. But a restoration of the ancient light to its former dimensions will restore the right.

"4. The right may be lost in the same way it is acquired; to-wit, by twenty years' disuse. But if an ancient light be shut up and disused by a tenant for twenty years, without the landlord's consent, it is not so.

"5. The conversion from one use to another does not enlarge or impair the right; and if an apartment have an ancient light, and the owner sets up some business therein which requires two, he gains no additional right thereby.

"6. Obstructing an ancient light is an injury to the inheritance, and a remainderman may sue.

"7. If the owner of two adjoining lots, with a house on one and none on the other, sell the one with the house, neither he nor a subsequent purchaser can build on the unimproved lot so as to shut up the windows on that side, and this although they are not ancient.

"8. In a contemporaneous sale of such lots by the same owner, the same rule applies.

"9. Formerly, the remedy was more frequent at law; but latterly, in equity, and generally whenever the injury is substantial, a bill will be entertained. It is the preferable method in most cases, and the only complete remedy in many."

The Albany Law Journal also publishes two New York decisions of a local character, and also its usual amount of notes, abstracts of cases, etc.

The Pittsburgh Legal Journal for June 17, contains a charge of Judge WHITE, of the District Court of Allegheny county, expounding the Pennsylvania statute which relates to the forfeiture of floating logs where the owner fails to take them away within three months, holding that it is to be strictly construed. Also an opinion by SHERMAN, J., in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio, construing the United States practice act of 1872. The rest of its matter is selected.

The Chicago Railway Review for June 20, contains an article on the Wisconsin railroad law, which is creating such a stir—by E. Walker, Esq., of Chicago—which concludes as follows:

"And finally that the act of '74, does not in any manner affect the title of stockholders in R. property, and so far as it attempts to limit or control its income, or prescribe arbitrary tariffs for its use, it is unconstitutional and void."

The Daily Register for June 19 and 20 contains an elaborate decision of FREEDMAN, J., in Astor v. The Mayor, etc., in which he discusses the exercise of the right of eminent domain in taking property for the purpose of widening streets, and holds that a statute empowering a report to be made by two of three commissioners without a consultation with the third, is unconstitutional, because the constitution of the state provides that there must not be less than three commissioners. This opinion is worth the attention of those having this subject under investigation.

The Chicago Legal News of June 27, prints United States v. Cook, United States Supreme Court, which relates to the right of Indians to cut and sell timber on their reservation. Also Osborne v. United States, same court, construing the 7th section of the act of congress imposing taxes on distilled spirits (15 Stat. 127.) Also the case Porter v. Rockford, Rock Island and St. Louis Railway Co., Supreme Court of Illinois, upon the subject of the taxation of railway shares, and the equalization of railroad taxation. Also the opinion of Judge BRADY, of the New York Supreme Court, General Term, on the application of Tweed for a mandamus to compel Judge NOAH DAVIS, before whom Tweed was tried, to settle a bill of exceptions. This is a short but interesting opinion. We shall publish it hereafter. The News also contains an opinion of the United States Supreme Court in Commissioners of Boise County v. Gorman, by WAITE, C. J., holding that under the practice act of 1872, upon the filing of the bond within sixty days from the time of the entry of the judgment, a supersedeas may be obtained; that such a supersedeas, however, stays proceedings only from the filing of the bond; that it prevents further proceedings under an execution which has been issued, but does not interfere with what has already been done.

Several cases not noticed in this summary, will be noticed in our Notes of Cases next week.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE governor of Virginia has adopted a series of rules in regard to the surrender of alleged fugitives from justice from other states. Copies can be had on application to the secretary of the commonwealth.

—THE latest improvement which we have to chronicle is a telegraph service to be established between the various courts of New York city, and the offices of those lawyers who subscribe to it. The great advantage of such a service is obvious. We trust it may prove so advantageous in New York that it will be initiated in St. Louis.

Digitized by Google

—In the New York Court of Common Pleas Justice DAILY has decided that a horse breaking away from a street car and dashing into another car, whereby a citizen was killed, was an unavoidable accident, and directed a dismissal of a suit for damages. If judges have a right to decide questions like this, what are juries for?

—The Daily Register says: "Judge LOEW, at the Chambers of the Court of Common Pleas, on the application of Col. Geo. H. Hart, has just given a decision that Sister Irene, of the Catholic Foundling Asylum, must, if her evidence be necessary, give it in a divorce case; and that when it is specifically shown that the books of such an institution, however sheltered its ordinary position under the sacred wing of religion, must be produced if they are essential in the elucidation of a matter of right and justice. Many years ago this assumed right of exemption of those in seclusion from the world was sought to be fought in England, but in a memorable case in which a charge was made of the ill usuage of a child, the ladies of a nunnery had to appear in court under the mandate of the lord chief justice."

—Hon. GEORGE S. HILLIARD, of Boston, is said to be so far recovered from an attack of paralysis as to be able to appear in public. He is planning the publication of his life of Professor Ticknor. His last literary work before his recent illness was an elaborate biography of Jeremiah Mason (the celebrated lawyer of the last generation in New England), who, like Daniel Webster, began his professional career in New Hampshire, but achieved his greatest eminence after emigration to Boston. Mr. Hilliard's biography of Mason has not been published, but was prepared and printed for private distribution among the Mason family. Mr. Hilliard will be remembered as an early associate of Mr. Sumner in the practice of the law, and in the editorial management of The American Jurist.

—The president has approved of the bill for the distribution of the Geneva award, and nominated the following gentlemen to be judges of the court of commissioners of the Alabama claims: Hezekiah G. Wells, of Michigan; Martin Ryerson, of New Jersey; Kenneth Raynor, of Mississippi; George W. Woodward, of Pennsylvania, and Caleb Baldwin, of Ohio. Also, John Davis, of Massachusetts, to be clerk of the court of commissioners. The president afterwards withdrew the name of George W. Woodward, and nominated in his place William A. Porter, of Pennsylvania. The latter, and the other nominees to be commissioners, together with John Davis to be clerk of the court, were subsequently confirmed.

—The New York Herald says of the ring suits recently decided by the court of appeals of that state: "The decision of the court of appeals in the suits brought in the name of the people of the state against Ingersoll, Tweed, and other members of the old city government is not a surprise to the legal profession. Very few lawyers have doubted the result. The money sought to be recovered belonged to the county of New York, and an action lies at the suit of the board of supervisors for its recovery, for the title to and ownership of the money must determine the right of action. The people of the state are not injured, and the defendants were not agents of the state. These points appeared so clear to legal minds before the decision that wonder has been expressed that the suits were ever instituted. It has been a costly litigation to the city, and it is to be hoped that the county suits will not have a similar disastrous termination.

—Through the courtesy of Dr. HAMMOND, of Iowa City, we have received a copy of the constitution of the Iowa state bar association. Its objects are: "To promote mutual acquaintance and harmony among the members of the Iowa bar; to maintain a high standard of professional integrity, honor and courtesy among them; to encourage a thorough and liberal legal education; to give expression to the deliberate and well-considered opinion of the legal profession upon all matters wherein its members are properly expected to act as a body; and to assist in the improvement of the laws and the better administration of justice to all classes of society without distinction." As this is, we believe, the the first state bar association which has yet been organized in the the country, it may not be uninteresting to note that its principal feature is that it provides for the organization of auxiliary associations embracing one or more counties—the state association occupying the position, not exactly of a grand lodge, but of a general convention of the whole. This constitution was drawn by Dr. HAMMOND, except those sections which are borrowed from the constitution of the Chicago bar association.

—The application of Miss Anthony for a remission of her fine (see ante, p. 296), met with a different fate at the hands of the senate judiciary committee, from that which it received at the hands of the judiciary committee of the house. Mr. Edmonds, from the senate judiciary committee, by unanimous consent, made a report upon the petition of Susan B. Anthony for a remission of the fine imposed upon her by the United States District Court for the Northern District of New York, and the bill introduced in the senate to enable her to pay her fine. He said the committee reported adversely and asked to be discharged from a further consideration of the subject, for the reason that the committee did not feel satisfied that the statement contained in the petition in respect to the rulings of the judge of the northern district of New York was precisely as represented by the petitioner; and, again, the committee did not believe it had the power to review United States courts. If the petitioner thought her conviction erroneous she could apply to the executive, who had the power to pardon her. The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and the bill was indefinitely postponed. There was one senator, however, who thought that congress ought not to let the occasion pass without declaring its disapproval of the fact that a citizen had been convicted in a criminal case without the verdict of a jury. Mr. Carpenter, expressing his views as a minority of the senate judiciary committee, regarding the memorial of Susan B. Anthony, says the decision of the court on her trial was erroneous in taking the case from the jury and directing their verdict, and refusing the request of her counsel to have the jury polled—thus denying to the jury, not only the moral right, but even the power of rendering a verdict of not guilty. Mr. Carpenter concurs with the majority of the committee that congress cannot grant the precise relief prayed for in the memorial; but he deems it to be the duty of congress to declare its disapproval of the doctrine asserted and the course pursued in the trial of Miss Anthony, and all the more for the reason that no judicial court has jurisdiction to review the proceedings therein.

—It appears that General Butler espoused the cause of Mrs. Lockwood, whose application to be admitted to the bar of the Court of Claims was recently denied. He reported a bill authorizing women, otherwise qualified, to practice as attorneys in the several courts of the United States. It was ordered to a third reading by a vote of 96 to 65, "amid great hilarity." In the meantime Mrs. Lockwood has prepared a brief on the question, which some of the law journals have done her the kindness to print. We confess to being somewhat disappointed in this brief. If Mrs. Bradwell had had the matter in hand she would have done better. But perhaps it only illustrates the old maxim which does not impute much wisdom to the person who attempts to be his own lawyer. But seriously, Mrs. Lockwood had a golden opportunity before her, not only to give character to her cause, but also to advance her reputation as a lawyer, by answering the inconclusive arguments which Mr. Justice NOTT put forth as legal reasons for refusing her application. She might have gone further. She might, perhaps, have uprooted that learned justice in the more solid position he took when he planted himself upon ancient custom and prejudice and the eternal fitness of things. In fact, she might have > "Made herself a fearful monument—

> The wreck of old opinions."

But, unfortunately, she made no such thing. She cited the District of Columbia married woman's law, called attention to the fact that women have been admitted as attorneys in several other courts throughout the country, and informed the persons for whose benefit the brief was intended that Queen Victoria "controls parliament—the legislative power of England." This last observation probably failed to strike the average congressman as being very profound. Indeed, Mrs. Lockwood would have been more discreet had she gone back into antiquity and cited the doubtful fame of Semiramis, or the more historic achievements of Zenobia, Queen of the East, who sent one Roman general home with the loss of his army and of his reputation, and the conquest of whose dominions deserved the utmost exertions of the great Aurelian. Indeed, had Mrs. Lockwood quoted a few of the stately sentences in which Gibbon describes that most splendid woman of antiquity, they would have impressed the reader more profoundly than all the rest of her brief.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JULY 9, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURT UNDER ENFORCEMENT ACT.—The opinion of Mr. Circuit Judge DRUMMOND on this interesting and important question, which we withheld from our readers last week in order to get a correct proof, we now give, the proof having been corrected by the learned judge himself.

THE BANKRUPT ACT.—Having carefully compared the amendatory bankrupt act, as printed by us last week, with an authenticated copy furnished by the state department, we are glad to state that as given by us it was correctly printed—the only deviation from the authenticated copy being one or two slight matters of punctuation which do not affect the sense.

INSANITY OF DEFENDANT PENDING DIVORCE PROCEEDINGS—THE MORDAUNT CASE.—A cable dispatch of June 22 announces that the House of Lords, in the celebrated Mordaunt case, has decided that the proceedings for a divorce shall proceed notwithstanding the insanity of the lady occurring during the pendency of the trial. The inferior court decided that the effect of insanity supervening on the trial was to cause the proceedings to be suspended while that condition remained. On the appeal of the husband, Sir Charles Mordaunt, this decision has, it seems, just been reversed. To the legal mind this decision is of more interest than the disgusting details of the respondent's criminal infidelities with various persons in British high life.

REVISION OF THE STATUTE LAW AND CODIFICATION OF THE COMMON LAW.—The Irish Law Times of June 20 contains an article under the above caption, which concludes with the following language, indicating the remarkable changes which are taking place in the British Islands, no less in the judiciary system than in the body of the law itself: "If the lord chancellor should proceed with the codification of the common law during the next session, as he proposes, we will then have the three new systems simultaneously established, which will alter the entire administration of the law in all its branches—expediting, simplifying and contracting its rules, enactments and procedure, and effecting a revolution which will be unprecedented in its nature and extent." We shall reprint the article hereafter.

RAILWAY MANAGEMENT—INVITATION TO PASSENGERS TO ALIGHT.—The Irish Law Times for June 20 contains an interesting article on the question of the liability of a railway company for damages sustained by passengers in attempting to alight after an invitation to do so has been given by the servants of the company, in which the following cases are examined and compared: Nicolls v. Great Southern and Western Ry. Co., 7 Ir. Law Times, 58; Cockle v. London and Southeastern Ry. Co., L. R. 7 C. P. 321; Weller v. London, Brighton and South Coast Ry. Co., 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 888, and Bridges v. North London Ry. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 377. The learned editor concludes as follows: "The result of the cases seems to be that the liability of the company rests on the fact whether the passengers were warranted in forming the conclusion that the final stand-still was arrived at; but that the calling out the name of the company's station by the company's servants is not enough to authorize the passengers to assume that this is the case in the absence of other circumstances."

INSOLVENT INSURANCE COMPANIES.—THE "BANNER COMPANY" OF CHICAGO.—POWER OF RECEIVER TO SUE IN ANOTHER STATE.—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDER.—At the request of several subscribers, we have procured, and in this number publish, the substance of a recent important decision, in the United States Circuit Court for Iowa, of Mr. Justice MILLER, of the Supreme Court of the United States, on the points above indicated. It will be seen that under the contract which was sought to be enforced against the stockholder, the learned justice was of opinion that a call or assessment or something equivalent thereto, was essential to the defendant's liability.

On the general subject of the liability of subscribers to the stock of corporations, and as to the effect of fraud practiced by the agents of the company to induce a person to subscribe for stock, and the duty as respects creditors of the company, of the person deceived to repudiate the contract promptly on discovering the fraud, and how such repudiation must be made, we refer the reader to the case of Upton, assignee, etc., v. Englehart, published in the Western Jurist for June, 1874, decided by the United States Court for the District of Iowa, at its May Term, 1874.

LAW SCHOOLS—REFORM NEEDED.—As practically conducted at present, we doubt the beneficial effects of law schools upon the profession or the public. This is the period of "commencements," when, in the various states, literally hundreds of young lawyers are made and turned out as with machinery. Let us not be misunderstood. Law schools are valuable as means of instruction, and if they were prohibited from graduating students except those who had attended two full courses of instruction in different years, or in lieu of one of the courses two full years in some law office, their effect would undoubtedly be good. But in almost all the law schools students are admitted fresh from the field, plow or college, and at the end of one year's course (about eight or nine months' actual study) graduated under laws which entitle the graduate to full admission to the bar without further examination. This is wrong. It is a permanent injury to the young man who is thus prematurely made a lawyer. It is an injury to the profession, and an injury to the community. We protest against it. Many of the young men thus "turned out" as lawyers are not competent, by reason of their inexperience, to take charge of the business which they are supposed to understand. Unless this evil of rapid graduation be reformed the profession ought to set their faces against law schools. But what is better is that the profession shall encourage law schools, but see that, by proper legislation, they are prevented from such rapid and superficial processes of manufacture. One school says we can't adopt the reform of requiring attendance upon two full courses, because it will drive all the students to some institution which requires only one course. This is the practical difficulty in the way, and it can best be met by legislation requiring two years in a lawyer's office as a substitute for one year's course of instruction in a law school, and by requiring young men who graduate also to submit to an examination before admission to the bar.

Digitized by Google

Mandamus to Compel a Judge to Settle a Bill of Exceptions.

It will be remembered that not long since William M. Tweed, who had been tried and convicted on a great many counts of the same indictment for misdemeanors in office, and imprisoned in the penitentiary on Blackwell's Island, made an application through his counsel, to the supreme court in general term, for a mandamus to compel Judge NOAH DAVIS, before whom the indictment was tried, to settle a bill of exceptions in the case.

The ground on which the mandamus was sought was not that the judge had refused to sign or settle a bill of exceptions at all, but that he had refused to settle it in a particular manner; and thus a question which has been often passed upon before was again presented, namely, whether an appellate tribunal will, in aid of its jurisdiction, control by mandamus the decision of the judge of the court of first instance, in settling a bill of the exceptions which were taken at the trial. And the court answer this question in the negative. The opinion of the court was delivered by BRADY, J., as follows:

"The rule established by the cases upon applications kindred to this, is that a mandamus will be ordered commanding a judge to sign a bill of exceptions, but not to settle it in a particular manner when there is a dispute as to the incidents of the trial. The justice who presided must say whether or not an exception was taken, and his return is controlling, at least until further proceedings. If the return is alleged to be false, the suggestive remedy is by action. People v. Judges of Washington, 1 Caines, 511; People v. Judges Common Pleas, 2 Caines, 97; People v. Judges Westchester, 2 John. Cases, 118; Fisth v. Weatherwax, 2 John. Cases, 215; Sikes v. Ransom, 6 John. Rep. 279; People v. Sessions, Wayne Co., 15 How. N. Y. 393; Tidd's Pr. 903; Delavan v. Boardman, 5 Wend. 132; but whether such a remedy in fact exists, quære; see Weaver v. Devendorf, 3 Denio, 120.

"In England, according to Tidd. supra, if the alternative writ contain the surmise of an exception taken and overruled, the command is to sign the bill quod si ita est (if it be so); but if the judge returns quod non ita est (it is not so), an action lies at the instance of the aggrieved party. If he establish the falsity of the return, he recovers damages and the peremptory mandamus goes forth, because the jury have declared that the exception was taken.

"In this state, in one case, it was said that a referee would be compelled by mandamus to settle a case, and to settle it correctly (The People v. Baker, 35 Barbour, 105), but the writ was not issued, owing to some informality in the proceedings. The decision was made at a special term, and is predicated of the cases in 1 Caines, 6 John. and 5 Wend., supra; but an examination of these cases shows that the proposition asserted is not warranted by them, and the case stands alone. I have not found any case in which it has been declared that a mandamus would be issued against a judge, commanding him to settle a bill of exceptions in a particular manner, when as to the manner there was a dispute. There were no authorities to that effect cited on the argument. In this matter there is a dispute as to the correctness of the bill, as passed upon by the presiding justice in reference to exceptions, and he certifies that it is correct, although having directed it to be engrossed, it has not yet been presented for his signature.

"There seems to be a concession that an exception was taken to the exclusion of the juror Hayes upon a challenge to the favor, but the presiding justice certifies that he was excluded for mental incompetency, and it was so understood. Upon a careful examination, not only of the authorities, but of the application, I have arrived at the conclusion, for the reasons assigned, and those presented by Justices DANIELS and WESTBROOK, that the mandamus asked for should not be granted."

Liability of a Married Woman to be Made a Bankrupt.

Our readers will recollect that some time since (ante, pp. 137-9) we published a decision of Judge HOFFMAN of the federal district court for California on this interesting subject, together with a note in which we collated at some length the American and English decisions on the question. An interesting case involving the same question has recently been before the English Court of apppeal in Chancery, which consists of the lord chancellor and two lords justices. We refer to re Heneage, L. R., 9 Ch. 307, in which it was ruled that a clause of § 12 of the Married Woman's Property Act, of 1870, which provides that a husband shall not, by reason of a mariage after the act takes effect "be liable for the debts of his wife contracted before marriage, but the wife shall be liable to be sued for, and any property belonging to her for her separate use shall be liable to satisfy such debts, as if she had continued unmarried," does not make a married woman liable to be adjudicated a bankrupt. This decision amounts to a reversal of the judgment of Mr. RUSSELL, judge of the Manchester County Court, in re Phillips, 17 Solicitor's Journal, 385, who had taken the contrary view of the statute.

Concerning these decisions the Solicitor's Journal says: "In the exceptional cases where, by the custom of the city of London, or upon the banishment of the husband, the wife is permitted to be sued as a feme sole, she may also be adjudicated a bankrupt. Lavie v. Philip, 3 Burr. 1783; ex parte Franks, 7 Bing. 764. When the Married Woman's Property Act, 1870, enacted that 'the wife shall be liable to be sued for and any property belonging to her for her separate use shall be liable to satisfy' her debts contracted before marriage, 'as if she had continued unmarried,' it was not unnaturally assumed that the same consequence would follow. Mr. J. A. RUSSELL, Q. C., the Manchester County Court judge, in re Philips (17 S. J. 385), held that the effect of the 12th section of the act was to make the wife a single woman in respect of debts contracted before marriage, and to subject her, therefore, to the same consequences as regards liability to be adjudicated bankrupt in respect of those debts as if she had continued unmarried. The majority of the full court of appeal are disinclined thus to carry out the section to its logical consequence. Laying stress on the words 'shall be liable to be sued for,' and gliding gently over the rest of the section, the lord chancellor and JAMES, L.J., came to the conclusion that liability to be sued is the only liability imposed by it. MELISH, L.J., who seems to have had his eye upon the words 'and any property belonging to her for her separate use shall be liable to satisfy such debts as if she had continued unmarried,' expressed himself as 'not quite satisfied,' that if the wife had been shown to have separate property she might not have been made a bankrupt, and he remarked that he did not 'wish to prejudice the question when it shall arise.' It did not appear, however, in the recent case, that the wife had any separate property, and the lord justice was clear that 'there are no words in the section which can be made to apply to a woman who has no separate property.' It is perhaps not necessary to take the case as deciding more than that a married woman without separate property cannot be made bankrupt in respect of debts contracted before marriage. But the observations of the majority of the court lead to the conclusion that where she has separate property the legislature must be taken to have provided—to use the words of the county court judge—that 'any one creditor, by suing the wife, might snap up every sixpence worth of property and leave all the other creditors in the lurch.' Mr. RUSSELL 'could not conceive that the legislature could have been so extraordinarily forgetful of the operation of the law' as to intend this result. But the lord chancellor's experience of the mode in which acts are framed and passed has taught him 'that the legislature may have overlooked this result.'"

Digitized by Google

New Amendments to Bankrupt Act—Retroactive Effect—Action of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri.

The effect of the recent changes in the bankrupt act are seen to be very extensive in the practical administration of it. Recently the United States District Court for the the Eastern District of Missouri, in thirty-six pending cases of involuntary bankruptcy, ordered that the petitions be amended to conform to the new law in its retroactive aspects. Many difficulties were found to arise, for the cases were in various stages of advancement. In some instances adjudications had been made, assignees appointed, property sold, suits by assignees decided, etc. After a full examination of all the pending cases, Mr. District Judge TREAT, instead of making a special order in each one, made the general order below given. The object of this order is to set the new machinery in motion and to expedite the cases. The schedules etc , are before the Registers and they can report so that if no exception be taken, the court can pass at once the necessary orders. In addition to the question as to the necessary "number and amount" of creditors, is the question (vastly important) of an amended petition averring 40 instead of 14 days, suspension of commercial paper and the description of that paper required by the new act. These questions and others will soon arise and we shall aim to keep our readers speedily advised of the decisions. The bankrupt act promises to be a permanent feature in our jurisprudence and its effect and practical operation are essential to be known.

The following are the general orders of Judge TREAT above mentioned.

ORDER NO. 1.

It is ordered that the petitioning creditor or creditors in all compulsory or involuntary cases commenced since December 1, 1873, amend their petitions respectively within thirty days, in conformity with section 12 of an act to amend and supplement an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes, which said amendatory and supplementary act was approved June 22, 1874; said amended petition to be signed and verified as by said section required.

ORDER NO. 2.

It is ordered that in all cases in involuntary or compulsory bankruptcy commenced since December, 1, 1873, wherein the petitioning creditor or creditors have been ordered to file an amended petition within thirty days, the debtor or debtors against whom said proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced shall have within five days from the filing of said amended petition, and notice given, and if no notice is given, then within five days from the expiration of said thirty days (said amended petition having been duly filed), to deny or admit in writing that at least one-fourth in number of his or their creditors, the aggregate of whose debts provable, under said act, amounts to at least one-third of the debts so proveable, have joined in said petition.

And if said debtor or debtors deny in writing the allegation in the amended petition as to the number and amount of petitioning creditors, he or they shall file in court forthwith a full list of their creditors, with their places of residence and the sums due them respectively. And said amended petition and the answer thereto, and said list of creditors, or in the event of the failure to file the answer or list as aforesaid, said amended petition and the fact of such failure shall be certified to the register in charge of the case, or to whom the same is referable under the rules of this court, for his certificate to the court of the facts with respect thereto, to be ascertained after reasonable notice given to the creditors.

Whenever, in any case, the register shall certify that the required number and amount as aforesaid have not so petitioned, the petitioning creditor or creditors shall have twenty days from the filing of said certificate within which other creditors may join in such petition.

In all compulsory cases commenced since December 1, 1873, in which assignees have been appointed, and the property in their hands is perishable, or the keeping thereof attended with expense, they may respectively, with the consent of the respective debtors, sell the same, and retain the proceeds of said sale subject to the further order of this court.

All other proceedings in said compulsory cases are hereby stayed until the further order of this court.

The clerk wrote out the following notification:

Petitioning creditors in all voluntary cases in bankruptcy filed since the first day of December, 1873, are hereby notified that, pursuant to the order of the court this day made herein, they are required to file, within thirty days herefrom, amended petitions in conformity with the requirements of the amended bankrupt act.

Insolvent State Banks—Appropriation of Assets to Pay State Indebtedness.

BARING BROTHERS & CO., et al., v. DABNEY, MORGAN & CO., THE BANK OF THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, et al.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 153, October Term, 1873.

1. Insolvent State Banks—State Indebtedness—Rights of General Creditors.—Though the stock of a bank be altogether owned by a state, if the bank is insolvent its assets cannot be appropriated by legislative act or otherwise to pay the debts of the state, as distinguished from the debts of the bank. Those assets are a trust fund first applicable to the payment of the debts of the bank.

2. ——. ——. —— An act of the legislature requiring the managers of an insolvent bank belonging to the state to hold its assets appropriated to the payment of certain specified debts, creates a trust in favor of the creditors holding said debts, and, if assented to by them, amounts to a contract with them to carry out said trust.

3. ——. ——. ——. If such an act, however, has the effect to appropriate the assets of the bank to pay the debts of the state, to the prejudice of billholders and other creditors of the bank, it is repugnant to that clause of the constitution which prohibits a law impairing the obligation of contracts and is void.

4. ——. ——. ——. Such an act passed by the legislature of South Carolina reference to the assets of the bank of the state of South Carolina declared to be void.

In error to the Supreme Court of the state of South Carolina.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the court.

In 1812, the legislature of South Carolina, by a legislative act, created a bank to belong wholly to the state, and the capital to consist of all the stocks, bonds and securities which belonged to the state. The president and directors were to be elected by the legislature, and were made a corporation and body politic. The faith of the state was pledged for the support of the bank, for the supply of any deficiency in the funds specially pledged, and for making good all losses arising from such deficiency. The usual powers were conferred upon the corporation—to purchase, hold, and transfer property of all kinds; to sue and be sued; to adopt its own rules and by-laws; to issue notes, and to make loans by way of discount, secured by mortgage; and to do all acts which might appertain to its functions as a bank.

In December, 1821, by another legislative act, the future profits of the bank were pledged and set apart for the payment of the six per cent. stock previously issued by the state.

In 1838, the city of Charleston suffered from an extensive fire, and the legislature passed an act entitled "An act for rebuilding the city of Charleston."

By the first section of this act the governor was directed and required, in the name of the state, to issue bonds or other contracts, not exceeding two millions of dollars, for the purpose of procuring a loan on the credit of the state to rebuild the burnt portion of the city of Charleston; and the faith and funds of the state were pledged for the punctual payment of the bonds or contracts, with interest.

By the third section the money, when realized in Charleston, was to be deposited in the Bank of the State of South Carolina, and become a part of the capital of the bank.

By the 10th, 11th, and 12th sections it was enacted as follows, to-wit:

Sec. X. "It shall be the duty of the president and directors of the Bank of the State of South Carolina to make proper provisions for the punctual payment of the interest of such loan, and also for the ultimate payment of the principal thereof."

Sec XI. "It shall be the duty of the president and directors of the Bank of the State of South Carolina to cause to be opened in the books of said bank an account in which they shall debit themselves with the profits arising out of the additional capital created out of the two millions loan aforesaid, for the year ending Oct. 1, 1839, and with the future profits of the said loan as the same shall hereafter be annually declared; which said fund, with its annual accumulations, shall be considered solemnly pledged and set apart for the payment of the interest on said loan and the final redemption thereof; and it shall be the duty of the president and directors of the said bank annually to report to both branches of the legislature the exact state of that fund."

Sec. XII. "When the profits of the said Bank of the State of South Carolina shall have paid the interest of certain stocks for which they have been heretofore pledged and set apart, the said profits shall also be considered solemnly pledged and set apart for the payment of the interest on the said loan and the final redemption thereof."

Under this act a large amount of bonds known as "fire-loan" bonds, were issued and negotiated, of which £109,000 payable in London, and due in 1868, are still outstanding in the hands of Barring, Brothers & Co. These bonds, by an endorsement thereon, were guaranteed by the bank.

Other certificates of state stock known as "fire-loan" stock, were also issued under the act payable at the state treasury, and not expressly guaranteed by the bank; of which $318,000 are still outstanding in the hands of the other plaintiffs in error.

At the close of the war the bank became insolvent, and the general assembly passed an act Dec. 21, 1865, entitled "An act to raise supplies for the year," etc.; by the 11th section of which it was enacted as follows:

"Sec. 11. That the president and directors of the Bank of the State of South Carolina be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to close the branches and agencies of said bank, and that the principal bank at Charleston shall cease to be a bank of issue, but shall continue to act as a bank of deposit until further action of the legislature; and the said president and directors are hereby authorized and required to collect the assets and property of the bank and hold the same especially appropriated; first, to the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds known as the "fire-loan bonds payable in Europe; second, to the payment of the principal and interest of the fire-loan bonds payable in the United States; and, third, to the redemption of outstanding notes hitherto issued by said bank."

In October, 1867, before the scheme provided in this act was carried out, Dabney, Morgan & Co., holding bills of the bank, filed the bill in this case in the chancery court of the state for Charleston district, on behalf of themselves and all other billholders of the bank, insisting that the fire-loan bondholders and fire-loan stockholders, were not creditors of the bank, and that the act of 1866 was unconstitutional in that by directing the property of the bank to be applied to the payment of the debts of the state, which were not debts of the bank, it impaired the obligation of contracts. The bill prayed that the bank might be restrained from carrying the act into effect, and that the plaintiffs and other billholders might be decreed to be paid out of the property and assets of the bank.

During the pendency of this suit the legislature of South Carolina, by an act passed September 15, 1868, entitled "An act to close the operations of the Bank of the State of South Carolina," amongst other things, repealed the 11th section of the act of December 21, 1865, above referred to.

On the 7th of May, 1870, it was decreed by the court of first instance, that the fire-loan bondholders and fire-loan stockholders be first paid pari passu, out of the assets of the bank, and that any surplus be applied pro rata to the billholders, depositors and other creditors, after adjusting the claims that arose during the war to the value thereof in United States currency. This decree ignored the 11th section of the act of 1865 altogether, as being unconstitutional, on two grounds: First, as disposing of property which the state did not own, and violating a solemn contract, on the faith of which the loan was taken; and secondly, as having no relation to the other matter of the act, and not being expressed in its title. The contract which the court held to have been violated by this section, was the pledge of profits contained in the 11th and 12th sections of the act of 1838, authorizing the fire-loan. The court held not only that the pledge of the profits was a pledge of the capital, but that the capital had all been drawn out by, and returned to, the state, and that the resulting fund now remaining consisted only of profits. The court further held that this pledge of profits related to both branches of the fire-loan alike, and that the fire-loan stock stood on an equal footing with the fire-loan bonds, although the latter only had been guaranteed by the bank.

The Supreme Court of South Carolina, on appeal, reversed this decree, placing the fire-loan bondholders on an equality with the other creditors, and holding that the fire-loan stockholders were not creditors of the bank at all, and not entitled to any participation in the fund; and directed the assets to be distributed among all the creditors of the bank in proportion to the amount of their claims, reducing those arising during the war to their value in national currency.

The grounds on which this decree was made were: First, that the pledge of profits in the act of 1838, expressly related to profits as distinguished from the capital; that no separate account of such profits had ever been kept; and that the result was, in fact, a loss instead of profit—the small residue of assets yet subsisting being the joint result of capital, deposits and moneys received from loans and discounts; and, therefore, that the pledge relied on by the fire-loan bondholders and stockholders had nothing specific and distinct on which to attach; and that, in fact, nothing was in existence on which it could attach. Secondly, that the fire-loan bondholders were to be admitted as creditors only by the express guaranty of the bonds of the bank; and that the fire-loan stockholders were to be excluded because the bank had never guaranteed said stock. Thirdly, that no claim could be sustained by either under the 11th section of the act of 1865, because that act did not amount to an assignment (which could only be made by the bank), but amounted only to a direction which was never carried into effect, which the state, as sole stockholder of the bank, could, at any time before its execution, revoke, and which, by the act of September, 1868, repealing the said section, it did revoke; and that if the act of 1865 had amounted to an assignment it could not have been sustained as to the fire-loan stockholders, because they were not even creditors of the bank.

Digitized by Google

This decree is brought here by a writ of error, under the 2d section of the act of 1867. The interposition of this court is invoked on the ground that the 11th section of the act of 1865 became a contract with the fire-loan bondholders and fire-loan stockholders, and that the validity of said contract was impaired by the act of 1868, which repealed said section, and which repealing act was sustained by the decree of the Supreme Court of South Carolina.

The first question for us to decide, therefore, is whether the 11th section of the act of 1865 did, as alleged, amount to, or did become, a contract with the appellants.

When that act was passed the bank was hopelessly insolvent. The section referred to was intended to prescribe the manner in which its assets were to be distributed and its affairs wound up. The state was the sole stockholder, and the bank, as a corporation, could not complain of any course of action which the legislature saw fit to adopt or prescribe. In relation to the state, it was alter et idem. In this respect its position was very different from that of private corporations. The action of the legislature could only be questioned by the creditors of the bank. As to the bank itself, the wishes of the legislature were commands. When, therefore, the legislature, by the 11th section of the act of 1865, declared that "the president and directors [of the bank] are hereby authorized and required to collect the assets and property of the bank, and hold the same specially appropriated, first, to the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds known as the fire-loan bonds, payable in Europe; second, to the payment of the principal and interest of the fire-loan bonds payable in the United States; and third, to the redemption of outstanding notes hitherto issued by the bank;" this declaration, if valid, was not only a direction, but a law. It was a law which the bank could not question; only creditors, whose interests were in conflict with it, could question it. As an enactment, it created, ipso facto, a trust, and made the bank a trustee for the parties provided for by it. It was a trust on which the bondholders, when made acquainted with its terms, had a right to rely. They became, if they assented to it, cestuis que trust with vested rights. Being made for their benefit, it will be presumed that they did assent to it if they expressed no dissent.

It is unnecessary to go into the learning of voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors. It is clear law that such an assignment, if assented to by the creditors, or a considerable portion of them, becomes irrevocable; and in this country assent will be presumed if dissent is not expressed. The cases on this subject will be found collected in Burrill on Assisgnments, pp. 84, 309, 418.

In this case, it is true, no actual assignment was made. But for the purpose of creating a trust it was not necessary. The act was a law of the state making the corporation a trustee. What special rights were thus created in favor of the cestuis que trust will be noticed hereafter.

The creation of this trust in favor of the bondholders, if valid, was a contract with them. Confiding in it, they would desist from further efforts to secure the payment of their claims by adverse proceedings. It would be unjust to them to abrogate it and place them where they stood when the trust was created. The repeal of the section in question, therefore, did impair the validity of this contract, and, if the latter was valid, was a violation of the constitution.

This conclusion, however, is based on the assumption that the law itself, namely, the 11th section of the act of 1865, was a valid law. If it was not valid, its repeal cannot be questioned. It is contended before us that it is invalid because it appropriates the assets of the bank to persons who are not creditors of the bank, but creditors of the state only. The objection taken, if valid in fact, is a good one. It was expressly decided in Curran v. The State of Arkansas, 15 Howard, 304, that if the capital of a state bank, like the one in question, be withdrawn by the state, either for the payment of its own debts or for deposit in the state treasury, it is a violation of the pledges by which the capital of the bank, though derived from state resources or state obligations, was set apart and appropriated as the basis of the independent credit of the bank; and that a law passed to effect such a withdrawal or misappropriation impaired the validity of the contracts held by the creditors of the bank.

That case had in it many features of the present one. The legislature of Arkansas, amongst other things, required the bonds of the state held by the bank of Arkansas to be given up and canceled, and authorized the bank officers to receive in payment of debts due the bank bonds of the state issued to raise capital stock for the bank, notwithstanding the bills of the bank might not have been taken up. "We cannot attribute to this provision of the law," says the court, "any other meaning or effect than what is plainly apparent on its face. It authorizes and requires the assets of the bank to be appropriated to pay debts of the state; and we cannot conceive how this can be reconciled with the rights of creditors to those assets." p. 317. The bank in that case, as in this, was insolvent, and the court held that all its assets formed a trust fund for the payment of its creditors, and that a stockholder could not lawfully withdraw any part of this fund from appropriation to that object. and that a law passed for that purpose was unconstitutional. The majority of the court was clearly of opinion that a right on the part of the state to withdraw the funds of the bank for the uses of the state, or to pay the debts of the state, would render the bank itself obnoxious to the tenth section of the first article of the constitution, which prohibits a state from emitting bills of credit, inasmuch as it would destroy the distinctive existence and independent credit of the bank, which independent credit is founded on the inviolability of the capital pledged for the payment of its debts.

Now, in this case, the assets of the Bank of the state of South Carolina which still remained in 1865, where the resultant of all its capital and operations. We hold, with the supreme court of the state, that they were not profits, nor the subject of any previous pledge of profits, to any specific class of debts. Any question, therefore, arising upon any such previous pledge may be laid out of the case. The only question is, whether the appropriation by the state legislature of these assets to the payment, first, of the fire-loan bonds, and, secondly, of the fire-loan stock, was valid and effectual.

As to the latter, we think the supreme court was clearly right. The fire-loan stock was clearly not a debt of the bank, but a debt of the state alone, and the appropriation of the assets of the bank to its payment was directly within the case of Curran v. The State of Arkansas.

As to the fire-loan bonds there is more room to doubt. These bonds were the debts of the state, and not of the bank, it is true, but their payment was guaranteed by the bank; and it is strenuously insisted that this circumstance rendered them so far obligations of the bank that the latter might be justified in providing for their payment in preference to their other creditors. Had the bank done this, the question as thus presented would have fairly arisen. But the bank, as a distinct entity, never did make such an appropriation of its assets. The appropriation which was made was an appropriation by law; and that law was made by the state itself—the principal debtor. The case was the same, in principle, as the Arkansas case. The legislature of South Carolina, by law, appropriated the assets of the bank to pay the debts of the state. This it could not do without violating the pledges made to the creditors of the bank, even though the particular debts thus preferred were guaranteed by the bank. The fire-loan bonds were not due by several years when this act of appropriation was attempted to be made. No claim had yet accrued thereon against the bank. So far as appears, there were not even any arrears of interest due. It did not then appear that the bank ever would be liable for the debt. It was the duty of the state to prevent such liability from ever arising. These special circumstances under which the law of 1865 was passed, bring it still more clearly within the decision of Curran v. State of Arkansas.

Digitized by Google

The decree of the Supreme Court of South Carolina must be affirmed.

STRONG, J.—I concur in the judgment given in this case, but not in all the positions taken in the opinion of the majority of the court. I cannot regard the eleventh section of the act of the general assembly of South Carolina, passed December 21, 1865, as amounting either to an assignment or a declaration of trust of the property of the bank in favor of the holders of the fire-loan bonds. In my opinion it effected no transfer, either legal or equitable, and vested no interest in the creditors. Hence, the repeal of the act by the legislature in 1868 was no disturbance of any vested rights, and it is not obnoxious to the objection that it impaired the obligation of any contract. For this reason, and for this reason alone, I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur in what is said by our brother STRONG.

MILLER, J.
DAVIS, J.
JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

Removal of Causes from State to Federal Court —Act to Enforce Fourteenth Amendment.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS v. THE CHICAGO AND ALTON RAILROAD COMPANY.

Circuit Court of the United States, for the Southern District of Illinois, June 18, 1874.

Present: Mr. Justice DAVIS; DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge, and TREAT, District Judge.

1. Removal of Causes—Construction of Enforcement Act.—The act of congress of April 20, 1871 (17 Stats. at Large 13, § 1), to enforce the 14th Amendment, relates to actions, suits and proceedings originally commenced in the district and circuit courts of the United States, and does not authorize the transfer of causes from the state to the federal courts, though brought under a state law which attempts to deprive persons of rights secured by the constitution of the United States.

2. ——. ——. The first section of the act of congress of April 20, 1871 (17 Stats. at Large 13), construed.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge.—The state commenced a prosecution in its own name against the railroad company, a corporation of this state, for a violation of the act of May 2, 1873, in the circuit court of Sangamon county. After the action was commenced the defendant, in vacation, filed a petition, verified by affidavit, with the clerk of this court, which alleged, in substance, that the railroad company claimed rights, privileges and immunities secured by the constitution of the United States, and that, under the color of the act of this state above mentioned, the company was subject to be deprived of the same, and asking for a writ of certiorari to the state court, where the action was pending. The clerk accordingly issued the writ of certiorari, requiring the state court to send to this court the record and proceedings in the cause. The question now made is whether the court has jurisdiction of the case. It is claimed to exist under the first section of the act of congress of April 20, 1871, which is as follows:

"Any person who, under color of any law, statute, regulation, custom or usage of any state, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any person within the jurisdiction of the United States, to the deprivation of any rights, privileges or immunities secured by the constitution of the United States, shall, any such law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom or usage to the contrary notwithstanding, be liable to the party injured, in any action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress; such proceeding to be prosecuted in the courts of the United States, with and subject to the same rights of appeal, review upon error, and other remedies provided in like cases in such courts, under the provisions of the act of the 9th of April, 1866, and the other remedial laws of the United States which are in their nature applicable in such cases."

It is insisted by the counsel of the railroad company that the language of this section includes all persons of every class within the jurisdiction of the United States; that it comprehends any rights, privileges or immunities secured by the constitution, and any one of the amendments, and that the corporation is a person representing and acting for all the members of which it is composed, and for the rights, privileges or immunities secured to them as such. Now, if it be admitted that this is the true construction of the act of April 20, 1871, and if it be conceded, further, that the state was prosecuting an action of debt for a penalty which could not be imposed without causing the company to be subjected to the deprivation of rights, privileges and immunities granted by the constitution, the question is whether the cause could be removed from the circuit court of Sangamon county so as to authorize this court to take jurisdiction.

The reason urged is that the act of the legislature under which the penalty is sought to be imposed impaired the obligation of the contract which the state made with the company by its charter. If this were so, has congress authorized the transfer of a case from the state to the federal courts in such a contingency? It must satisfactorily appear that this has been done.

There can be no doubt that congress can vest any jurisdiction authorized by the constitution, in the federal courts, either originally or by transfer from the state courts. But prior to the act of April 20, 1871, that clause of the constitution which prohibits a state from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts, when involved in a suit pending in a state court, and the decision of the court was in favor of the validity of the law, could only be construed by the federal courts by writ of error under the 25th section of the judiciary act. Has the act of April 20, 1871, changed this? If so, it must be by express words or by necessary implication. The first section of the act of 1871 declares that the person doing the injury under color of the state law shall be liable to an action at law, suit in equity or other proper proceeding for redress. It will be observed that then the words "action at law and suit in equity" are omitted, and the language is "such proceeding to be prosecuted in the several district and circuit courts of the United States."

There can be no doubt that the action at law and suit in equity referred to are original actions and suits to be commenced in the district or circuit courts, and it would seem not an unfair construction to hold that "other proper proceeding" should follow the principal words used, and should also be referred to any other original proceeding than such as might be properly termed an action at law or suit in equity; and when they were prosecuted in the district or circuit court they were to be subject to the same right of appeal, review upon error, and other remedies in like cases provided under the act of April 9, 1866, and other remedial laws in their nature applicable in such cases.

Digitized by Google

Now the argument is because in some of the statutes here referred to, provision is made under certain circumstances named in each case, for a transfer of the case from the state to the federal court, that this cause can be transferred. We are not prepared to admit the conclusion. On the contrary, we think if the first section of the act of 1871 was intended to authorize the transfer, more explicit language would have been used. Undoubtedly that section in the case named intended to confer on the circuit and district courts original jurisdiction, but full effect can be given to the section by applying the words used to original "actions at law suits in equity, or other proper proceeding;" and "like cases," may well mean cases originally brought in such courts, namely, the district and circuit courts of the United States. The case not is then within the rule already stated. See Gaughan v. Northwestern Fertilizing Co., 3 Bissell, 485. The transfer of this case to this court is not authorized by express words or by necessary implication. We think, therefore, this court has no jurisdiction of the case, that the writ should be quashed, and the suit remanded to the Sangamon Circuit Court.

REMOVAL NOT GRANTED.

Bankrupt Act—Insolvent Corporations—Receiver's Power to Sue—Liability of Stockholder.

GEORGE CHANDLER, RECEIVER, ETC., v. A. SIDDLE.

United States Circuit Court, District of Iowa, May Term, 1874.

Before Mr. Justice MILLER.

1. Bankrupt Act—Insolvent Corporations.—The bankrupt act does not furnish the sole remedy for winding up insolvent corporations or companies.

2. Power of a Receiver to Sue in the Courts of Another State considered.

3. Liability of Shareholders.—A call or assessment, or some equivalent action, held essential to the liability of the defendant on his contract to purchase shares of stock in an incorporated company.

Action at law. The plaintiff alleges that he is the receiver of the Lamar Insurance Company of Illinois, appointed by a court of chancery, in Chicago, in a suit in which two persons who are named were plaintiffs, and the said insurance company was defendant—the exact nature of which does not appear. It is alleged that the said company had before said suit in Illinois was brought, became insolvent and ceased to do business.

The petition herein also alleges that on August 15, 1873, the said court of chancery in said cause made an order as follows: "And the said receiver is hereby authorized and empowered to compromise with any one or more of the stockholders of the said corporation defendant, and to take and receive from him or them such sum of money or such percentage on the amount due from such stockholders as in the judgment of said receiver will be just and equitable, and a fair proportion for such stockholder to pay toward discharging the debts of the corporation. And upon such payment and settlement said receiver is hereby directed to give up and surrender to the party or parties so paying, the stock, bond, or obligation of said parties, and to release and discharge the same. And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that in case said receiver shall bring any suit to enforce the payment of any stock or other obligation due to the said corporation, he shall bring said suit for and enforce such claim for the full amount of the debt or demand due, and the said decree of this court entered on the 18th January, 1873; and the matters therein contained, so far as the same relate to the assessment of twenty per cent., the call of fifteen per cent., and the collection of such per cent. and call, be and the same is hereby, as to all future and further proceeding, vacated and declared to be of no force or effect, and said decree shall not operate as a bar to such recovery, nor shall said decree or the matters therein contained, defeat or bar any suit which said receiver may hereafter bring to enforce payment of any debt due to said corporation."

The present suit is brought by the receiver to collect 80 per cent., the balance alleged to be due from the defendant on a contract to purchase ten shares of stock in the said insurance company. The contract is in writing, and is in substance that the defendant promises to pay for said stock, $1,000 in this manner: five per cent. down, and three installments of five per cent., in three, six and nine months. "The balance being subject to the call of the directors as they may be instructed by majority of the stockholders represented at any regular meeting." It is this balance that the receiver now seeks to recover. The charter of the company is not set forth in the pleadings, nor the powers and authority of the receiver, otherwise than as appears above.

The defendants demurred to the petition, and, on assignment, the points below mentioned were ruled.

Parker & Twomly, for the receiver; James T. Lane, Gatch, Wright & Kennedy, for the defendant.

Mr. Justice MILLER orally delivered the opinion of the court, holding, in substance,

1. That proceedings in bankruptcy are not an exclusive method of winding up insolvent corporations or companies. The bankrupt act does not, ipso facto, suspend state laws for the collection of debts. The act of congress of February 13, 1873 (17 Stats. at Large, 436), is a complete answer to the position that the sole remedy against an insolvent insurance company is in the bankruptcy court.

2. It is perhaps true that, where duly appointed and authorized, a receiver may, ordinarily, sue in another state. This power, when it exists, arises from county, in the absence of special statute regulation, and it is, in general, subordinate to the right of local creditors as respects property within the jurisdiction where such a suit is brought. The effect of the bankrupt act on the general doctrine does not arise on the record before me. And in view of the uncertain nature of the proceedings in which the present plaintiff was appointed, I give no definite opinion concerning his powers in respect of suits brought in this district. See Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 322.

3. In this action at law, in which neither the corporation nor its stockholders other than the defendant are before the court, and in which the suit is on the contract of subscription for the entire 80 per cent. alleged to be due, I am of opinion, considering the terms of that contract, and that no call or assessment is alleged, either by the company before the insolvency or by the court since, that the petition does not state a cause of action. In other words, in this action at law on the contract, there must be a call or assessment, or something standing in the place thereof, and equivalent thereto, either by the company or by a proper court, in order to make the defendant liable. This does not appear either by the averments of the petition or on the exhibits thereto, and hence the demurrer must be sustained, but the plaintiff may amend, and, in doing so, I advise him to set forth the charter of the company and the nature of the chancery proceeding in Illinois.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

Correspondence — An American Lawyer in London — More About the English Judiciary and Practice.

LONDON, May, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I am pleased with the good-sense-like way in which the counsel here present their cases to the judges, and the no less good-sense-like way in which the judges deal with the cases at and after such presentation. Aside from this generally good-sense-like way, I have heard but one argument which struck me as notable. That one was made in the Exchequer, and was every way excellent, close, clear and strong, yet in no wise tedious. The question argued had reference to the form and subject of patents, and more immediately concerned patentable matter. Some difficulties in the case were suggested by the judges, all of which difficulties were promptly met and apparently overcome by the counsel. I like also very much the openness and sincerity between the judges and counsel. If the former interpose, as they often do in the course of the argument, it is never, so far as I have seen, to embarrass, but only the better to understand the case, and to notify the counsel when the point under discussion is, or is not, altogether clear, or is immaterial. One of the judges of the Queen's Bench in an argument made a few days ago, said to counsel: "I see no difficulty on that point; suppose you proceed on the next. And if, before you conclude, we deem the point you are now arguing material, and it is not clear to us, we will then call your attention to it again." Without hesitation and without remark, except, perhaps to thank his honor, counsel adopted the suggestion, and went on to argue the other parts of the case. In this way court and counsel soon come to understand each other, and both better to understand the case. It is not merely a saving of time. It is the practice of fair dealing. If counsel should conduct themselves in their office as such, with "all good fidelity to the court," as they most certainly ought, so also should the court deal openly and ingenuously with counsel. To deal otherwise is not honest. Then the practice here is for the judges to give their opinions immediately upon the conclusion of the arguments. The opinions are given orally, seriatim, beginning with the chief justice. I think there are great advantages in this practice—not the least of which, to a person of sensibility, is, there is a fragrance about the opinions which is not to be found in one written under the smoke of an offensive cigar, at some leisure hour, after the papers have all been laid away in some musty pigeon hole, in some badly ventilated room, six months or more, and when, as Lord Ellenborough once said of like papers, one cannot open them without endangering one's health. Not only is the determination more intelligent, when made on the spot, at the time, but more just. It not unfrequently happens, when the case is so delayed, and an opinion is afterward written by one judge for the court, in the absence of counsel and of the other judges, that important and, perhaps, decisive points taken at the argument are altogether overlooked or forgotten; whereas, when each judge gives his separate opinion in the presence of the others and of the counsel on either side, and when the matter is fresh in the recollection of all, no such mistake could be made.

Digitized by Google

To give your readers an idea of the amount of law business done here, let me state: In the Court of Queen's Bench there are five puisne judges—Sir Colin Blackburn, Sir John Mellor, Sir Robert Lush, Sir John Richard Quain, and Sir Thomas Dickson Archibald. There is also an associate, Hon. H. G. Campbell, who has his office in Chancery Lane. The chief justice has three clerks; each of the puisne justices two, and the associate one. Then there are masters whose office is in the Temple. The jurisdiction of this court is defined by act of Parliament, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. chap. 6.

The Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas is the Rt. Hon. Sir John Duke Coleridge. There also five puisne justices on this court—Hon. Sir Henry Singer Keating, Sir William Baliol Brett, Sir William Robert Grove, Hon. George Denman, and Sir George Honyman. Each justice has two clerks. There is also an associate juistice of this court, whose office is in Chancery Lane, and who has one clerk. Then there are five masters, with comfortable salaries, and chief clerks, judgment clerks, writ clerks, and record clerks. The salary of the chief justice is £7,000; each of the puisne justices has £5,000.

The Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer is the Rt. Hon. Sir Fitzroy Kelly. There are five puisne barons—Sir Samuel Martin, Sir George William Wilshere Bramwall, Sir Gillery Pigott, Sir Anthony Cleasby and Sir Charles E. Pollock, each of whom has two clerks. Then there is an associate justice—Hon. Henry Pollock, whose office is in Chancery Lane. There are also five masters, with salaries of £1,500 each; a taxing department, a judgment department, a rule department, a bail department, and a sealer of executions.

The Court of Appeals in Chancery consists of the lord chancellor and two judges styled "Lord Justices of the Court of Appeals in Chancery." Any judge of the superior courts of common law may also sit as assistant. One of the lords justices, sitting with the lord chancellor, may form a court. There is an appeal to this court from the orders of the chief judge in bankruptcy; and an appeal lies from this court to the House of Lords.

The judges of the "Crown Cases Reserved Court" are, the justices of the Queen's Bench, of the Common Pleas, and of the Exchequer. Of the Rolls Court, Hon. Lord Romilly is the master or keeper.* The court sits in the Rolls Yard, Chancery Lane. The Rt. Hon. Sir James Hannen is the judge of the Court of Probate and Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. The courts are separate, but the same judge sits in both. The judge of the High Court of Admiralty is Sir Robert Joseph Phillimore; salary £4,000. The Vice Chancellor's Court sits at Lincoln's Inn. Vice Chancellor, Sir Richard Malins, with associates Bacon, Hall and others. The chief justice of the London Bankruptcy Court is Sir James Bacon, with senior and other registers, comptroller, and taxing masters, official assignees and receivers in insolvent estates, and the like. There are also local bankruptcy and other minor courts and inns of courts, with deans and masters, vicar generals and treasurers, not to mention the city and metropolitan courts, the powers of all which are regulated by acts of Parliament, and between whom there never is, so far as I can learn, any conflict of authority. While there is much to be done through so many agencies and by so many persons, all seems to be done well. And, on the whole, I doubt if there is any place on this planet where the subject, by recourse to the laws, finds right and justice more promptly or completely than in England.

PELHAM.

* Unless we are mistaken, Sir George Jessel, the former solicitor general, is now master of the rolls. See ante p. 159.—EDS.

Book Notices.

THE COMMENTARIES OF GAIUS, AND RULES OF ULPIAN. Translated with notes, by J. T. ABDY and BRYAN WALKER. New edition. 12mo. pp. xxvii, 479. Cambridge (Eng.) 1874.

There is no better evidence of the growing interest of English lawyers in the Roman law than the eagerness with which the booksellers turn out treatises of all kinds upon the subject. Some of them are mere booksellers' work, made to sell, and very poorly made at that; others are of real merit. This book belongs to the latter class.

It contains the Latin text of the two treatises mentioned in the title, with a translation, rather close than elegant, on the lower half of the same pages. The notes cover some thirty-five pages of fine type at the end, and are evidently intended for careful students of the minutiæ of Roman law. We miss the free handling and the comparative notices of English law, which make Mr. Poste's edition of Gaius attractive to the professional student. But any one who wishes to study accurately the Roman law as presented in its most interesting and valuable remains, will find this edition convenient and useful.

It is a little singular that of three treatises which have been preserved to us in their original form, out of the "twenty camel-loads" that formed a Roman law library, two owe their preservation each to a single manuscript. The recovery of the original text of Gaius so late as the year 1816, from a Verona palimpsest, is a chapter of the romance of literature, as will readily be admitted by any one who has read the account of it in Goshen's interesting preface, which ought to be translated, or at least reprinted in the English editions, if only for the light it throws upon the many obscurities of the text. Of the MS. to which we owe the fragment of Ulpian a sufficient account is given in the present volume—preface, p. xxiv.

The prefaces also contain a succinct account of the contents and supposed purpose of both works, and there occurs a remarkable contradiction between the two prefaces that forms a striking exception to the general accuracy and care of the editorial work. In the preface to the first edition (p. ix) we are told that "What Gaius really had in view was not the publication of a systematic treatise upon private law, but the enunciation, in the shape of oral lectures, of matter that would be serviceable to those who were studying with a view to practice." Whether this is a true view to be taken of the Commentaries we cannot stop here to discuss, only remarking that no edition of Gaius' seems to us so thoroughly to have mastered the true intent and purpose of Gaius as Bocking, whose theory makes it a treatise even more systematic than the Institutes of Justinian, and whose analysis of its contents appears unanswerable. Some such view seems to have occurred to the present editors between the two editions; for in the preface to the second (p. xxvi) we find it said of Gaius: "His object was not so much to enter into details of practice as to present his readers with a comprehensive outline of the Roman law as a system. On the other hand, Ulpian's aim was, we venture to think, enterely different. He wished to draw up a hand-book for the use of practicing lawyers." That in this case "the sober second thought" (if the learned English editors will pardon us for applying to them such an American phrase) was altogether the best, we have already intimated as our opinion; and the retention of several pages of remarks founded upon the other view can only confuse the student. If

Digitized by Google

Bocking is even probably right, the space might be much better occupied with his excellent statement of the plan on which Gaius wrote, especially as this has an independent value in its bearing on the much-discussed division of Persons, Things, and Actions. W. G. H.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES. By THEODORE SEDGWICK. Sixth edition, edited by HENRY D. SEDGWICK. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co.

The first edition of this well-established treatise appeared in 1874. The only work on the Law of Damages then in existence was that of Sayer, a London lawyer, which was published in 1770, and of which a second edition appeared recently (1872), after the lapse of more than a century. The treatise of Mr. Sedgwick was so philosophical, as well as so practical, that its merits were at once recognized in this country, and shortly afterwards in Great Britain. By its preparation the author rendered a substantial service to the law, and, more than any other writer, has insisted upon the necessity of having, as far as practicable, known, fixed and certain rules to measure the extent of the recovery of damages in civil actions. When he first wrote, the amount of damages in many cases where the measure is now fixed by rule or principle, was left to the arbitrary and uncertain discretion of the jury. Whoever has read the treatise under consideration knows how often and how earnestly the author has inveighed against this and insisted upon certainty and precision in the principles which govern the amount of pecuniary compensation in courts of justice.

Mr. Sedgwick combined, almost as successfully as any legal author we know of, the faculty of condensed philoshphic discussion, with that of presenting enough of the details of adjudged cases to illustrate his views and to exhibit the actual state of the law upon the topic under his consideration. The result is that his work on damages at once took, and to this day has kept the field. It has no American rival, and the only specific English treatise, except that of Sayer above mentioned, is Mr. Mayne's Law of Damages, which appeared in 1856, and which presents the subject almost exclusively from an English standpoint, and for the benefit of English practitioners. Mr. Mayne avows that he has "only resorted to American decisions where none of our own were in point." Not so with Mr. Sedgwick. The field of adjudication in Great Britain has been as carefully explored as the same field in this country; and in this edition, which is the most complete and in every way the best of any that has yet appeared, it is not too much to declare that the combined industry of the author and the successive editors has gathered together, so far as it is practical to do so, whatever is worth the attention of the profession concerning the law of damages. It would be easy to point out here and there some developments of single points connected with the subject which have not been as satisfactorily presented as the state of the decisions would permit, but this would be to us an ungracious task, for our deliberate judgment is, and long has been, that this is one of the very best law books ever published, and it gives us sincere pleasure to record our sense of its merits and usefulness, and to welcome the appearance of this full and enlarged edition.

FAMOUS CASES OF CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE. Second edition. Revised and enlarged. New York: James Cockcroft & Co. 1874.

The title of the book correctly indicates its character. The cases have been selected so as to give variety and interest to the work, and its popularity has been such as already to call for a second edition. To us, one of the principal attractions of the work, and a leading element of value in it, is the introduction of about 40 pages on the Theory of Presumptive Proof, by S. M. Phillipps, author of "Phillipps on Evidence." Others, however, will prize the work for the remarkable cases which it contains, and these have a value, at least an admonitory value, which the conscientious judge and lawyer cannot overlook.

Summary of Our Exchanges.

Sale of Stock for Unpaid Assessments.—The Daily Register for July 1, publishes a long opinion of VAN VORST, J., in the case of Ann Eliza Mitchell, executrix, etc., of Samuel L. Mitchell, deceased, against the Vermont Copper Mining Company, Smith Ely, and Joseph J. Bickwell, which relates to the validity of a sale of stock by the directors, of a corporation, for unpaid assessments.

Criminal Procedure—Exceptions.—New York Supreme Court, General Term? Slatterly v. People, Daily Register for July 1 contains the ruling under the New York practice. In cases punishable by death, or imprisonment for life as a minimum punishment, an exception is not required in order to present a legal proposition for review upon writ of error after conviction, but where the maximum term of imprisonment is less than during life, an exception is required to be made.

Alimony Pendente Lite—Dispute as to Marriage.—In Humphreys v. Humphreys, New York Supreme Court, Special Term, Daily Register, June 29, the plaintiff, who had brought an action for a limited divorce on the ground of desertion and abandonment, applied for alimony pending the suit; but the court, VAN VORST, J., refused to grant it on the ground that there was no proof of marriage. Subsequently to the cohabitation with the plaintiff the defendant had been lawfully and publicly married to another woman, and the court held that there could be no presumption in support of the validity of a prior secret marriage, when it would operate to make the subsequent open and formal marriage a crime.

Official Character of the Person before whom Title Papers are Acknowledged.—In the New York Marine Court, Part 1, before Judge MCADAM, Daily Register, June 29, the point was ruled that where an officer signs his name, with the title of his office, that is prima facia evidence that he holds such office; and, where he signs his name alone, evidence aliunde may be given to prove the fact that he was an officer authorized to do the act he assumed to perform.

Right to File Supplementary Petition.—Soher v. Fargo, New York Supreme Court, General Term, Daily Register for June 26, rules the point of practice that the right to serve a supplemental complaint is not absolute, but rests in the sound discretion of the court. See Beach v. Reynolds, 53 N. Y. 1.

Mechanic's Lien Notice.—The Pittsburgh Legal Journal for July 1 publishes a nisi prius decision—The First National Bank, etc. v. Childs, holding that mechanics, miners, laborers and others claiming under the act of April 9, 1872, must give notice in writing to the officer executing the process before the actual sale of the property; in default of this notice, no lien. Construction of said act and its requirements.

The Washington Law Reporter for June 30 publishes the recent act of congress relating to the government of the District of Columbia; also the case of United States v. Barney Wood, Supreme Court, District of Columbia, relating questions of local jurisdiction, and also to the doctrine of new trials in criminal cases.

Northern Pacific Railroad Company—Change of Line—Rights of Settlers.—The Washington Law Reporter for June 30 also publishes a decision of the Secretary of the Interior in Engerbretson v. Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

The Daily Register of July 3d and 5th contains an able and exhaustive discussion of the Law of Bailments by Chief Justice DAILY, of the New York Common Pleas, in the case of The First National Bank v. Ocean National Bank, in which he holds that a bailment in which the trust is for the benefit of both parties is not such an one as, in the event of loss (unless occasioned by gross negligence, or wilful neglect equivalent in its nature to a breech of faith, or in practice equal to a fraud), will exempt the bailor from liability to make the same good. We shall endeavor to notice this case more at length hereafter.

The Albany Law Journal for June 27, contains an editorial article on Good Faith in Guardians and Trustees of Infants; also an elaborate article by John Proffatt, Esq., on The Liability of a Master for the Wrongful Acts of his Servant, in which he examines many cases, and concludes as follows: "In closing this subject we cannot help observing the adaptability of the common law to meet the varying relations and exigencies of social life; and, perhaps, in its whole domain, no subject better illustrates its exhaustiveness and adaptability than the law of master and servant, which gradually expanding from the fixing of the liability of one for the acts of those in his own immediate charge and control, has authoritatively and precisely fixed on one who works by an agent at any distance, in any concern or through any number of transactions, and which, while holding employees to a strict accountability, reasonable and adequate to protect the public, has not so stringently fixed a liability as to dissuade them from acting by agents." The Journal also publishes an interesting article on the Criteria of Negligence, by John F. Baker, Esq., and also reports the important case of Hime v. The Levee Commissioners, delivered recently in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon the jurisdiction in equity to enforce payment of corporate bonds.

The Legal Gazette for June 26, published Chaffee v. United States, Supreme Court of the United States, which was a prosecution under the internal revenue laws. The facts of the case are set out at great length, but only the points ruled by the court are given, instead of the full opinion. In The Diligent Fire Insurance Company v. Lehman, published in the same number, the Supreme Court of Pennsyvania, hold that a contributing member of an engine company has not such a legal status as entitles him to invoke the action of the court to reinstate him as a member. In Northampton County v. Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad Company, published in the same number, the same court hold that the words "real estate" in a statute exempting all real property from taxation, do not include the track, etc., of a railroad company. In Watt's appeal, which the same journal publishes, the same court holds that the assets within the jurisdiction of the forum of the testator's domicil in another state, cannot be marshalled with the assetts of the estate in Pennsylvania—affirming Freeman's Appeal, 1 Leg. Gazette, 322.

Digitized by Google

Notes of Cases.

Foreign Corporation—Where it may be Sued.—In Lathrop v. Union Pacific Railroad Company, Supreme Court, District of Columbia, General Term, September, 1873, it is ruled on the authority of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Peters, 519; Marshall v. B. and O. R. R. Co., 16 How. 328; Lafayette Insurance Co. v. French, 18 How. 404, and Ohio & Miss. R. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black. 297, that a corporation can have no legal existence out of the boundaries of the sovereignty by which it was created, and can only be sued in a different state by express legislation authorizing such suits against foreign corporations having agents within the state, conducting the business for which it was organized; and that for the purpose of litigation, a corporation is to be considered an inhabitant of the state under whose laws it exists. In this case it appeared the act of congress incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company, extended the privilege of certain land grants and other subsidies to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, Eastern Division, upon the same conditions as are imposed on said first named company, and said act also provided that said first named company can sue and be sued in all courts of law and equity within the United States; held that although the Union Pacific Railroad Company, Eastern Division, accepted the aid of the statute, its capacity for suing and being sued was not thereby enlarged, and being a corporation of the state of Kansas, could not be sued in this jurisdiction.

Keeper of Attached Property—Right of Compensation.—Connors v. Parker, Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, was an action of contract for services as keeper over certain goods which the defendant, as deputy sheriff, had attached. At the trial it appeared that the defendant signed and gave to one Savage a paper in substance as follows: "Middlesex, Malden, May 20, 1871. To W. H. Savage or bearer—I hereby appoint and constitute you keeper of all the goods, etc., situate, etc., and you are authorized and required to safely keep the same in custody until otherwise ordered by me. Luther L. Parker, deputy sheriff." Savage, with the consent of defendant, delivered this paper to one Bartlett, who was already employed in the factory where the goods were situated. The defendant agreed with Bartlett that he should retain the custody of the goods without compensation. Bartlett, however, without the knowledge of the defendant, gave the paper to the plaintiff Connors, without notifying him of the agreement not to charge for custody. The defendant offered to show the agreement between himself and Bartlett, but the presiding judge excluded the evidence, and ruled that if Bartlett held the property by authority of the defendant under this agreement, and gave the agreement and custody to the plaintiff, without notice of his agreement in respect of compensation, with the plaintiff, and the defendant thereafter kept the property, then he was entitled to a reasonable compensation for his services as such keeper. The case was argued at the March sitting. Rescript by DEVENS, J. Exceptions sustained. "The authority given by Parker to the keeper of the property attached was not indefinitely transferrable by whoever might hold the same, by delivery so as to give the party receiving it a right to charge the defendant with services rendered to him. Even if Bartlett could have transferred it so as to give such right, he could transfer no more than the benefit of his contract. The evidence, therefore, of what was to be paid to Bartlett by Parker was admissible."

The error at the trial seems to have been in giving undue weight to the addition—"or bearer."

Will—Foreign Probate—Objection, When Taken.—In Robert S. Bartlett, executor's, etc., et al. v. Henry Rogers, executors, etc., et al., recently decided by the U. S. Circuit Court for California, SAWYER, Circuit Judge, has re-affirmed the proposition that the probate of a will and the issue of letters testamentary in one state, do not authorize the executors so appointed to maintain an action as such in another state. Doolittle v. Lewis, 7 John. Ch. 46; Morrill v. Dickey, 1 John. Ch. 156; Williams v. Storrs, 6 John. Ch. 352; Brown v. Brown, 1 Barb. 195; Vroom v. Van Horne, 10 Paige, 536; Mellus v. Thompson, 1 Clif. 127; Caldwell v. Harding, 5 Blatch. 501; Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheaton, 566; Armstrong v. Lear, 12 Wheat. 169; Vaughan v. Northrup, 15 Pet. 1.

And in the same case he also held that the objection may be taken at the hearing, when it does not appear on the face of the complaint where letters are issued, and issue has been joined on the allegation of the complaint that letters testamentary have been duly issued to the plaintiffs.

Fraudulent Conveyance—Bill in Equity to Compel Reconveyance.—Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. Hassam v. Barrett. Bill in equity against the heirs at law of George Barrett, deceased, to compel the reconveyance of a certain parcel of real estate conveyed by the plaintiff to said George Barrett by a deed absolute in form, but which, it is alleged, was intended only as a mortgage, the plaintiff offering to pay such sum as shall be found to be due.

MORTON, J., reported the case.

At the hearing the following facts appeared: On January 8, 1856, the plaintiff was the owner of the premises described in his bill, subject to a mortgage for $1500. He had a partner in business who, for his private speculations, issued the notes of the firm to a large amount, rendering the firm and the partners insolvent. George Barrett was a creditor of Hassam, individually, to the amount of $2250. For the purpose of securing Barrett and of preventing the creditors of the firm from reaching this property by attachment or proceedings in insolvency, Hassam made a deed, absolute in form, of the premises, to Barrett, and caused it to be recorded without Barrett's knowledge. Afterwards, within a month, he informed Barrett of the fact, and the following oral agreement was then made: Barrett was to pay the $1500 mortgage, and to hold the property as security for the amount paid and his debt of $2250, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum. Hassam was to pay Barrett $315 a year in the form of rent for the premises. As this amount exceeded the interest agreed on, it was agreed that upon a settlement the excess should be allowed to Hassam, with interest at the same rate of seven per cent.; and upon such settlement and the payment to Barrett of the amount found to be due, he was to convey the estate to Hassam.

Hassam occupied the estate under this arrangement, paying taxes and repairs, and paying the yearly sum of $315 in the form of rent, until the death of Barrett. In July, 1866, the parties accounted together orally, and it was found that, allowing for the excess of yearly payments over interest, and some other payments made by Hassam, there was then due Barrett $3000. Barrett soon after became insane, and remained insane until his death in 1869.

It also appears that Hassam has, since this deed was given, settled with his creditors.

The court had previously decided in this case, on demurrer, that it was open to the plaintiff to show, if he could, that this deed, absolute in form, was, nevertheless intended by the parties to be a mortgage. Upon the strength of this determination, the plaintiff now claimed that, upon these facts, he had a right to redeem. The defendant contended, first, these facts disclosed an agreement made after the deed was executed and put on record, touching the way the parties were to treat a conveyance already then made, and nor any verbal agreement under which the deed was in fact made; second, it is well settled that where the plaintiff cannot make out his case without showing an illegal act on his own part, he cannot maintain his action; and since the plaintiff's case proceeds upon the ground that the transaction in respect of which he complains was something else than it appears on its face to be, and he is constrained to show what that something else is—in showing which his own fraud necessarily appears—he cannot succeed; and his having settled with his creditors afterwards does not change the quality of his act. The court has now ordered bill dismissed with costs.

Rescript by WELLS, J.—One who conveys property to defraud his creditors has no standing in a court of equity to require its reconveyance after having accomplished his fraudulent purpose.

Rights of Escaped Convicts.—An interesting question relating to the rights of escaped convicts has recently been before the Supreme Court of New York, in General Term, in the case of The People v. Sharkey, who, it will be remembered, escaped from the Tombs while under sentence of death for murder, and has not been recaptured. Writs of error and of certiorari had been issued by the Supreme Court to the Court of General Session, in which Sharkey had been tried; and a motion being now made to dismiss these writs, DAVIS, presiding justice, said:

"The affidavit in this case shows that after judgment, and prior to the escape from jail of Sharkey, a writ of error with stay of proceedings was duly allowed by one of the justices of this court, and that subsequent to the escape a writ of certiorari was allowed to bring up mattters dehors the record. In the case of the application of Henry W. Genet for a mandamus, this court has come to the conclusion that the convict who thus escapes and remains a fugitive cannot require at the hands of the court or judges any proceeding in his favor, or insist upon any steps adverse to the prosecution; but that his rights to act adversely to the People are waived and suspended by his own criminal conduct. The effect of this rule is to leave the case in statu quo, so far as action of the convict is concerned. The court would not, therefore take any action on his motion or behalf. But it does not follow that the court may, on motion of The People, deprive him of the benefit of proceedings already taken before his escape. We think, therefore, that the writ of error should not be quashed. The certiorari might properly have been denied; but as it is ancilliary to the writ, and as the court below will not be compelled to make return to either writ until Sharkey shall be again in custody, within the jurisdiction of the court, we think the better course is to deny the motion in both its aspects.

Digitized by Google

"Motion denied."

Bankruptcy—Fraudulent Preference.—In the United States Circuit Court, Western District of Pennsylvania, Circuit Judge McKENNAN has recently rendered an interesting decision, in the case of Zahm, assignee v. Fry, (31 Legal Intelligencer, 25) in which the following points are ruled:

1. Confession of judgment, and execution under it, where it must necessarily stop the debtor's business, is a void transfer and preference within the meaning of the bankrupt act, as of the date of the entry of judgment.

2. The court can decree a restoration to the assignee of the fund realized, although it may be in the custody of a state officer.

3. Without actual fraud a creditor so preferred, will be allowed, upon surrender, to participate in the bankrupt's assets.

Life Insurance—Insurable Interest—Father and Son.—In Kane v. The Reserve Mutual Life Insurance Company, (31 Legal Intelligencer, 196) the District Court of Pennsylvania, (BRIGGS, J.) rules that the relation of father and son is sufficient to establish an insurable interest in the life of the father. Compare Loomis v. Eagle Life and Health Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 399; Forbes v. American Mutual Life Ins. Co., 15 Gray, 254.

Liability of Husband for Necessaries Furnished Wife—Feme Sole Trader.—The same court (MITCHELL, J.) holds, in Markley v. Wartman (31 Legal Intelligencer, 196), that the husband is liable for necessaries furnished to the wife for the support of herself and family, although she has been declared a feme sole trader. The question, of course, rests on a Pennsylvania statute, but it is interesting from the fact that there are similar statutes in many other states (see ante, p. 137–9). No authorities are cited for this ruling. The learned Judge says; "The precise point involved in this case does not appear to have been decided by the supreme court, but it is necessarily involved in the decision of the converse proposition, that the wife is not primarily liable, made by this court in Sheetz v. Cleaver, 8 Phila. 3, affirmed by supreme court in 20 Smith, 496."

Promise to Pay in Event of Future Contingency.—The case of Tyng v. The United States Submarine and Torpedo Boat Co., New York Supreme Court, General Term (5 Daily Register, No. 148), furnishes a brief discussion of the effect of a promise to pay merely on the happening of a future contingency. The defendant company, it seems, agreed to purchase certain patents and pay for them "as soon as any money was received into the treasury." The court (DANIELS, J.) say: "Before the plaintiff could recover on such a promise he should show that the contingency on which it depended had arisen, for in no other way could he put the defendant in default. In Scouton v. Eislord, 7 John. 36, the detendant promised to pay a debt, from which he had been discharged under the insolvent laws, provided he could do it without distressing his family; and the court held that no recovery could be had without proof of his ability to pay without distressing his family. It was also held, in Cartledge v. West, 2 Denio, 377, that a promise by an assignee to pay when he should receive funds from the assigned property would not sustain a recovery without proof of the receipt of such funds; and in Johnson v. Plowman, 49 Barb. 472, the same principle was acted upon. There the defendant purchased goods under an agreement that she was to make payments from time to time as she could, out of her business and from the proceeds of the sales of the goods; and she was only held liable becouse she was shown .o have received from those sources money enough to pay the plaintiff's demand. These authorities are sufficient to warrant the conclusion that a promise by the defendant to pay as soon as any money was received into its treasury, could not be made the ground for a recovery when the proof was that no money had ever been received in the company's treasury."

Criminal Law—Prisoner Turning State's Evidence—What Agreements not to Prosecute are Binding.—In The People v. Indian Peter, 7 Pacific Law Reporter, 197, Supreme Court of California, June 8, 1874, the court passed upon the interesting question, what agreements between officers of the state and a prisoner who becomes the state's witness and thereby criminates himself, not to prosecute the prisoner, are binding and obligatory upon the court:

The defendant was indicted for the crime of murder, and being put upon his trial, moved the court to direct his discharge, and in support of the motion, read to the court the following stipulation of facts, signed by the district attorney: "Defendant was arrested on said charge (the charge upon which the indictment proceeds) and taken before a committing magistrate, without counsel or knowlege of his rights. He was by said magistrate, informed and made to believe that if he would become a witness for the People against two persons charged with the same offense, to-wit: The People v. John Benoist, and The People v. Frank Page, the defendant would thereby be acquitted of any crime therein and that not a hair of his head should be harmed. The district attorney, with knowledge of that fact, used defendant as witness for the People in said two cases. That in said cases the defendant fully testified for the People, at the request of the district attorney, and in said testimony implicated himself. That he thereby destroyed the value of his testimony, and effectually shut out any defence he might have had to such charge."

This motion was refused, and the prisoner was convicted of murder in the second degree. He then moved in arrest of judgment on these grounds, and this motion having been overruled, he appealed. The supreme court hold that this not being one of the grounds of arresting a judgment enumerated in the penal code, the motion was for that reason properly denied. But they also say:

"Nor was there any error in denying the motion of the prisoner, made during the progress of the trial, that he be discharged from further prosecution The understanding had between the committing magistrate and the prisoner, and the acquiescence of the district attorney therein, furnish in themselves no reason, in point of mere law, for the dismissal of proceeding against the prisoner. Those officers had no authority to promise the accused a pardon or, what is the same thing, immunity from punishment, if he would testify against the others. The English practice of admitting accomplices to give evidence against their associates, under an implied promise of pardon, on condition of their disclosing the whole truth, had reference to persons already under indictment, as well as in costody. It was done only upon motion of the prosecutor made to the court, and in the exercise of a high judicial discretion.

"But with us the proceeding is regulated by statute, which provides that when two or more persons are included in the same indictment, the court may, at any time before the defendants have gone into their defenee, on the application of the district attorney, direct any defendant to be discharged from the indictment, that he may be a witness for the People, and that the order of discharge shall be a bar to another prosecution for the same offence. Penal Code, sec. 1,099; id. 1,101. So upon its own motion, or upon the application of the district attorney, the court may in furtherance of justice, order an action or indictment to be dismissed—the reasons of such dismissal being entered of record (id., 1,385); and such order is a bar to another prosecution for the same offence, if it be a misdemeanor, but not a bar, if it be a felony. Id 1,387.

"The statute having thus designated the cases in which, and the proceedings by which, an indictment may be dismissed and a discharge awarded the accused without actual trial, must be taken to exclude all other cases, or cases not provided for by its terms.

"It results that the judgment must be affirmed, and is so ordered."

Mr. Chief Justice WALLACE, delivered the opinion—RHODES, NILES, CROCKETT and MCKINSTRY, JJ., concurring.

This is evidently a hard case. The defendant appears to have been an ignorant Indian, and was no doubt shamefully imposed upon.

Usurpation of Office.—In most of the states there are, no doubt, statutes punishing criminally the usurpation of, or wrongful continuing in, a public office. Obviously the most important question which can arise under such statute is, what degree of bad faith or guilty knowledge is necessary to bring the wrongful holder of the office under the penalty of the statute? It is manifest that a person holding an office in good faith, under a mistaken belief of his right to hold it, ought not to be punished criminally for so doing. It is accordingly ruled in Kreidler v. State, 24 Ohio State, 22, Supreme Court of Ohio, December Term, 1863, that an officer legally appointed and qualified, continuing to act as such officer after the expiration of his term, in good faith, reasonably believing it to be his duty to discharge the duties of the office until his successor is qualified, is not to be regarded as criminally usurping the office, within the meaning of section 13 of the act of March 8, 1831, "for the punishment of certain offences therein named." The Ohio statute under which this ruling was made simply enacts: "That if any person shall take upon himself to exercise or officiate in any office or place of authority, in this state, without being legally authorized," the person so offending shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined or imprisoned as therein stated. In expounding this statute the court (DAY, Ch. J.) says: "To constitute the offence, a person must do something more than merely discharge the duties of an office without legal authority. He must 'take upon himself' official functions in such sense as implies an assumption of the office without color of right. Therefore, to 'take upon himself' the exercise of an office without being legally authorized, within the meaning of the section, is such an assumption of official authority as imports a willful usurpation of an office. This is what was intended to be punished, and nothing short of it comes within the strict sense of the statute. Otherwise, an officer, de facto, acting in good faith, under color of right, not designing to 'take upon himself' an office without legal right, unconciously commits a crime in doing what the law would recognize as a valid act. Nor does it follow that an officer who may be ousted from an office by proceedings in quo warranto is guilty of the criminal offence of usurping the office. It was held in Ohio v. Alling, 12 Ohio, 16, that two common pleas judges who continued to officiate after their office was terminated by legislative enactment, which admitted of a reasonable doubt whether that was its legal effect, were de facto judges, and could not be regarded as 'usurpers and intruders,' and their acts were held to be valid. It is clear, therefore, that they could not have been regarded as guilty of the crime of usurpation of office."

Digitized by Google

Liability of Attorney for Stenographer's Bill.— In Bonyng v. Hatch, at nisi prius in the New York Supreme Court, which was an action against an attorney, by a stenographer for the value of his services rendered in a certain case, Judge VAN VORST charged the jury that unless the attorney, when he employed the stenographer, gave the latter notice that he, the attorney, was acting for others, to whom the stenographer must look for his pay, the attorney would be personally liable for the same. The learned judge says:

"Ordinarily, the stenographer looks to the person who employes him for payment; and it would be very hard upon him to turn him over to the parties; because, very often, the parties themselves are irresponsible, and the stenographer rarely ever sees them. When he is employed to render service, he is commonly employed by the attorney, and unless the attorney discloses to him, or states to him: 'If you render these services, you are to render them to the client and not to me,' he is the party to whom the stenographer may look for payment. Unless he says something to the stenographer to induce the belief that he is not to look to the attorney for his pay, but must look to the party; then, I say, the stenographer can recover against the attorney himself, as the person who employs him. A person who employs another to render service is the person who must pay, except he discloses at the time that he is an agent or acting for somebody else, and that the principal is the one who must pay and not himself. I believe that to be the law upon this subject and so I charge you. You are to find, therefore, whether the defendant employed the plaintiff in the way in which the plaintiff has testified he was employed, and did not disclose the fact that he was acting for somebody else, or was the authorized agent for some other person, who was to be charged with the expense.

Legal News and Notes.

—IT is said that our government had made a demand, more peremptory and decided than that of Great Britain, for indemnity on account of our citizens who were murdered at Santiago de Cuba.

—HON. JAMES H. HARDY, formerly district attorney of Sacramento county, California, and judge of the 16th judicial district of that state, died at his residence in San Francisco on the 11th of June.

—THE Scotch Court of Session has just arrived at a rather important decision in reference to the marriage laws. An English court submitted the question whether a marriage entered into in Scotland by a man who had obtained a decree of divorce from his former wife, but before the period of this decree had expired, is valid according to the law of Scotland. The court of session has answered that it is.

—THE examination of the senior class of the Union College of Law, preparatory to conferring the collegiate degree of bachelor of laws, occured at the lecture room of the college, No. 77 Clark street, Chicago, on Friday the 26th and Saturday the 27th ultimo. It was conducted by the presidents of the University of Chicago, and the Northwestern University; by Judge Booth, the Dean, Hon. Lyman Trumbull, Hon. James R. Doolittle, Hon. J. B. Bradwell, and Profs. V. B. Denslow and Philip Myers.

—TWO of the New York city police commissioners, Oliver Charlick and Hugh Gardner, have been convicted of a misdemeanor in violating the election law of 1872, and sentenced to pay a fine of $250 each. The charge against them was the removal of inspectors of election who had been regularly appointed and sworn into office, without a notice setting forth clearly and distinctly the reasons for such removal, as required by law. It seems that Mayor Havemeyer resorted to the trick of accepting their resignations and re-appointing them in each other's places, but Governor Dix has disregarded this and declared their offices vacant.

—ON the 30th of last month, James P. Sanders, Esq., a prominent lawyer of Yonkers, West Chester county, New York, was, while discharging his duties in the county court in a courteous and unoffending manner, shot twice and, it is supposed, mortally wounded by one August Lechaum, a Frenchman, who was the principal litigant in the opposite side of the case which Mr. Saunders was prosecuting. Mr. Saunders was an old lawyer, and universally respected in the community where he lived. Unless the public press has grossly belied this assassination, it was, should death result, murder in the first degree, cowardly and wicked, and without a shadow of mitigation. We shall see what a New York jury will do in this case. Unless this vile murderer is speedily and publicly punished with the full measure of the law, the administration of public justice will become still more a mockery and a reproach, and the system of trial by jury will deserve the execration and contempt of all good men.

—AT the graduating exercises of the Iowa State University Law School, the somewhat novel feature was presented of addresses and debates by the graduating students. The following was the programme:

The Civil Law—Joseph C. Helm, Arkansas.

Liberty and Law—Alanson Clark, Newton.

Law, Its Divine and Human Element—Michael Austen, Belchertown, Massachusetts.

American Jurisprudence—James K. P. McCallum, Eldorado, Kansas.

Tendencies of Class Legislation—Ellison G. Smith, Hopkinton.

The Rights of Persons—David A. Myers, Ohio.

Debate on the following question:

Is there Danger in an Elective Judiciary?—Affirmative, Cyrus Beard, Washington county; negative, Abraham E. Swisher, Johnson county.

The Feudal System, with the Valedictory Addresses—Jesse McD. Freels, Carrollton, Illinois.

—THE Daily Register, continuing its discussion of the question of Legal Education, throws out the following valuable suggestion: "We want legal societies (or clubs analagous to the "Inns of Court" of London) where our students of law, of both classes, shall have ample opportunity to practice forensic eloquence and the management of actions at law. Our bar association is not intentended to promote this object, although it could, by its large influence, insure success to a project or projects of this nature. The law institute could open the door to its vast collection of law books to such societies, and feed their members to satiety upon the pure milk of the law undefiled. In connection with each society, or club, a moot court should be organized, and some capable jurist be employed to preside over its deliberations, whose learning should be extensive, and whose dignity should give character and order to it meetings. We commend this subject to the careful consideration of our younger members of the profession, and to students of the law."

—THE Daily Register says: "A few days since it was announced that Mr. Austin Abbott, having completed the sixth and last volume of his new Digest of New York Statutes and Reports, had now returned to practice his profession at the bar. While we congratulate the bar of again more frequently meeting this genial gentleman, we consider it a great public loss to have his labors withdrawn from the field of authorship in the various departments of the law, which has become richer and better understood by his labors, and also with those of his brother, Benjamin Vaughn Abbott. The first edition of Abbott's New York Digest was the joint work of these two brothers, but the new edition, just completed, and entirely rewritten, is the work of Austin Abbott alone, the first volume of which appeared in February, 1873. The rapidity of his labors are no more astonishing than the industry and accuracy which characterize them." It has always been a marvel, to those who are familiar with legal book-making, how the Abbott brothers contrive to grind out digests, and these of the better sort, with the rapidity with which they do. If their books were mere scissorings from the reporters' head-notes, we could understand it, but they are something more than this. No digests which have been published have surpassed theirs in practical usefulness, and very few have equalled them. Perhaps the highest compliment that can be paid to their books is that they serve as models, in many important particulars, for most of the digests compiled by other hands that have followed them. If the Messrs. Abbott would advertise for sale the secret which enables them to produce such good books with such astonishing rapidity, no doubt many a weary bookmaker would bid high for it.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JULY 16, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

We have received through the courtesy of Mr. Justice BRADLEY his able opinion in what is known as the Grant Parish case, in which he expounds the act of 1870, to enforce the right of citizens to vote. The question passed upon is of great importance to the people of the South. We shall either publish it or advert to it fully hereafter.

MURDER—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—UDDERZOOK'S CASE—Some months ago (ante, p. 50), we published the main facts of this remarkable case. We now publish the opinion of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, affirming the judgment of the Oyer and Terminer of Chester county, and directing the sentence of death to be carried into execution. We could have wished to accompany the report with a full summary of the evidence, but it has not been practicable for us to do so. The chief point ruled will, however, be sufficiently understood without a statement of the facts in proof. It is, that a photograph likeness is admissible in evidence on the trial of an indictment for murder, for the purpose of identifying the person from whose features it is proved to have been taken, without further proof (as in case of paintings) of its being a correct likeness. The court, in the case of photographs, supply this necessary proof by taking judicial notice of the fact that photography is a means of producing correct likenesses. This conclusion accords with common knowledge and common sense; but a narrow and technical court could not have brought themselves up to it.

RETROACTIVE SCOPE OF LATE AMENDMENT TO THE BANKRUPT ACT—IMPORTANT DECISION.—The United States Circuit Judge for the Eighth Circuit on a petition for review brought under section 2 of the Bankrupt Act, in the cases of E. G. Obear and James S. Thomas, has recently made an important decision touching the scope and effect of the retrospective clauses of the recent amendment to the Bankrupt Act. The opinion will be given to our readers in full, but we mention at this time that the judge holds that while the amendatory act is retroactive in its operations, so as to bring within it all cases commenced since December 1, 1873, and in which, at the time of the taking effect of the amendment, June 22, 1874, the petitions for adjudication remained undetermined, yet it does not annul or disturb adjudications of bankruptcy actually made and in force at the time of the taking effect of the amendment. The case differed from that of Scammon (CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, ante, p. 328), decided by Judge BLODGETT, as in this last case there had been no adjudication of bankruptcy when the amendatory act went into force.

Admissions to the Bar.

We ask attention to an exceedingly well written and sensible letter from a rising young lawyer of Alabama, which we print in another column. His suggestion of a lawyer's state convention to devise means of remedying the evils complained of, is an admirable one. This is substantially what has been accomplished in Iowa under the name of a State Bar Association. We quite agree with "JUVENIS" that "the young and active members of the bar must take the initiatory steps" in this movement. They are the real sufferers and are the ones most interested. The old members of the profession, whose fame is established, and who have at their backs an army of wealthy clients, are not directly affected by a general deterioration of the bar. But the young lawyer, however excellent his attainments and brilliant his prospects may be, must bear for a time the humiliation and shame of being classed by the public with the multitude of ignorant, incompetent and unworthy persons who are crowding into the ranks of the profession. Obviously the assistance of the older members of the bar should not be despised, but should be courted; but nothing should deter the young men from taking hold. They have more leisure, more energy, and a far greater interest at stake. Besides, the young men of to-day are the middle-aged men twenty years hence; and forty years hence, they are the veterans of the bar. The history of the Crown Law League is a striking example of the fact that there is nothing in the way of a needed and reasonable reform which a few determined and capable men combined together, cannot, by perseverance, accomplish. The motto of certain revolutionists may well be applied to every combination which is made to uproot old abuses:

"The patient dirt and powd r shock
Will blast an empire like a rock."

Power of State to Tax Land Grant of Union Pacific Railroad Company, and Burlington & Missouri River Railroad Company.

The Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska recently (July 6), made two important decisions in respect to the right and power of the state of Nebraska to tax the lands of the Union Pacific and Burlington companies. We have not space at present for the opinions in full, which were delivered by the circuit judge, but give a brief statement of the points decided. The case which involved the right of the state to tax the lands of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, was entitled the Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. McShane et. al. The court in this case ruled the following points:

1 Lands for which a patent has issued to the Union Pacific Railroad Company are taxable by the authorities of the state of Nebraska, notwithstanding the proviso in section 3, of the act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stats at Large, 489), which subjects lands not sold or disposed of by the company within three years from the completion of the road to settlement and pre-emption at $1.25 per acre. Case distinguished from The Railway Co. v. Prescott, 16 Wall. 603.

2. Said proviso construed and the respective rights of the company and persons proposing to settle and pre-empt the lands of the company stated.

3. A bill by the railroad company joining as defendants the various counties through which this railroad runs, is not multifarious where the question on which the case turns is common to all, and the counties are agencies of the state as that part of the taxes which they must pay into the state treasury.

4 Where in addition to the illegality of the tax the bill shows that if not enjoined a multiplicity of suits will arise, and a cloud be cast upon the owner's title, and that he has no adequate remedy at law, it presents a case of equity cognizance.

It will be remembered that the same court heretofore held that the road-bed and other property of the Union Pacific Railroad Company was taxable by the state, and that its judgment was affirmed last winter by the United States Supreme Court. Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Peniston, not yet reported. (See Central Law Journal, ante, p. 58.)

Digitized by Google

In the case of Horatio H. Hunnewell, suing for himself and others v. The Burlington and Missouri River R. R. Co. in Nebraska, the County of Cass and other Counties, the circuit court ruled the following propositions:

1. The land grant to the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company (act of July 2, 1864, sections 17, 20; 13 Stats. at Large, pp. 356, 364,) is not subject to the proviso in section 3 of the original act of July 1, 1862 (12 Stats at Large, 489), giving to the public the right of settlement and pre-emption if the lands granted be not sold or disposed of within three years after the entire line of the road is completed.

2. Where the lands had been fully earned by the railroad company in 1871, and the cost of surveying paid as required by section 21 of said act of July 2, 1864, before the period for assessing lands for 1872 had passed, it was held that the lands were taxable, although the company did not pay the local land-officer's fees until a few days after the period for making the assessment for 1872 had expired.

The views of the court in respect to the right of the public to settle upon and pre-empt the lands of the Union Pacific Railroad Company are of great moment and will be adverted to separately.

Railway Tariff Regulation—The Potter Wisconsin Law.

The constitution of Wisconsin contains a provision that the charter of railroad corporations may be altered or repealed at any time by the legislature. The meaning and effect of this provision have recently been considered by the United States Circuit Court for the Western District of Wisconsin, at Madison (present Mr. Justice DAVIS, and Circuit Judge DRUMMOND), in a suit by the bondholders of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company for an injunction to restrain the state attorney general and the railroad commissioners from enforcing the (Potter) law of last winter regulating railway tariffs. The injunction was denied, and in view of the broad reservation of power over corporations contained in the Wisconsin constitution, it seems to us that there can remain but little doubt as to the correctness of this conclusion. What the word repeal means is clear, and if the legislature may absolutely repeal charters, it would seem difficult to fix any practical limits to the alterations it may make in charters.

The result to which the court came was drawn up by Judge DRUMMOND and stated as follows:

1. Jurisdiction of the Federal Court.—On the assumption that the act of the 11th of March, 1874, relating to railroad, express, and telegraph companies in the state of Wisconsin, is invalid, we think the court has jurisdiction of the case. The bill as filed by the bondholders, citizens of Europe, and of other states, seeks to enforce equitable rights, and to prevent action by the railroad commissioners, which may result, as alleged, in serious injury to these rights. It was not necessary to wait until the commssioners had put the law in full operation, and its effects upon the railway companies had become complete, before the application against them was made to a court of equity, as a very important function of that court is to prevent threatened wrong to the rights of property.

2. The Potter Law still in force Unrepealed.—We are of opinion that the act of the 11th of March, mentioned above, was not repealed by the act of the 12th of March, 1874, the second section of which declared that all existing corporations within the state shall have and possess all the powers and privileges contained in their respective charters, and the act of the 12th of March, 1874, the ninth section of which imposes a penalty for exorbitant charges. There are apparent inconsistencies between the last two named acts and that of the 11th of March; but it becomes a question of intendment on the part of the legislature. On the same day a joint resolution was passed—March 12—directing the secretary of state not to publish the act of 11th March until the 28th of April. Acts of 1874, pp. 599, 693, 758, 773. In this state no general law is enforced till after publication. We think we may consider the joint resolution in order to determine whether the legislature intended that the two acts passed the same day should repeal the act of the 11th of March, and from that it is manifest that such was not the intention of the legislature.

3. Constitutional Provision Construed and Applied.—The charters of railroad corporations, under the constitution of Wisconsin, may be altered or repealed by the legislature at any time after their passage. In legal effect, therefore, there was incorporated in all the numerous grants under which the Northwestern Railway Company now claims its right of franchise and property in this state, the foregoing condition contained in the constitution. It became a part by operation of law, of every contract of mortgage made by the company or by of any its numerous predecessors, under which it claims. All share and bondholders took their stock or their securities subject to this paramount condition, and of what they in law had notice. If the corporation, by making a contract or a deed of trust on its property, could clothe its creditors with an absolute, unchangeable right, it would enable the corporation, by its own act, to abrogate one of the provisions of the fundamental law of the state.

4. Same—Consolidation.—This principle is not changed by any authority from the legislature of the state to a corporation to consolidate with a corporation of another state. The corporation of this state is still subject to the constitution of Wisconsin, and there is no power anywhere to remove it beyond that authority.

5. Power of Legislature within State Limits.—As to the rates for the transit of persons and property exclusively within the limits of this state, the legislature had the right to alter the terms of the charter of the Northwestern Railway Company, and the fact that such alteration might affect the value of its property or franchises, cannot touch the question of power in the legislature. The repeal of its franchises would have well-nigh destroyed the value of its tangible property; and while the latter, as such, could not be taken, still its essential value for use on the railroad would be gone.

6. Grants by Congress do not Limit State Power.—The fact that grants of land were made by congress to the state cannot change the rights of the corporators, or of the creditors. If the state has not perfected the trust, it must answer to the United States.

7. As to State Power over Inter-state Commerce.—The act of the 11th of March, 1874, while not interfering with rates of freight of property transported entirely through the state to or from other states, includes within its terms property and persons transported on railroads from other states into Wisconsin, or from Wisconsin into other states. This act either establishes or authorizes the commissioners to establish, fixed rates of freight and fare on such persons and property. The case of the state freight tax, reported in 15 Wallace, 232, decides that this last described traffic constitutes commerce between the several states, and that the regulation thereof belongs exclusively to congress. It becomes, therefore, a very grave question whether it is competent for a state arbitrarily to fix certain rates for transportation of persons and property of this inter-state commerce. As the right to lower rates implies also the right to raise them, there may be serious doubts whether this can be done. This point was not fully argued by counsel, and scarcely at all by the counsel of defendants; and, under the circumstances, we do not at present feel warranted, on this ground alone, to order the issue of an injunction. If desired by the plaintiffs it may be further considered at a future time, either on demurrer to the bil or in such other form as may fairly present the question to our consideration. The motion for an injunction is overruled.

Upon the conclusion of the reading of the above, Mr. Justice DAVIS remarked: "In view of the decision just rendered, we trust it will not be considered out of the line of our duty to make a suggestion concerning this litigation to the counsel for the defendants. It is manifest that the questions involved are grave ones, and that the court of last resort will ultimately have to pass on them. It is equally manifest that a speedy decision, in which all parties are vitally interested, cannot be obtained unless there is harmony of action on the part of both the complainants and defendants. In the meantime, and while this litigation is in progress, would it not be better for defendants, as far as lies in their power, to have the prosecutions for penalties suspended? These prosecutions are not required to settle rights. They are attended with great expense, and, if enforced while an effort is making in good faith to test the validity of this legislation, must cause serious irritation, and cannot be, as it seems to us, productive of any good result."

Digitized by Google

One point having been left unsettled—that of the effect of the law in question on inter state commerce—Mr. Stoughton, for plaintiffs, expressed great anxiety for further argument and an early decision on that question, and considerable conversation followed between him, the court, and Attorney General Sloan.

Judge DAVIS thought the decisions and suggestions of the court would enable the parties to come to some arrangement which would render it practicable to get the matter before the supreme court at the October term, where a speedy hearing and determination might be had.

It was finally agreed that in case no such arrangement was made mutually satisfactory, the application for an injunction should be further argued on the question of the effect of the law on inter-state commerce, at Chicago, before the same judges, on Thursday or Friday of next week.

Are the Lands of the Union Pacific Railway Company Subject to Pre-emption by the Public?

This question, so important both to the public and to the company, was incidentally before the supreme court in what is known as the Prescott case (16 Wall. 603). It was recently before the United States Circuit Court for Kansas in a case in which the company sought to restrain the sale of its lands for taxes. For a synopsis of what the court decided see ante, p. 106

The question as to the right of pre-emptiom by the public arises upon section 3 of the charter of the company (12 Stats. at Large, 489). This section is the one which makes the grant of lands to the company within a specified distance of its line of road, and it concludes with this provision: "And all such lands so granted by this section, which shall not be sold or disposed of by the company within three years after the entire road shall be completed, shall be subject to settlement and pre-emption like other lands, at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre, to be paid to the company."

Section 4 directs patents to issue for lands on each side of the road from time to time on the completion of sections of forty (afterwards reduced to twenty) consecutive miles, which patents it is enacted shall "convey the right and title to said lands to said company."

The road was completed may 10, 1869. In 1867 the company mortgaged its lands for about $10,000,000.

"Under this legislation, and upon this state of facts," says the circuit judge in delivering his opinion, "the ground taken by the company upon which it insists that the state of Nebraska has no right to tax any of its lands, whether patented or not patented, is, that by the provision in section three above mentioned, these lands are 'subject to settlement and pre-emption like other public lands, at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre, to be paid to the company.' In support of this proposition the counsel for the company rely upon the case of The Kansas Pacific Railway Co. v. Prescott, 16 Wall. 603.

"I confess to some difficulty in distinguishing that case from the one now before the court, but upon the best consideration I have been able to give to the subject, I am of opinion that that case does not control this one, so far, at least, as regards the lands to which this company holds the patent of the United States.

"There are two elements in that case which, in material respects, distinguish it from the present one so far as the plaintiff company has received a patent for its lands: the first is that in that case the taxes were assessed before any patent had been issued; and the second is that they were assessed at a time when by reason of the non-payment of the costs of surveying, etc., required by section 21 of the act of 1864, the company was not entitled to a patent.

"If, in that case, the cost of surveying the land had been paid, and a patent for the land there in question had actually been issued before the taxes were assessed, it would seem that a different result would or might have been reached.

"It is not my purpose to discuss at length the respective rights of the general government and of the railroad company in the lands after the lapse of three years from the completion of the road, nor whether a mortgage of the lands is such a 'disposition' of them as would defeat the right of settlement or pre-emption. The proofs show that the company has dealt with these lands, and is now dealing with them, as if they were, in all respects their absolute property. They are advertising and selling them at their own prices and upon their own terms, and they do not recognize the right of the public to settle upon and pre-empt them, and to buy them at $1.25 per acre. On the other hand, neither congress nor the interior department has taken any steps to subject these lands to settlement and pre-emption, and the public are denied the right to the benefit of the privilege or reservation in their favor.

"I am inclined to think the true meaning and effect of the provision in question to be this: While the road is being constructed, and for a period of three years after the completion of the entire line, the company may sell or dispose of the lands at their own price, and they are subject during this period to no right of settlement or pre-emption; after the three years have elapsed, the company may still sell or dispose of their lands in good faith, but as to any lands not thus sold or disposed of, there is a right on the part of the public to settle upon and pre-empt them in the same manner as if they were part of the public domain—the price not exceeding $1.25 per acre, being payable to the company instead of the government.

"This view harmonizes and gives effect to all the different provisions of the act. The right of the company to the lands granted is a substantial one. The title passes to the company. Patents are required to be issued to the company conveying the 'right and title to the lands.' During the three years the right of the company to sell at its own price is clear, and has not been denied. After the three years the title does not change. The company still owns the lands, but 'subject' to the right of any person possessing the qualifications of a pre-emptor to settle upon them and obtain them as a pre-emptor may obtain other public lands. But this right does not prevent the company from selling lands in good faith to persons who may not wish to pre-empt or occupy them. The rights intended to be given to the public are secured, and the evils apprehended from the company having a monopoly of such a vast amount of lands, are avoided by this construction—which recognizes the right of the actual settler to pre-empt the lands, and thus destroy the monopoly, and also the right of the company, actually and in good faith, to sell any tract not at the time pre-empted, and which, if sold, likewise destroys to that extent the monopoly, since a sale of lands is usually the first step towards their settlement and cultivation.

Digitized by Google

"If this be a correct view of section 3 of the act of 1862, it results that the lands of the company, so far as they are patented, are subject to taxation by the authority of the state, and this privilege reserved in favor of the actual settler, and of which he may never wish to avail himself, which is contingent in its nature and subject to be defeated by a sale of the lands by the company, is not inconsistent with and will not defeat the rightful authority of the state to tax the lands.

"As to lands which have been patented to the company, I am of opinion that it is the the substantial owner, and that equity should not relieve it from taxation in respect thereto, because it may be compelled to sell particular tracts here and there to actual settlers at a dollar and quarter an acre."

Contracts in Restraint of Trade.

THE OREGON STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY v. HENRY WINSOR, et al.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 222, October Term, 1873.

1. Contract in Restraint of Trade.—Whether a contract is in restraint of trade is void as being against public policy can not, in this country, be tested by the fact that it restrains the exercise of a particular trade within the limits of a particular state. Such a contract may be valid, although it restrains the exercise of a particular trade in another state.

2. ——. Divisible.—A contract in restraint of trade may be divisible; so that a part will be held valid as being beneficial to the obligee, and not injurious to the public, and a remaining part void as against public policy.

3. ——. Case in Judgment.—In 1864, the California Steam Navigation Company, which was engaged in navigating the waters of California, sold to the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, which was engaged in navigating Columbia river and its tributaries, in Oregon and Washington, one of its steamers, the vendees stipulating that they would not employ the said steamer on the waters of California for ten years, after the first day of May, 1864. Three years later, the vendees sold the said steamer to third persons, who were engaged in navigating the waters of Puget Sound in Washington Territory, and the latter vendees stipulated, that they would neither employ the said steamer on the Columbia river or its tributaries, nor on the waters of California, for the period of ten years thereafter. Upon these facts it is held:

(1) That the first contract between the California and the Oregon company is presumed to have had a good consideration in the price paid for the steamer by the latter company, and was not such a contract in restraint of trade, as is void as being against public policy

(2) That the second contract is divisible: (a) That part of it by which the last vendees agreed not to employ the steamer on the Columbia river or is tributaries, was not, for the reasons applicable to the first contract, void as against public policy. (b) That part of it which restrained the last vendees from employing the said steamer on the waters of the California was likewise valid, so far as it was necessary to enable the Oregon company to keep its covenant with the California company—that is to say, it was valid for the space of ten years, from the first day of May, 1864, but as to the last three years covered by it, it was not beneficial to the last vendor, and was void as against public policy.

In error to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Washington.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the Court.

This action was brought in a district court of Washington Territory to recover $75,000 as stipulated damages for the breach of a certain agreement between the parties. The complaint was demurred to, and the demurrer was sustained, and the action dismissed. The plaintiff brought a writ of error to the supreme court of the territory, which affirmed the judgment. This is a writ of error to the judgment of the supreme court, and brings up for consideration simply the sufficiency of the complaint.

The principal facts set out in the complaint are the following: It states that in 1864, the California Steam Navigation Company being engaged in steam and other transportation on the several routes of travel on the rivers, bays, and waters of the state of California, sold to the plaintiff, being a company engaged in the like business on the Columbia river, and its branches, in Oregon and Washington, the steamer "New World," for $75,000, subject to a stipulation, amongst other things, that the plaintiff should not run or employ, or suffer to be run or employed, the said steamer upon any of the routes of travel, rivers, bays, or waters of the state of California for the period of ten years from the 1st day of May, 1864; that on the 18th day of February, 1867, the plaintiff sold the same steamer to certain of the defendants for the sum of $75,000, subject to a stipulation and covenant that the said steamer should not be run or employed upon any of the routes of travel, or the rivers, bays, or waters of the state of California, or the Columbia river and its tributaries, for the period of ten years from the 1st day of May, 1867; and that for a breach of said covenant the defendants, to-wit, the vendees of the vessel as principals, and the other defendants as sureties, should pay $75,000 as actual liquidated damages. The complaint further averred, that at the time of the second sale of the steamer, and up to the commencement of the suit, the California Steam Navigation Company were engaged with numerous steam and other vessels in navigating the waters of the State of California; and that the Oregon company, the plaintiffs, were likewise engaged in the navigation of the Columbia river and its branches; and that at the time of said sale to the defendants, the latter were engaged in navigating the waters of Puget Sound, and were in no wise engaged in the navigation of the waters of Oregon or California, or of any of the waters described in the stipulation. The breach complained of is, that the steamer has been engaged from the 1st of November, 1868, to the commencement of the suit, in the transportation of passengers and freight from the city of San Francisco to Vallejo, in the state of California, being a route of travel on the waters of the state of California embraced in the stipulation and convenant.

The case turns mainly upon the question, whether the covenant entered into by the defendants, whereby they agreed "not to run or employ, or suffer to be run or employed, the said steamboat 'New World' upon any of the routes of travel, or the rivers, bays, or waters of the state of California, or the Columbia river and its tributaries, for the period of ten years from the 1st day of May, 1867," etc., is valid. The objection urged against it is, that it is a contract in restraint of trade, and as such, contrary to public policy.

It is a well settled rule of law that an agreement in general restraint of trade is illegal and void; but an agreement which operates merely in partial restraint of trade is good, provided it be not unreasonable, and there be a consideration to support it. Chitty on Contracts, 576, 8th Am. Ed. In order that it may not be unreasonable, the restraint imposed must not be larger than is required for the necessary protection of the party with whom the contract is made. Ib. TINDAL, C. J., in Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 743. A contract even on good consideration, not to use a trade anywhere in England, is held void in that country, as being too general a restraint of trade; but a contract not to use a trade at a particular place, if it be founded on a good consideration, and be made for a proper and useful purpose, is valid 2 Wms. Saund. 156, note 1. Of course, a contract not to exercise a trade generally would be obnoxious to the rule, and would be void.

The application of the rule is more difficult than a clear understanding of it. In this country especially, where state lines interpose such a slight barrier to social and business intercourse, it is often difficult to decide whether a contract not to exercise a trade in a particular state is, or is not, within the rule. It has generally been held to be so, on the ground that it would compel a man thus bound to transfer his residence and allegiance to another state in order to persue his avocation. Taylor v. Blanchard, 13 Allen. 375; Dunlop v. Gregory, 6 Selden, 241.

But this mode of applying the rule must be received with some caution. This country is substantially one country, especially in all matters of trade and business; and it is manifest that cases may arise in which it would involve too narrow a view of the subject to condemn as invalid a contract not to carry on a particular business within a particular state. Suppose the case of two persons associated in business as partners, and engaged in a manufacture by which they supply the country with a certain article, but the process of manufacture is a secret; and they agree to seperate, and one of the terms of the separation is, that one of the parties shall not sell the manufactured article in Massachusetts, where the other resides and carries on business; and that the latter shall not sell the article in New York, where his associate is to reside and carry on business Can there be any doubt that such an agreement would be valid and binding? Cases must be judged according to their circumstances, and can only be rightly judged when the reason and grounds of the rule are carefully considered.

Digitized by Google

There are two principal grounds on which the dictrine is founded, that a contract in restraint of trade is void as against public policy. One is, the injury to the public by being deprived of the restricted party's industry; the other is, the injury to the party himself by being precluded from pursuing his occupation and thus being prevented from supporting himself and his family. It is evident that both these evils occur when the contract is general, not to persue one's trade at all, or not to persue it in the entire realm or country. The country suffers the loss in both cases; and the party is deprived of his occupation, or is obliged to expatriate himself in order to follow it. A contract that is open to such grave objection is clearly against public policy. But if neither of these evils ensue, and if the contract is founded on a valid consideration and a reasonable ground of benefit to the other party, it is free from objection, and may be enforced.

In accordance with these principles it is well settled that a stipulation by a vendee of any trade, business or establishment, that the vendor shall not exercise the same trade or business, or erect a similar establishment within a reasonable distance, so as not to interfere with the value of the trade, business, or thing purchased, is reasonable and valid. In like manner a stipulation by the vendor of an article to be used in a business or trade in which he i himself engaged, that it shall not be used within a reasonable region or distance, so as not to interfere with his said business or trade, is also valid and binding. The point of difficulty in these cases is to determine what is a reasonable distance within which the prohibitory stipulation may lawfully have effect. And it is obvious, at first glance, that this must depend upon the circumstances of the particular case; although, from the uncertain character of the subject, much latitude must be allowed to the judgment and discretion of the parties. It is clear that a stipulation that another shall not persue his trade or employment at such a distance from the business of the person to be protected, as that it could not possibly affect or injure him, would be unreasonable and absurd. On the other hand, a stipulation is unobjectionable and binding which imposes the restraint only to such an extent of territory as may be necessary for the protection of the party making the stipulation, provided it does not violate the two indispensable conditions, that the other party be not prevented from pursuing his calling, and that the country be not deprived of the benefit of his exertions.

To apply these principles to the case before us: The California Steam Navigation Company, being engaged in the business of transportation on the rivers, bays, and waters of California, was willing to sell one of their steamers to the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, which was engaged in a similar business on the Columbia river and its tributaries, provided the latter company would agree that the steamer should not be used in the California waters for the period of ten years from the 1st day of May, 1864. This stipulation was necessary to protect the former company from interference with its own business. It had no tendency to destroy the usefulness of the steamer, and did not deprive the country of any industrial agency. The transaction merely transferred the steamer from the employment of one company to that of another situated and doing business in another state. It involves no transfer of residence or allegiance on the part of the vendee in order to persue its employment, nor any cessation or diminution of its business whatever. The presumption is that the arrangement was mutually beneficial to both companies, and that it promoted the general interests of commerce on the Pacific coast. Again, the Oregon company were afterwards willing to dispose of the same steamer to the defendants, who were engaged in the like business of transportation in the waters of Puget Sound, Washington territory, provided that the latter would agree that the steamer should not be run or employed upon any of the routes of travel or rivers, bays, or waters of California, or the Columbia river and its tributaries for the period of ten years from the 1st day of May, 1867. This stipulation excluded the steamer from the territory covered by the former stipulation exacted by the California company, and also from the territory occupied by the Oregon company itself. The latter portion of the stipulation stands on the same ground and reason as did the first stipulation between the California and Oregon companies. The former portion was necessary in order that the Oregon company might faithfully keep its covenant with the California company. It is true that the stipulation in question covers a period of time which extends three years beyond the period for which the Oregon company is bound to the California company. The latter would expire on the first of May, 1874, and the stipulation in question extends to the first day of May, 1877. This extra period of three years in reference to the waters of California is not necessary to the protection of the Oregon company. That company is under no obligation with regard to those three years. But the suit is brought and the breach is alleged for a portion of time during which the Oregon company is bound to protect the California company from the interference of said steamer. And the question arises whether the contract is so divisible in relation to the California portion that it can stand for the seven years for which the Oregon company is bound, though it be void as to the remaining three years. We think it is so divisible. It is laid down by Chitty as the result of the cases, and his authorities support the statement, "that agreements in restraint of trade, whether under seal or not, are divisible; and, accordingly, it has been held that when such an agreement contains a stipulation which is capable of being constructed divisibly, and one part thereof is void as being in restraint of trade, whilst the other is not; the court will give effect to the latter, and will not hold the agreement to be void altogether." The cases cited in support of this proposition are Chesman & ux. v. Nainby, 2 Strange, 739; Wood v. Benson, 2 Cr. & J. 94; Mallan v. May, 11 Mees & Welsb. 652; Price v. Green, 16 Mees. & W. 346; Nichols v. Stretton, 10 Q. B. 346 In Price v. Green the contract was not to exercise the trade of a perfumer in London, or within six hundred miles thereof; and it was held divisable and good for London only. This case was carried through all the courts. In Nichols v. Stretton the stipulation was that an attorney's apprentice, who was to serve five years, should not, after his term expired, be concerned as an attorney for any persons who had, previous to the expiration of said apprenticeship, been a client of the attorney with whom the contract was made, or who should at any time thereafter become his client. It was strenuously and fully argued that whilst the contract might have been good as to past clients it was certainly not good as to future ones, and being an entire contract, the whole was bad. But the court followed the previous decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Price v. Green, held the contract divisible, and sustained the action. We see no reason why this principle should not be followed in the present case. The line of division between the period which is properly covered by the restriction and that which is not so, is clearly defined and easily drawn. It is subject to no confusion or uncertainty, and the court can have no difficulty in applying it.

Digitized by Google

Regarding this objection, therefore, as removed, the covenant made by the defendants seems to stand on the same ground as that made by the plaintiffs with the California company. The same observations may be made with reference to it. The public was not injured by being deprived of any of the business enterprise of the country. The vendees did not incapacitate themselves from carrying on business just as they had previously done, and in the same locality. Their business was rather facilitated by the arrangement. Finally, the stipulation, it will be presumed, was founded on a valuable consideration in its influence upon the price paid for the steamer; its object and purpose was simply to protect the vendors, and if we except the three years before considered in its relation to California, its restraining effect extended no farther than was necessary for their protection.

We are unable, therefore, to see anything in the contract, so far as it is now in question, which militates against public policy.

There are no other points adverted to which demand the serious consideration of the court.

The judgment must be reversed, and the case remanded to be proceeded in according to law.

Dissenting, Justices CLIFFORD, SWAYNE and DAVIS.

REVERSED AND REMANDED.

Murder — Circumstantial Evidence — Photograph Likenesses, Etc.

WILLIAM E. UDDERZOOK v. THE COMMONWEALTH.

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in Banco, Philadelphia, July 2, 1874.

Present: Hon. DANIEL AGNEW, Chief Justice,
Hon. GEORGE SHARSWOOD, " HENRY W. WILLIAMS, " ——— ——— MERCUR, } Associate Justices.

1. Murder—Circumstantial Evidence.—A conviction of murder in the first degree, upon circumstantial evidence as to the identity of the deceased, and the defendant's connection with the crime, affirmed on an examination of the evidence.

2. ———. Evidence--Photographs.—A photograph taken from life, and proved to resemble the person photographed, fills the same measure of evidence as a portrait painted from life by an artist. It is admissible, subject to disproof or doubt, and its effect is to be determined by the jury.

3. ———. ———. ———. Judicial Notice.—The court will take judicial cognizance of the fact that photographs are a proper means of producing correct likenesses. It follows that photographs are admissible in evidence for purposes of identification, although proof of their correctness has not been made by experts.

4. ———. ———. Habits of Intoxication.—Evidence of habits of intoxication is competent upon a question of identity.

5. ———. Practice--Papers Introduced in Evidence may be Taken to Jury Room.--Where, on a trial for murder, the jury have retired, and returned for additional instructions, it is not error to permit them to take with them to the jury room papers which have been introduced in evidence and commented upon on the trial.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, Ch. J.

This is indeed a strange case, a combination by two to cheat insurance companies, and a murder of one by the other to reap the fruit of the fraud. Winfield Scott Goss, an inhabitant of Baltimore, had insured his life to the amount of $25,000. He was last seen at his shop on the York road a short distance from Baltimore, on the evening of the 2d of February, 1872, in company with William E. Udderzook, his brother-in-law, the prisoner, and a young man living near. They left him to go to the house of the young man's father.

In a short time the shop was discovered to be on fire. After it had burned down a body was drawn out of the fire, supposed to be that of Goss. Claims were made upon the insurance companies, the prisoner being active in prosecuting them. On the 30th of June, 1873, the prisoner and a stranger, a man identified as Alexander C. Wilson, appeared at Jennersville, in Chester county, this state, and remained over night and the next day. In the evening, July 1, the prisoner and this stranger left Jennersville together in a buggy. Next day, on being met and asked what had become of his companion, the prisoner said he had left him at Parkersburg. On the 11th of July, the body of a man, identified on the trial as W. S. Goss, or A. C. Wilson, was found in Bear's woods, about ten miles from Jennersville; the head and trunk buried in a shallow hole in one place and the arms and legs in another. The stranger who was with the prisoner at Jennersville, identified as A. C. Wilson, was traced from place to place, living in retirement, from June 22, 1872, up to within a day or two of the time when he appeared with the prisoner at Jennersville. During this interval the prisoner and Wilson were seen together several times under circumstances indicating great intimacy and privacy. Wilson has not been seen or heard of since the evening of July 1, 1873, when he left Jennersville in company with the prisoner. The great question in the case was, the identity of A C. Wilson as W. S. Goss. This was established by a variety of circumstances, and many witnesses, leaving no doubt that Goss and Wilson were the same person, and that the body found in Bear's woods was that of Goss.

All the bills of exceptions, except one, relate to this question of identity, the most material being those relating to the use of a photograph of Goss. This photograph, taken in Baltimore on the same plate with a gentleman named Langley, was clearly proved by him, and also by the artist who took it. Many objections were made to the use of this photograph, the chief being to the admission of it to identify Wilson as Goss; the prisoner's counsel regarding this use of it as certainly incompetent. That a portrait or a miniature painted from life and proved to resemble the person, may be used to identify him cannot be doubted, though, like all other evidences of identity, it is open to disproof or doubt, and must be determined by the jury. There seems to be no reason why a photograph, proved to be taken from life and to resemble the person photographed, should not fill the same measure of evidence. It is true the photographs we see are not the original likenesses, their lines are not traced by the hand of the artist, nor can the artist be called to testify that he faithfully limned the portrait. They are but paper copies taken from the original plate, called the negative, made sensitive by chemicals, and printed by the sun-light through the camera. It is the result of art, guided by certain principles of science.

In the case before us such a photograph of the man Goss was presented to a witness who had never seen him, so far as he knew, but had seen a man known to him as Wilson. The purpose was to show that Goss and Wilson were one and the same person. It is evident that the competency of the evidence in such a case depends on the reliability of the photograph as a work of art, and this, in the case before us in which no proof was made by experts of this reliability, must depend upon the judicial cognizance we may take of photographs as an established means of producing a correct likeness. The Daguerrean process was first given to the world in 1839. It was soon followed by photography, of which we have had nearly a generation's experience. It has become a customary and a common mode of taking and preserving views as well as the likenesses of persons, and has obtained universal assent to the correctness of its delineations. We know that its principles are derived from science; that the images on the plate, made by the rays of light through the camera, are dependent on the same general laws which produce the images of outward forms upon the retina through the lenses of the eye. The process has become one in general use, so common that we cannot refuse to take judicial cognizance of it as a proper means of producing correct likenesses.

But happily the proof of identity in this case is not dependant on the photograph alone. Letters from Wilson identified as the handwriting of Goss; a peculiar ring, belonging to Goss, worn upon the finger of Wilson; the recognition by Wilson of A. C. Goss as his brother: packages addressed to A. C. Goss and envelopes bearing the marks of the firm with which W. S. Goss had been employed coming and going to and from Baltimore, and many other circumstances following up the man Wilson, leave no doubt of his identity as Goss, independently of the photograph.

Digitized by Google

The objection to the proof of Goss' habits of intoxication is equally untenable. True the habit is common to many, and alone would have little weight. But habits are a means of identification, though with strength in proportion to their peculiarity. The weight of the habit was a matter for the jury.

It is unnecessary to follow the bills of exception in detail. They all relate to facts and circumstances bearing on the question of identity. If the bills of exception are many, they only denote that the circumstances were numerous, and in this multiplication consists the strength of the proof.

They are many links in a chain so long it encircles the prisoner in a double fold. The question put to G. P. Moore, A. H. Barintz, and A. R. Carter, were unobjectionable. Whether they really could not identify the dark and swollen face of the corpse it was not for the court to decide; its weight belonged to the jury.

There was no error in permitting the jury, after their return into the court for further instructions, to take out with them, at their own request, the letters, check, due-bill, and application for insurance papers which had been proved, read in evidence and commented on in the trial. The appearance, contents, and hand-writing of these documents were no doubt important, and to be inspected by the jury, who would not be expected to carry all these features in their minds. It is customary in murder cases to permit the jury to take out for their examination the clothing worn by the deceased, exhibiting its condition, the rents made in it, the instrument of death, and all things proved and given in evidence bearing on the commission of the offence.

We discern no error in this record, and therefore affirm the sentence and judgment of the court below, and order this record to be remitted for execution.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

Correspondence — An American Lawyer in London — The New Judicature Act

LONDON, May, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—The new judicature act, as you are aware, comes into operation here on the second of November next. Before I came here, or had examined the act, I heard it spoken of in Boston as a revolutionary measure—a very dangerous experiment. The chances are, I think, that they who thus spoke had never read the act at all. The The act consolidates the courts of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, High Court of Admiralty, and the Courts of Probate and of Bankruptcy into one Supreme Court, but with two divisions, a High Court and a Court of Appeal. Nominally it sweeps away all the first above named courts, but, in truth nothing but the name is swept away. The old judges all remain, with some new powers. Apparently appeales to the privy council are abolished, and yet hardly that, because the privy councillors are still to be employed under the new organization. No judge of the new court can, at the same time, be a member of the House of Commons; but this operates no change, since, I believe, that not one of the judges of the courts abolished is a member of the House of Commons. They are all or nearly all in the House of Lords; and there they may remain and be the judges of the new court as they now are of the old ones. The High Court is broken into five divisions, and these divisions correspond, very nearly at least, to the five or six courts abolished. The same judges are to be the judges still, not relieved from their old duties, and with few new ones imposed. Appeal to the House of Lords is abolished; but I believe on all questions of law, certainly in, and since, the trial of Mr. Hastings, the lords have taken the advice of the judges, and in most cases decided in conformity to such advice.

The division of the legal year into terms is abolished. Choses in action are made assignable. It is said the distinction between equity and law is abolished; but this is not so. Equitable jurisdiction is conferred upon the courts sitting in the trial of common-law cases; and where there is conflict between the rules of equity and the rules of the common law, the equity rule obtains. The rule in the Admiralty Court as to collisions, when both are at fault, is to be the admiralty, and not the common-law rule, wherever there is a variance. The judges have power to sit and act at any time, and at any place, for the transaction of business. It is in the discretion of the court to appoint referees in certain cases to try matters of fact. No judge of the Court of Appeal is to sit on the hearing of an appeal from any judgment or order made by himself, or any divisional court, of which he was a member. All writs at common law, bills, or informations in chancery, causes in admiralty, or citations in the Court of Probate, are to be instituted in the High Court by a proceeding called an action. The facts of the case are to be briefly stated, and the nature of the relief asked stated. To such action there is to be an answer. Exceptions and writs of error are abolished. Causes are to be re-heard on motion. There has not been, so far as I can learn, for years any demand for ampler, but only for speedier justice. It is said this act is a lawyer's measure; and I believe it. But I believe the interest of lawyers is identical with the public interest. Except only in very extraordinary cases, no lawyer can ever get rich in the conduct of a case which is very long delayed. It is as much for his interest as for the interest of his client that a case should be disposed of within some reasonable time. This measure was reported upon by commissioners some years since. The bill was introduced by Lord Selborne, the chancellor, who, however, was largely indebted to the chief justice of the Queen's Bench for some of the best provisions. The bill was recodified by lawyers, and supported, as it passed, by them; and but for their co-operation and support it could not have been passed. It ought to be understood, if it is not, that the 3,000 attorneys, and 3,900 barristers in London, all of whom are made simply solicitors by this act, are, nevertheless, a power in London—in Parliament and out of it; nor can it be denied, they are a power productive of great good. He who says or supposes they worked only to their own interest and comfort in supporting this measure, knows neither these lawyers nor understands the case. I am sure London and the British Empire owe their greatness in very great part to their lawyers.

PELHAM.

Admissions to the Bar.

SELMA, ALA., July 6th, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I am a constant reader of your live, interesting, and useful journal. I admire its high tone, and the alacrity with which its editors condemn that which is pernicious. Your approbation of that which tends to establish a higher standard of legal ethics, and to promote the interests of our profession, deserves more than our thanks—you ought to have the earnest co-operation of the lawyers of the land. Permit me to express my thanks for your article in number 27, entitled "Admissions to the Bar."

I was not aware, before I read it, that this subject was receiving, in so many states from and so many journals, the serious consideration which it deserves. The carelessness with which candidates are admitted even in the supreme court of our state (Alabama), has already worked serious mischief, and can but be regretted by those of the profession who have a proper regard for its welfare. It is true that the ignorant, unskilled and immoral attorney soon loses whatever business he may at first receive, but he has time and opportunities to bring disgrace upon the profession.

We have a rule of our supreme court, not only permitting persons to practice, having a license from the highest court of the state whence they come, but also admitting any one who "has a diploma from any respectable (?) law school," etc. Some of these diplomaed gentlemen are too ignorant to draft an ordinary power of attorney, deed of conveyance, or a plea of non assumpsit. Do not understand me as decrying a proper course of training in a law school; my regret is that my struggle in life begun too early to enable me to receive the benefits of a thorough education. If, however, with my experience, I had the choice of a course of study at a law school, or a clerk's place in an office where there was a good library and plenty of work, I should choose the latter.

The legal profession of our state are greatly to blame for admitting to the bar persons who have neither a common school education, a knowledge of the law, nor "a good moral character." The fault is not in our laws—they are probably stringent enough. Candidates are required to be examined by a committee on seven different branches of the law. So indifferent are the committees to these requirements, however, that a casual private examination of five or ten minutes suffices to get the requisite certificate. Several years ago an applicant for law license in one of our cities in this state was unable to answer the question "what is a bill of exchange?"

Digitized by Google

Yet this man was admitted to practice in "the several courts of this state."

The only remedy I can see for the existing evil is a lawyers' state convention. In such a convention this and many kindred irregularities and hindrances might be brought to the attention of the bar, and such steps taken as would redound to its honor. Such a convention was recently advocated by one of our leading daily journals at the suggestion of a prominent member of The Bar Association of Dallas County. I regret to say that there was no general response to this call. We hope, however, that the subject will be again agitated, and that it will eventually lead to such a convention from which great good may result. The medical profession of this and many other states have for years enjoyed the advantages of their state conventions. Are there not many good reasons why our lawyers should have a state convention? Let us then have it, and let the lawyers and judges by their action, so far as in their power lies, take steps to prevent improper "admissions to the bar." If such a convention is ever held, the young and active members of the bar must take the initiatory steps—the older ones have, we fear, neither the time nor inclination to engage in the work necessary to bring about its proper organization. We hope to have the benefit of their wisdom in its deliberations. JUVENIS.

[Communicated.]

Section 14 of the Bankrupt Law as Amended.

Some doubts having been created by contradictory constructions placed upon the 14th section of the bankrupt law, Congress passed the amendment, which was approved March 3d, 1873. The constitutionality of that amendment has been questioned, and it becomes an interesting subject of investigation to the profession and to the public.

What was the true meaning of that part of section 14, as passed and approved March 2d, 1867, adopting the exemptions of the several states, in each state respectively? It seems to have been considered that the words "at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy," etc., in the sentence, qualified the expression "as is exempted," and also qualified the words "by the laws of the state;" and, therefore, it was supposed by some that the amount exempted by the laws of a state at the time bankruptcy proceedings begin should be exempted to the bankrupt; while others thought the original act exempted all the state exemptions of 1864. By the former it is held that the intention of congress was to confine and limit the operation of the law to such property as legal process from the state courts could have subjected at the time proceedings in bankruptcy were begun by or against the individual. See Bump on Bankruptcy, p. 129, citing In re Askerr, 3 B. R. 142. But referring to the punctuation of that part of the 14th section, we find that the words "at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy" are disconnected by a comma from that part of the sentence wherein is used the words "as is exempted from levy and sale," and grammatically they only qualify the words "has his domicil." If congress had intended that the words "at the time of commencement of proceedings," should be a clause qualifying either of the expressions "as is exempted from levy and sale," or "by the laws of the state," then it should have been punctuated with a comma after the word "state," and after the word "domicil" another comma, so as to read "by the laws of the state, in which the bankrupt has his domicil, at the time of commencement of proceedings," etc. It is evident that the use of the present tense in the expression "as is exempted," etc., refers to the time of the approval of the original act, March 2d, 1867. A little further reflection will tend to satisfy any one of the correctness of this view.

That congress had a constitutional right to prescribe a reasonable exemption of property for each bankrupt, we have never seen questioned. And that, too, without reference to the inhibition of section 10 of article 1 of the federal constitution against impairing the obligation of contracts; for it is aimed only at state legislation. But congress could delegate none of its constitutional power over this subject to a state legislature. If congress could refer to a state legislature the power to amend or change one of the sections of the bankrupt law, so it could almost any other. If, therefore, it is held and construed that the exemptions to a bankrupt in any state should vary or be changed by any and every expression of the law-making power of the state, regulating and changing its exemption laws, even while congress is not in session, and without any amendment passed by congress, is not that virtually referring to the states the power to fix the amount of exemptions the bankrupt shall retain? We think congress could not do this. No principle of law is better settled than this: When a legislative act is susceptible of two constructions, one of which is constitutional and the other not, then the former must be held to be the one intended by the legislature. And hence we say that it was not the intention of congress to fix so variable and varying a standard of exemptions for bankrupts. Another reason for our conclusion is that in the next preceding sentence of section 14, Congress, in adopting the exemptions by the laws of the United States, uses this language: "And such other property as now is, or hereafter shall be, exempted," etc.

Did congress, by thus adopting the exemptions of the several states, destroy the uniformity of the law? That the original act was not wanting in uniformity for this reason, seems to be conceded, and it was so decided in the case of In re Beckerford, 4 B. R. 59. In that case Judge KREKEL and Judge MILLER, in the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, so decided. Ex parte Appold, 16 Am. L. R. p. 624. The amendatory act, approved 3d of March, 1873, has recently passed under the criticism of Chief Justice WAITE, sitting at Richmond. And it is reported that he declared it unconstitutional because not uniform. If its lack of uniformity is to be attributed to the fact that under its operation different amounts are exempted in the different states, then the same objection would apply with equal force to the corresponding part of the original act adopting the various state exemptions. Hence, if the original act did not lack uniformity, neither does this amendment of it. That uniformity in the original act was not destroyed by the fact that it adopted the various state exemptions, we think the cases of In re Beckerford, 4 B. R. 59, and Ex parte Appold, 16 Am. L. Register, 624, heretofore referred to, sufficiently show. SUBSCRIBER.

Revision of the Statute Law and Codification of the Common Law.

The revision and codification of our law are scarcely less important to the profession and the public than the Judicature Act. It is fitting that these great changes should be as nearly contemporaneous as possible. We apprehend that in 1876 every lawyer of eminence or in practice will have in his study a complete edition of the statutes at large, consisting of about twenty volumes in all; a code of the common law, consisting of about five volumes; a code of equity, consisting of about three volumes; and a book of practice. These twenty-eight or thirty volumes will, in all probability, supersede the three or four thousand volumes of statutes, books of reports in law and equity, text-books on practice and miscellaneous subjects, which now encumber the shelves of many a law library. The lord chancellor has just passed the bill through its second stage, which contains the revision of the statute law down to 1837. In 1868 a commission was appointed to revise and publish an edition of the statutes down to that year. Of this revised edition five volumes have already been published, and are in the hands of the profession, and contain all the statutes passed down to the year 1824, and which are still in force. These five volumes have superseded forty-three volumes of the octavo, or twenty-six and a half volumes of the quarto edition of the Statutes at Large. Along with them a chronological table and complete index of the statute law down to the year 1872 has been published. The bill proposed by the lord chancellor sanctions a sixth volume, which will contain the acts which were passed between 1824 and 1837, and which are still in force. It is calculated that the revised edition of the statutes, passed between 1837 and 1868, will occupy something like nine or ten volumes more. During this session the lord chancellor does not intend to touch the question of codification of the common law and we highly approve of his abstention. The Judicature Act will blend the systems of common law and equity to such an extent as materially to affect the rules laid down by the judges during the period when the two branches were distinct. Many of these rules would never have been propounded but for the existence of the two separate systems in this country. As an example we need only refer to Lord Hardwicke's observations in Wortley v. Birkhead, 2 Ves. 571. When speaking of the equitable doctrine of tacking mortgages, he says: "It could not have happened in any other country but this, because the jurisdiction of law and equity is administered here in different courts, and creates different kinds of rights in estates, and, therefore, as courts of equity break in upon the common law where necessity and conscience require it, still they allow a superior force and strength to a legal title to estates." If the lord chancellor should proceed with the codification of the common law during the next session, as he proposes, we will then have the three new systems simultaneously established, which will alter the entire administration of the law in all its branches—expediting, simplifying, and contracting its rules, enactments, and procedure, and effecting a revolution which will be unprecedented in its nature and extent.—Irish Law Times.

Digitized by Google

Notes and Queries.

KIRKSVILLE, Mo., July 3, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A. has a judgment against B. B. has a homestead, which is occupied by him as such at the rendition of the judgment. Shortly afterwards he leases his homestead out for two years and goes to another state, but with the intention of returning at the end of the two years and again occupying his homestead as such. Is it liable to sale under execution while thus leased out. ADAIR.

ANSWER.—There have been within the last ten years numerous decisions in the Western and Southern states upon what constitutes an abandonment of a homestead. If the animus revertendi—the intention of returning—can be proved as our correspondent states it, we think it probable that the homestead right was not abandoned. See Mills v. Van Boskirk, 32 Tex. 360; Cross v. Evarts, 28 Tex. 523; Shepherd v. Cassiday, 20 Tex. 29; Gouhenant v. Cockrell, 20 Tex. 96—cases which embody the rule that the abandonment of a homestead can only be established "by the most clear, conclusive and undeniable evidence." In Shepherd v. Cassiday, supra, Chief Justice HEMPHILL, a very able judge, whose mind had been enlarged by the study of the maxims of the civil law, and whose learning adorns and elevates the jurisprudence of Texas, declared that "the homestead is not to be regarded as a species of prison bounds which the owner cannot pass over without pains and penalties. His necessities or circumstances may frequently require him to leave his homestead for a greater or less period of time. He may leave on visits of business or pleasure; for the education of his children; or to acquire in some more favorable location means to improve his homestead; or for the subsistence of his family; or he may intend to abandon provided he can sell. But let him leave for what purpose he may, or be his intentions what they may, provided they are not those of total relinquishment or abandonment, his right to the exemption cannot be regarded as forfeited." "It must be undeniably clear," said the same learned judge in Gouhenant v. Cockrell, supra, "and beyond almost the shadow, at least all reasonable ground of dispute, that there has been a total abandonment with an intention not to return and claim the exemption."

It has, however, been decided in Illinois that, while in case of the death of a husband, or of both parents, and the children are of tender years possession by a tenant may protect the property from sale on execution (Brinkerhoff v. Everett, 38 Ill. 263), yet, when the husband is living, the family must reside on the homestead. Cabeen v. Mulligan, 37 Ill. 230; Titman v. Moore, 43 Ill. 169. And see Walters v. People, 21 Ill. 178; Kitchell v. Burgwin, 21 Ill. 40.

The question could be pursued at great length through a list of varying decisions, but we have not space to devote to it. The question will be found in some states settled by the terms of the statute, as in Michigan, where actual occupancy is required in order to preserve the right. That the question of intent to abandon is one of fact for a jury, see Gibson v. Robbins, 10 Watts, 156; Goodman v. Losey, 3 Watts & Serg. 526.

CARTHAGE, Mo., July 3, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Suppose A. sues B., C. and D. jointly. B. files an application for a change of venue in his own behalf, which application is sustained. C and D file no such application, and are anxious to have the case tried in the court where the suit is brought. How will the court proceed in the case, in this state? Please answer through the LAW JOURNAL and oblige a CARTHAGE SUBSCRIBER.

ANSWER.—The only possible doubt in the matter is raised by the use of the words "any party" in the Missouri statute, 2 Wagn. Stat. p. 1356, § 3. But notwithstanding this, it is manifest that one defendant will not be permitted to drag after him his two co-defendants to another county, if they object to it, and if their rights would be prejudiced by the change. They are "parties" as well as he, and clearly have as strong a right to stay as he has to go; and if the case is one which does not admit of a severance, the rights of the one must yield to those of the two, rather than permit the rights of two to be subordinated to those of one. Under the facts stated, we should suppose, then, that it would clearly be the duty of the judge to refuse to take jurisdiction, and to send the case back to the court from whence it came. That this is the correct view, we think is inferable from the following cases: Sailly v. Hutton, 6 Wend. 508; Legg v. Dorsheim, 19 Wend. 700; Welling v. Sweet, 1 How. Pr. 156; Simmons v. McDougal, 2 How. Pr. 77. See also Mairs v. Remsen, 3 Code R. 138; Job v. Butterfield, 1 Eng. Law & Eq. 417.

SPRINGFIELD, Mo., June 22, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—If you have space in your valued paper I would like to ask a few questions. A. sues B., an absentee, by attachment, and gets a special judgment. A. is absent, himself, and his attorney neglects to follow up with execution. So it stands for four years, when A. at last looks the matter up. He finds that after the attachment, during trial, and before judgment, the seven years' presumption as to B.'s life expired, and that no attorney or administrator was appointed to represent B. As the original demand is barred by limitation, what shall he do?

Is the judgment good, void, or voidable? Supposing it good, how can it, a special judgment, be revived? STUDENT.

ANSWER.—Our answers to questions of this character must be understood as conjectures merely. We think the judgment is valid. The law raises presumptions to supply the absence of proof, and out of convenience and necessity. Unless we are greatly mistaken, presumptions of law, such as the presumption of death after seven years' absence, will not be raised to unsettle rights which have been acquired, or to overturn the solemn judgment of a court of record, regular on its face. In such a case the presumption of death would be met and overturned by the stronger presumption which courts always indulge in favor of the regularity of judicial proceedings. After final judgment has been rendered and time has elapsed, rather than presume that the defendant was dead when judgment was rendered, simply on the supposition that he had been absent seven years, a court would presume that the court rendering the judgment had evidence before it that he was alive. Assuming the judgment to be good, we suppose it may be revived by scire facias and publication, if the defendant is still a non-resident, but this may be a matter of more doubt.

Book Notices.

THE FORUM, a Quarterly Law Review, April, 1874. Baltimore. Edited by Atkinson Schaumburg, Esq.

The Bench and Bar Review of Baltimore, conforming to a suggestion made by us at the time, has changed its name to "The Forum," and the second number is before us. It is embellished with a portrait of the venerable Reverdy Johnson, and contains a brief sketch of his life. The contents of the number are as follows:

Article I. Amendments to the Federal Constitution.—The constitutional convention, its history, powers, and modes of proceeding. By Hon. John Alexander Jameson, Chicago. II. War Claims and Claims of Aliens. By Hon. Wm. Lawrence, Ohio. III. The Forum and its Chances.—The public and private life of Lord Chancellor Eldon, with selections from his correspondence. By Horace Twiss, Esq., one of her majesty's counsel. IV. The Civil Law—Its Origin, Growth and Mutations.—1st. Sources of the Roman Civil Law, by William Grapel; 2d. Compendium of Civil Law, by Ferdinand Mackeldey. By Prof. George Fred. Holmes, University of Virginia. V. Parol Evidence in Explanation of Contracts, from Albany Law Journal. VI. Valid Voluntary Settlement of a Chose in Action. VII. Reverdy Johnson. VIII. Tappan v. Merchants' National Bank of Chicago. IX. Decisions in United States, for February, March and April, 1874. X. Abstract of the English Reports, for February and March, 1874. XI. Red Tape. XII. Book Notices.—1. The Spirit of Laws; 2. The Doctor and Student; 3. A Manuel of Medical Jurisprudence; 4. Civil Liberty and Self-Government; 5. An Exposition of the Constitution of the United States; 6. Trodden Down, and Other Novels; 7 and 8. Our Exchanges. XIII. The Green Bag.

LAW OF THE DOMESTIC RELATIONS. By JAMES SCHOULER, author of the Law of Personal Property. Second edition. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1874.

This is an excellent treatise and deserves the favor it has met, having reached a second edition in about four years after the appearance of the first. The classification of subjects embraced in the general title of Domestic Relations, as treated by the author, is the same substantially as that of Kent and Reeve. Accordingly, five leading topics are considered: First, Husband and Wife; Second, Parent and Child; Third, Guardian and Ward; Fourth, Infancy: Fifth, Master and Servant.

Digitized by Google

Although the author has precedent for including in the scope of his work the relation of Master and Servant, yet it is our opinion that logically and properly it does not belong there, at least in modern times. The brief discussion given to this topic shows that the author, in reality, regarded it a foreign graft. The domestic relations sprung from the marriage relation or status, and philosophically Mr. Bingham was right in dividing, in his treatise, the subject into Infancy and Coverture.

Confessedly the most important topic is that of Husband and Wife, and accordingly the author has purposely devoted quite one-half of his work to marriage, and the effects of coverture on the powers and rights of the wife as respects herself, her husband and third persons, and growing out of this the right of the wife in equity, to separate estate, and the nature and effect of marriage settlements, both ante-nuptial and post-nuptial, and the general doctrine of separation and divorce.

We cannot in the limits of an ordinary notice follow the author into the detail of his treatment of the various topics embraced in his volume. It is written in a clear and succinct style, and the effect of the English and American adjudications is satisfactorily presented. A careful examination of the book justifies us in saying that it deserves a very high rank among recent text-books in the law, and we confidently recommend it as being, in our judgment, for an American lawyer, the best treatise on the subject now before the public.

The book is intended to exhibit the marriage status and its effects as viewed in England and in the states of this country, and is strictly a legal treatise on the Domestic Relations.

The mode of treatment is well indicated by the author, who, in concluding his introductory chapter, reminds the reader "that the office of the text-writer is to inform rather than invent; to be accurate rather than original; to chronicle the decisions of others not his own desires; to illumine paths already trodden; to criticise if need be, yet always fairly and in furtherence of the ends of justice; to analyze, classify, and arrange; from a mass of discordant material to extract all that is useful, separating the good from the bad, rejecting whatever is obsolete, searching at all times for guiding principles; and, in fine, to emblazon that long list of judicial precedents, through which our Anglo-Saxon freedom 'broadens slowly down.'"

It is quite obvious, we think, that the author entertains indulgent, if not favorable, views of the common-law doctrines concerning the effect of the marriage relation upon the wife. His treatment of these doctrines is conservative, and, as his book is intended for practicing lawyers rather than legislators, he keeps, it may be said wisely, close in sight of the coast of judicial precedents. We need not deny that in the state of society in which the common law originated, its rules in respect to the disabilities of the wife, and the property rights of the husband, may have then been wise, but they have, at all events, long since ceased to be so. It is our judgment that, as respects property, whenever or however acquired, there should be absolute equality between husband and wife. His property before marriage, should remain his, and the wife's should remain her's, and in each case be beyond the control of the other. On the death of either, their rights in respect of dower, or the equivalent substitute, should be the same. If there are no children, she should have one-half of all property of which the husband died seized, and if children, say one-third in fee. The husband to have the same rights in respect of all property of the wife. The separate property of each to be in no event liable for the separate debts of the other, but liable for family expenses.

It is our judgment, also, that most of the common law disabilities of coverture are absurd in themselves and pernicious in their operation. As to all domestic or family matters the legal relation between husband and wife should be that of absolute equality. The husband, simply as husband, should have no more right to the control of the children than the wife. But as respects the relations of the family to the outside world, a few prerogatives or superior rights must, ordinarily, be conceded to the husband. He, in general, represents the family in its legal relations to the world. On him devolves, usually, the duty of making provision for their support. In case of a conflict of views as to domicile, and in general as to matters connected with the husband's business, his will should be the law, and should prevail over the wife's. The marriage relation can, in our judgment, be more safely rested upon the basis of intelligent, equal companionship, than upon the dependent and unequal condition of the wife which the common law imposed as the result of marriage. We have perhaps already said enough on this subject. We close by adding that, although many of the modern "married women's acts" are crude, and, in some instances, unjust to the husband and to creditors, yet the necessity for them has long been seriously felt, and they mark a steady progress in the right direction. The pioneers in this line of advance in the common law countries were the equity judges of England—SOMERS, COWPER, HARDWICKE, and their successors, who, without legislative aid, constructed a system of rules which shielded the wife from the many oppressive consequences of the common law doctrines, and who in this instance anticipated the more tardy legislative relief.

We should have been glad to have seen from so competent a person as the author, more original discussions and practical suggestions; for the law of husband and wife is in a transition period—but others will prefer the work as it is, and it is, indeed, one in which much can be found to praise and little to criticise.

DIGEST OF THE DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT OF IOWA, from the organization of the court in 1839 to 35th Iowa, 1873. By THOMAS F. WITHROW, late reporter of said court and editor of American Corporation Cases, and EDWARD H. STILES, present reporter of the court. Vol. 1. Chicago: E. B. Myers. 1874.

The first volume of this long-expected work lies upon our table, and if we are indebted to the delay for its excellent qualities, the profession will overlook the disappointment which its non-appearance at an earlier day has from time to time occasioned. By reason of its comprehensive plan, and extending to date, and giving the text of statutes whenever they have been deemed essential to understand the statement of the decisions, the present work will supersede in practice the digest of Dillon, which comes down only to 1860 (7th Iowa), and Hammond, which comes down to 1866, and Lacy, a supplement which ended with 27th Iowa. The decisions between 27th and 35th Iowa have not before been digested. Lord Macaulay, speaking of Fox and Mackintosh's fitness for the work of writing their histories, says: "They had one eminent qualification for writing history—they had spoken history, acted history, lived history." The same may be said of the authors of the present Digest. Mr. Withrow was reporter to the court from 9th to 21st Iowa, inclusive, and Mr. Stiles has been the reporter from that time to the present, and we but record the verdict of all who are familiar with the Iowa Reports when we say that, perhaps, no state in the Union has had reporters in any respect more capable than these gentlemen. We do not hesitate to pronounce the present to be, in our judgment, a model digest. Whoever thinks it an easy work to prepare a good digest of judicial decisions is greatly mistaken; and the author of such a work as this, while certain not to receive full credit for the talent, skill and industry required, and to fall short of the deserved pecuniary reward, ought to receive the grateful thanks of the profession whose labors are thus made lighter and easier. When we receive the 2d volume, which will soon appear, we design to notice the work more at length. Whoever is gratified in seeing a handsome, and even elegant, law-book, will not fail to thank the enterprising publisher for the style in which he has produced this work. It is a real pleasure to look upon it.

MEMOIRS OF WESTMINSTER HALL. With an Historical Introduction by EDWARD FOSS, F. R. S., author of The Lives of the Judges of England. New York: James Cockcroft & Co. 1874.

This enterprising firm is reproducing in an elegant style some of the best quasi legal works which have appeared in Great Britain. The "Adventures of an Attorney in Search of Practice," by Samuel Warren, is followed by the "Memoirs of Westminster Hall," in two volumes. This work gives the history of this famous structure from the date of its erection in the reign of William II to the present time—a period of nearly 800 years, and presents the reader with a plan of the Hall and the Judicial Courts, and with illustrations of its interior and exterior appearance. It also contains plates showing the appearance of the lord chief justice and the lord chancellor in their robes of office, and portraits of Lord Brougham, Lord Thurlow, Lord Eldon, Lord Erskine, Lord Denman, and the famous Littleton. The rest of the work consists in a collection of historical sketches of the famous judges in law and chancery who have had seats in Westminster Hall, and incidents and anecdotes concerning them.

Digitized by Google

It is very interesting reading, not unprofitable withal, and, judging from our experience, we venture to say that whoever takes it up will not leave it until he finishes it.

Summary of Our Exchanges.

The American Law Times and Reports for July contains, besides the usual excellent digest of cases from the law journals, the amendatory bankrupt law, with an index. This was also published by us in our issue of July 2. It also contains, Dingee v. Becker, a case decided in the District Court of the city of Philadelphia, by PLAYER, J., holding that the proof of a debt in a bankrupt court does not extinguish it, and discussing the rights of a creditor who has thus proved his debt, in respect of his prior remedies, and also the right of a party who has not been before the bankrupt court, to sue the bankrupt in a state court. It also publishes the important case of Underwood v. McVeigh, to appear in 24 Grattan, which relates to the question of fraud in judicial sales. This was a painful case, in which a defendant, whose property had been libelled under the confiscation act of congress, and who had appeared by an attorney, was refused a hearing on the ground that he was "within the Confederate lines and a rebel," and his property was thereupon condemned and sold, and bought by the wife of the district judge, the latter not being ashamed in his judicial capacity to confirm the sale and direct the divestiture and investiture of title. A more questionable proceeeing does not occur in our judicial annals, and the only obligation to silence on the part of the public now is, that the grave has lately closed over the earthly remains of the judge who was guilty of it. We shall notice this case more at length hereafter. The Law Times also reports Heaton v. Fryberger (published in the Western Jurist for May), which relates to the effect of mistakes in the deed of a married woman; also Rees v. Watertown (municipal bonds) published in this journal for April 2. It also publishes a charge to the jury by District Judge LONGYEAR, in the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, upon the construction of the words, "die by his own hand" in a policy of life insurance, and which also discusses the presumptions as to death and sanity of the deceased, and the degree of derangement necessary to avoid a policy of life insurance containing a provision that the insurer shall not be liable in case of suicide. It also publishes the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in ex parte Robinson (power to disbar attorney for contempt) published in the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL for June 4.

The Western Jurist for July contains the tenth installment of an article on tax titles in Iowa. We hope these papers will be collected in a book when they are completed, as they will be of much use to those investigating such titles in other states. It also prints an elegant and readable address of Hon. John W. Campbell to the graduating class of the Albany law school, which has previously appeared in the Albany Law Journal. Also the opinion of Mr. Justice NOTT, in the case of Mrs. Lockwood in the Court of Claims, with a note from this journal; also two decisions of the Supreme Court of Iowa, which we shall notice in our Notes of Cases, next week. But the feature of the Jurist which renders it most valuable to the practitioner, and indispensible to him if he lives in Iowa, is its very full digest of the current decisions of the Supreme Court of that state; being, in the present number, forty pages in length. We shall take the liberty of selecting from these for our Notes of Cases.

The Chicago Legal News for July 4, publishes Kerr v. Smith, Superior Court of the United States, on bankruptcy, articles of separation, subsequent reconciliation, and effect of voluntary conveyance by husband to wife. Also Harris v. Hatfield, Supreme Court of Illinois, action for damages resulting from defendant's owning and having in his possession within the state of Illinois, certain Texas or Cherokee cattle, in violation of the act of April 16, 1869. Also Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. Co. v. Town of Lake, asserting the power of a town corporation to open a street through a block of land purchased and owned by a railroad company, and used for railroad purposes. Also Lull v. Chicago, same court, holding and applying the familiar doctrine that, in the ascertainment of boundaries, fixed monuments will prevail over a printed or written plat. Also Van Namee v. Bradley, same court, a case of replevin by a wife, of property which had been siezed by a sheriff, where one of the defences was that the property belonged to the husband. Also re Scammon, published in our issue of July 2. This case was furnished to the News by Mr. Bissell, the official reporter of the court, and is much fuller than that as given by us. The Legal News also publishes an opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois in Lewis v. D'Arcy, on the right of a mortgagee of (personal) property to take possession when levied on by a sheriff under an execution against the mortgager.

The American Law Record for July prints an exceedingly interesting article on "Trial by Jury, and the Public Prosecutor System in Germany," by Edward Zimmerman, LL. D., solicitor and foreign jurisconsult, from which it appears that trial by jury exists in Germany only in name, and that the jury is systematically and legally packed, and its powers so essentially curtailed that it is the mere agent and tool of despotic government. Those who talk about abolishing the jury in this country would do well to read it. As illustrating the fact that, in Germany as elsewhere, the jury is a recognized agent of liberty against despotism, we find that the German people are strongly in favor of the trial by jury, while the government is equally opposed to it. The Law Record also publishes the important case of The Newport and Cincinnati Bridge Company v. The United States, heard in the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of Ohio, before Mr. Justice SWAYNE, involving questions as to the rights of this company, which had commenced the erection of a bridge over the Ohio river upon specifications approved by congress, and which had partly completed the bridge when congress prohibited its completion except upon a different plan. The case goes to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Law Record also prints the New Jersey Pavement Case, as published in this journal with a note (ante, p. 252). Also, Lasly v. Phipps, Supreme Court of Mississippi, published in the American Law Register for April, and noticed in this journal for May 21 (ante, p. 249), the question discussed being the effect of retroactive homestead laws upon the obligation of contracts. Also the excellent observations of Dr. Hammond, of Iowa, on "Legal Education and the Present State of the Literature of the Law," published in this journal for June 11 (ante, p. 292). Also an opinion of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, in Ould & Carrington v. City of Richmond, holding that a municipal corporation may constitutionally tax lawyers as such. We shall publish or notice this case hereafter. The contrary has been decided by the Circuit Court of St. Louis County, Missouri, and by the Supreme Court of Tennessee. The Record also publishes notes of a number of interesting cases from the Supreme Court of Ohio, and Court of Appeals of Kentucky.

So far as our other exchanges, received this week, contain matters of interest, they will be noticed next week.

Legal News and Notes.

A bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in England has been defeated by a vote of 215 to 72.

—THE president has appointed General Fagin, of confederate fame, and lately commander-in-chief of the Brooks forces, United States marshal for Arkansas.

—THE appointment of judge for the western district of Arkansas, in place of Judge STORY, resigned, will not be made till next winter. In the meantime Judge CALDWELL will, under the law, hold court in that district.

—G. VAN HOOREBEKE, Esq., who recently brought to a successful termination, in the Supreme Court of Illinois, the great constitutional case known as the "Grab law case" (published in our issue of July 2), has settled in Denver, Colorado.

—MISS LAVINIA GOODELL, of Janesville, Wisconsin, has been admitted to the bar. The Chicago Legal News vouches for her as "a young lady of good education, fine appearance, modest bearing," and has no doubt that she will succeed well at the bar and receive, as she deserves, the good will and respect of her brethren in the profession.

—JUDGE T. J. MACKEY, of South Carolina, has returned to his home from a visit to Washington, where he had a conversation with the president. He says General Grant asked him sharply, "Why don't you convict Moses?" and when he replied that he could not get him into court, the president denounced the assumption that a president or a governor is above the law as monstrous.

—A CANADA barrister has placarded public places in a historic city of the Dominion with notices that he gives special attention to marine protests. Our excellent contemporary, the Canada Law Journal, questions whether he has thereby developed a purity of taste in matters professional at all worthy of imitation. This is not quite so bad as the St. Louis shyster who advertises anonymously "divorces obtained without exposure, and money advanced on lawsuits."

—OUR excellent contemporaries, the Albany Law Journal and the Canada Law Journal, are engaged in a discussion about the treatment of Dr. Kenealy, the solution of which seems to hinge on the question whether it is proper to spell judicial with a capital J, according to the latter, or whether it is proper to spell "her majesty, the queen," with small letters, according to the democratic ideas of the former. We suggest that they call in a printer's devil and let him settle it.

—THE Khedive of Egypt has, by treaty which has received the sanction of this government, agreed to establish a supreme court, which, as we understand it, shall have jurisdiction of all private controversies and criminal accusations affecting the subjects of the Christian powers assenting to the arrangement. This abolishes in the Khedive's dominions, the jurisdiction of our consuls, who have hitherto exercised jurisdiction over criminal accusations against our own citizens in that country. The court is to be composed in part of subjects of the Khedive (or of the Sultan, whichever is sovereign) and in part of foreign representatives, of which England, France, and the United States are entitled to nominate one each. The president has nominated as the American member of the court, the Hon. Victor Barringer of North Carolina.

Digitized by Google

—A. H. GIDDINGS, of Newaygo, Mich., for many years a circuit judge in that state, attempted to commit suicide in Chicago, on Wednesday, by jumping into the river off Clark street bridge. Instead of falling into the water, as was evidently his intention, he fell upon the dock below, broke his right leg and seriously injured his head. He was removed to the county hospital, where he now lies in a precarious situation. Judge GIDDINGS was a man of fine natural powers, good education, and an able lawyer, but, unfortunately, for several years he has indulged to such an extent in the use of intoxicating drinks as to be almost entirely unfitted for any kind of business. There is no doubt but at the time of this attempt on his life he was insane.—Chicago Legal News.

—WE learn from the Canada Law Journal that the number of capital convictions in the Dominion of Canada since July 1 1867 were 69, of which 42 were for murder, 20 for rape, 4 for piracy, 1 for wounding with intent to murder, 1 for stabbing with intent to murder, and 1 for levying war against the Queen. Of these, in 40 cases the sentences were commuted to different terms of imprisonment. One was pardoned. In the remaining 28 cases the sentences were carried into effect. We are struck by the unusual number of convictions for rape; and considering that this crime remains capital in the Dominion, as at common law, it is hard to account for it. We may indulge in the supposition that not even the sub-Arctic climate of the Saint Lawrence has sufficed to modify the ardent habits of the French, "that dissipated nation," as a great English poet, referring to this subject, expressively pronounced them.

—NOTWITHSTANDING our judges, both state and federal, are miserably paid, yet it may be said to their great credit, and the great credit of the bar, that the occasions have been rare where judges have incurred even the suspicion of being corrupted with money. To say that they are not often governed by preconceived bias; by the pride of individual opinion; and even at times by political prejudices, would be to say that they are more than human. But it may be said to the high honor of the bench, and of the bar which surrounds the bench and fortifies and upholds its honor and integrity, that there are few, if any, instances in our history, where judges have been convicted of receiving a direct pecuniary bribe, intended to influence their official conduct. So universal is the faith of the people in the integrity of the judiciary that we believe the occasions are extremely rare where attempts have been made through the influence of money, to tamper with the integrity of a judge. A ludicrous instance, however, of an attempt to bribe the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, has just been made public. On Wednesday morning, July 9, at the opening of the Supreme Court, Chief Justice RYAN said he had received with his mail a letter enclosing $100, which he read as follows:

"RICHFIELD, June 30, 1874.

"E. G. RYAN:

"Dear Sir:—Please du for me what you can. If I will win the case I give you a hundred dollars more. "LUDWIG HENRY ZAUN

"Richfield, Washington county, Wisconsin.

"I vot for Mr. Taylor."

The Chief Justice said he had no means of judging whether the letter was really written and signed by the party whose name appeared on it; but, on consultation with his associates, he felt it to be his duty to make the matter public, that it might be investigated. He had, therefore, requested the presence of the attorney general, and his assistant being present, he referred the letter and its contents to him for such action as should seem best. He remarked, with much feeling, that he did not know what he had ever done to subject himself to such a gross insult, and expressed his certain conviction that the attorneys for the applicant had nothing to do with the matter. Zaun is a defendant in a suit pending in that court for the possession of some land.

Notes of Cases.

Power of Towns to incur debts to defend their existence.—The Supreme Court of Massachusetts in the case of Cooledge v. Brookline, has just decided that a town in that state has no corporate duty to defend its boundaries or existence as a town before the legislature, and therefore no right to incur a debt therefor, or to tax the inhabitants to pay a debt thus incurred. The court in a valuable opinion by ENDICOTT, J. cites the following authorities: People v. Morris, 13 Wend. 325; State Bank v. Knoop, 16 How. 369, 380; Riddle v. Props. Locks and Canals, 7 Mass. 187; Warren v. Charlestown, 2 Gray, 104; Eastman v. Meredith, 35 N. H. 284; Dillion on Mun. Corp. sec. 23 and following sections; Att'y Gen. v. Norwich, 2 Myl. & Cr. 425; and it refers to the case of the Queen v. Sheffield, 6 Q. B, 652, in which it was held that the expense incurred for the benefit of the inhabitants by the mayor and aldermen of Sheffield in offering in Parliament a bill introduced in relation to a supply of water to the town cannot possibly be an expense necessarily incurred in carrying the act (6 Wm. 4 ch. 76) into execution. No duty in that respect being imposed by the act, no power to use borough fund followed.

Partition Fences.—In Bobb v. Brachman, 24 Ohio State, 3, Supreme Court of Ohio, December Term, 1873, the following points are ruled:

1. In an action brought under the act of May 3, 1859, (S. & C. 81, 648) to recover one-half the value of a partition fence, the appraisal of the township trusteees duly made, in pursuance of the provisions of the act, is, unless impeached for mistake or fraud, conclusive with respect to value, and of the fact that the fence, in character and quality, meets the requirements of the statute; but such appraisal is not evidence of any other fact.

2. The plaintiff in such action is not precluded from recovering, by the fact that the fence is a better or more expensive one than would have satisfied the requirements of the statute.

3. Nor does the fact that the fence does not conform to the boundary line between the lands of the respective parties necessarily constitute a defence to such action It is sufficient upon this point if it was constructed and maintained as and for such line fence, and was recognized and acquiesced in as such by the defendant.

Devise—Election.—In Huston v. Cone, 24 Ohio State, 11, Supreme Court of Ohio, December Term, 1863, it is held:

1. Where a will assumes to give to one of its beneficiaries property of another person for whom provision is likewise made in the will, the latter cannot take the provision made for him in the will, and also hold the property, but must elect which he will take.

2. In order to put the party to such election, it must plainly appear that it was not the intention of the testator to give him the provision made in the will in addition to the property, except where the property in question is the widow's right of dower, as to which the rule has been reversed by statutory provision.

3. A court of equity has jurisdiction to compel the party to make such election, or to abide by an election already made.

4. Such election, in order to make it binding upon the party, must be made understandingly, that is, with a knowledge of the facts, and of the party's rights under the will ———. Money Borrowed by Husband from Wife.—In the same case the following point is also ruled:

Money borrowed by the husband from the wife, and secured to her by the note of the husband, given to her at the time of receiving the money, will, after her death, and as between the husband and her estate, be regarded as an equitable claim against the husband; and, therefore, a provision in her will releasing such claim, is a provision beneficial to the husband.

Restitution of Money Collected on a Judgment which is afterwards Reversed.—Where property is sold under execution and the proceeds paid over to the execution plaintiff and the judgment in pursuance of which the execution was issued is afterwards reversed, the plaintiff may (in New York) demand restitution of the money, although an agent may have stipulated otherwise, if such stipulation amounts to an agreement, transferring the principal's property to the agent. Holloway v. Stevens, New York Supreme Court, General Term; 5 Daily Register, 147.

Release of Sureties on Tax Collector's Bond.—In Johnson v. Hacker, Law Department of Nashville Com. Reporter, June 22, the Supreme Court of Tennessee (NICHOLSON, Ch. J., delivering the opinion) rule that the giving of time to a tax collector by an act of the legislature to collect and account for his liabilities as such tax collector, operates as a release of the securities on his bond. The learned judge quotes in support of this rule from United States v. Simpson, 2 Penn. 437, and says: "The exact question involved in this case was determined in two cases in Illinois—one of Davis v. The People, 1 Gilman 409, the other The People v. McHatton, 2 Gilman, 638. In both it was held that the giving of time to a tax collector by an act of the legislature, was a release of their sureties. We concur in the correctness of these decisions, and hold that in the present case the demurrer was properly overruled." [NOTE.—We learn from a subsequent number of the same journal that a rehearing has been granted in this case. EDS.]

Agent of Common Carrier—When Risk Commences.—In Watson v. The Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company, reported in the Law Department of the Nashvill Com. Reporter, the Supreme Court of Tennessee (MCFARLAND, J. delivering the opinion), ruled:

1. A depot agent in charge of the business of receiving and forwarding freight, in the absence of special instruction, made known to the public would have the power to bind the company to receive and forward freight, and such contract may be made before the goods are actually tendered and delivered.

2. The risks of the common carrier, commences on the delivery and acceptance of the goods.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JULY 23, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION:
$8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

AMENDMENT TO BANKRUPT ACT—REDUCTION OF FEES—FEES OF CLERK OF DISTRICT COURT.—Section 18 of the amendment to the bankrupt act approved June 22, 1874, provides that after its passage "the fees, commissions, charges and allowances, excepting actual and necessary charges and allowances, of, and to be made by the officers, agents, marshals, messengers, assignees and registers in bankruptcy, shall be reduced to one-half of the fees, commissions, charges and allowances heretofore provided for or made in like cases." In re Hunt, bankrupt, it was held by the circuit judge of the 8th circuit in a case recently before him, that this reduction applied to the fees of the clerk of the district court as well as to the fees, etc., of the other officers therein mentioned for services since June 22, 1874.

TEXAS CATTLE—POWER OF STATE TO PREVENT THEIR INTRODUCTION.—A statute of Iowa prohibits the introduction into the state, at certain periods, of Texas cattle—not diseased Texas cattle, or Texas cattle with the so-called Spanish fever, but all Texas cattle. In a recent important case in the United States Circuit Court for the District of Iowa, Mr. District Judge LOVE held that an act in this broad scope was unconstitutional, as in his judgment one state cannot by statute prohibit the citizens of another state from introducing into, for sale or other purposes, what is by universal law recognized as property. The learned judge did not deny that, as a public regulation, the state could prevent the introduction of cattle diseased in fact. It is understood that his ruling will be carried for review to the supreme court; and in view of the known fact that cattle from Texas are apt to have or to be infected with a contagious disease, the question is one of some difficulty as well as of great moment.

Those who have had experience in correcting proof for the press will scarcely expect us to state that the words "Crown Law League" in our editorial on "Admissions to the Bar" in our last number, involved a printer's error. It should have read "Corn Law League." We may add that in the couplet of poetry which we quoted the printer reduced the expression "patient dint" to "patient dirt." We hasten to make this last correction, fearing that the young lawyers of Alabama will hardly feel complimented by the allusion. If Cardinal Wolsey had been an editor, the great dramatist would have made him say—

> ——"O, how wretched
> Is that poor man that hangs on printer's favors!
> There is betwixt that smile he would aspire to,
> That sweet aspect of printers, and their ruin,
> More pangs and fears than wars or women have;
> And when he falls, he falls like Lucifer,
> Never to hope again."

KANSAS MUNICIPAL SECURITIES—LATEST PHASES OF THE ADJUDICATIONS.—We publish in this number the rulings of the United States Circuit Court for Kansas, respecting municipal securities. The opinion of Mr. Justice MILLER in the principal case, asserts an important doctrine of general interest, and holds that there is no presumption in favor of the power to issue such securities, and that to constitute a good declaration it must appear on the face thereof, or by recital in the bonds made part thereof, that the bonds were issued for some authorized purpose or object. The importance of this principle is manifest, for if bonds issued by counties contain no recital, it would seem to follow that there would be no presumption in favor of their validity, and it would devolve on the holder, though he were such bona fide, and for value, to aver and show by evidence aliunde, that the bonds were issued for some purpose authorized by statute. This view has much to support it in one of the latest cases on the subject in the Supreme Court of the United States—Nashville v. Ray—in which the leading opinion was given by Mr. Justice BRADLEY, and to which it is our purpose to make, in a short time, a special reference.

Municipal Bonds—Injunction to Restrain—Submitting Several Propositions at once—Nebraska Statute Construed.

In the Union Pacific Railroad Company v. Merrick County (Nebraska), which was a bill in equity in the United States circuit court for that district, by the railroad company as the owner of a very considerable portion of the taxable property within the county of Merrick, to restrain the county commissioners from issuing $125,000 of the bonds of the county to the Midland Pacific Railroad Company pursuant to the vote of the people of the county, at an election held on the 30th day of August, 1873. The principal ground relied on by the complainant was that "the proposition or question submitted involved three distinct subjects to be passed on, and consequently the submission was illegal. First, the construction of the railroad to Lone Tree. Second, the establishment of its depot at a particular place. Third, the construction of a wagon bridge over the Platte river." In support of this position, counsel relied upon Lewis v. Bourbon County, decided by the Supreme Court of Kansas, November 15, 1873, and reported in this journal, anti, p. 16, and upon Supervisors v. Railroad Company, 21 Ill. 1873; People v. Tazewell County, 22 Ill. 147; Clark v. Hancock County, 27 Ill., 310, and McMillan v. Lee County, 3 Iowa, 311.

But the court held the case before it did not fall within the principle of those cases, as there were not three distinct propositions submitted or three separate projects sought to be aided. On the contrary only one proposition was submitted, viz.: to vote aid to the extent of $125,000 to the Midland Pacific Railway Company; but this aid was to be upon condition that the depot of the company should be located within one-fourth mile of the court-house of the county, and upon the further condition that the company would so construct its railroad bridge over the Platte river, that it might be used as a wagon bridge, and would agree that it might be so used for ten years, and to that end would keep it in repair during that period.

"These conditions," says the court, "are reasonable in themselves, and such as the county authorities might, in their judgment, require. They are conditions obviously in the in terest of the county, and if the vote would have been valid without them, we cannot see why they render it illegal. Railroad Company v. Leavenworth, 1 Dillon, C. C. 394, 398; Railroad Company v. Baltimore, 21 Md. 93; Phillips v. Albany, et al., 28 Wis. 340; Lawson v. Railroad Company, 30 Wis. 597; Rhey v. Railroad Company, 28 Penn. 261; ib. 318."

Digitized by Google

Sale of Unclaimed Packages Without Opening Them.

It is well known that express companies are in the constant habit of selling unclaimed packages which have remained in their hands uncalled for during the time provided for by contract or by law, without opening them, under the pretence that better prices are obtained where the bidders are kept ignorant of their contents. That this mode of sale, if fairly pursued, would operate as a fraud upon the owners of valuable packages in most instances, cannot be questioned. But it operates a double fraud; for it is not to be expected that dishonest agents will not find means to open the packages before the sale, and ascertain the value of their contents, and by so doing, procure the valuable packages to be bid in for a small sum, for themselves or their friends. We are not surprised, therefore, to learn that under the Pennsylvania statute (Purdon's Dig. 220) providing that express companies may, after holding unclaimed packages a certain length of time, "expose" them to sale, etc., the supreme court of that state has held that selling the packages unopened and describing the contents as unknown is a fraud upon the rights of the owner, and the company is liable for the value of the goods. The case in which this ruling is made is Adams Express Co. v. Schlesinger, 6 Legal Gazette, 191.

In delivering the opinion of the court, MERCUR, J., said: "The first and second sections of the act of 14th December, 1863. Pur. Dig. 220, pp. 6 and 7, under which the plaintiff in error proposed to sell the property authorized the company to "expose" it to sale at public auction. The fair meaning of "expose" in this statute obviously is "to exhibit," "to bring into view," "display," to "point out or show to the bystanders." Selling the trunks with the goods locked up in them, and describing the contents as unknown, withholds from the bidders all knowledge of the character or value of the contents, and clearly was not within the meaning of the law which directs the manner of sale. This manner of selling goods of any value is unjust to the owner. It is no answer for a corporation to say that by this method its sales in the aggregate produce quite as large a sum as if the articles were exposed to view. The company may not suffer, yet great injustice be done to the owner of valuable goods. There is no just reason why his goods should be sold at a sacrifice, to enable the almost worthless property of another to be sold for more than its value. Such a mode of selling is unjust to the bidders, generally they will not stand upon equal ground. The strong probability is, that the contents will be known to one or more of the agents, and all packages that are really valuable, will be struck down at low prices to some one acting in the interest of the knowing agent. In this very case, the evidence shows that the contents of the trunks were actually examined by one of the agents of the company before the sale, yet each was sold as contents unknown, for a few dollars."

Rights in Literary Property.

A motion was argued in the Supreme Court Chambers in New York, before Judge LAWRENCE, on the 26th of January last, for an injunction on behalf of Mr. Bret Harte, to restrain R. M. De Witt from publishing a book, the authorship of which was attributed to Mr. Harte. It appeared the defendant had published four chapters of a story written by Mr. Harte about ten years ago, and that the remaining ones, making up the volume, were written by some unknown person. To the whole story Mr. Bret Harte's name was prefixed, and at the end of his portion of the work appeared an explanatory note. An injunction, granted on this statement of facts, was on Friday ordered to be continued by Judge LAWRENCE.

In delivering his opinion, the learned judge said:

"I think that the plaintiff has such an interest in his name and reputation as an author as entitles him to invoke the aid of a court of equity in restraining the defendant from falsely representing that a literary production, published and sold by the defendant, is the work of the plaintiff. On the papers it seems to me that the act of the defendant is calculated to mislead the public and to induce the purchase of the work referred to in the complaint, under the impression that the same was wholly written by the plaintiff. The case seems to me to be analogous to that of a trade-mark. The principle upon which relief is granted in such cases is that the defendant shall not be permitted, by the adoption of a trade-mark which is untrue or deceptive, to sell his own goods as those of the plaintiff, thus injuring the latter and defrauding the public. Newman v. Alvord, 51 N. Y. 189. Now in this case the general public would, it seems to me, be misled, from the title-page of the book in question, into supposing that the whole of the book was the production of the plaintiff, and certain facts seem very strongly to point a conclusion that it was the design of defendant to thus mislead the public. There would have been no difficulty in printing the note, which is to be found upon page 34 of the book, upon the title-page, where it could be seen and read by everyone applying to purchase the book. The fact that the note does not appear upon the title-page, where it would be likely to be seen by the party intending to purchase, coupled with the fact that the title-page represents, or certainly conveys the impression, that the whole book was written by the plaintiff, some of whose other works are also there referred to, is pretty conclusive evidence that the defendant intended to mislead every person, who should become a purchaser of the book, into the belief that the same was the exclusive production of the plaintiff. I think it no answer to these observations to say that every one who reads the book must necessarily read the note at page 34. That note is better calculated to call the attention of the purchaser to the fact that he has been deceived than to prevent his deception. It is not likely to be read until the wrong has been done—i. e., until the book has been sold. Entertaining these views I shall direct that an order be entered continuing the injunction until the cause can be tried. Plaintiff to have $10 costs of motion."

Municipal Indebtedness in England.

The practice of contracting municipal indebtedness evidenced by bonds and payable in the future, prevails in Great Britain as well as in this country, though not to the same extent, nor for purposes so distinctly extra municipal as here. The following article from the London Pall Mall Gagette, on the subject, will interest our readers, as showing the extent of municipality debts in England, and the general purposes for which they were contracted:

Digitized by Google

"It appears from a parliamentary paper just delivered that the total amount of unliquidated loans chargeable against the county and borough authorities of England in 1872 was £33,406,000, and that the original sum borrowed was £41,907,000; therefore, £8,500,000 had been paid off. The unpaid county loans were rather less than £3,000,000; those of the boroughs amounted to £30,440,000, or more than ten times the former. The loans raised by the counties were chiefly effected for the purposes of building prisons and lunatic asylums, but minor wants have been occasionally met by loans—such as the erection of police stations, militia depots, etc. The town requirements have been naturally heavier and far more diversified than those of the rural districts. To the ordinary loans of the municipal corporations the moneys which the town councils have raised as improvement commissioners or as sanitary authorities are added. Thus, the city of Bristol, for example, whose indebtedness is stated to be £1,181,647, has it thus divided in the return: The corporation bond debts, £61,350; debt of the Bristol docks, £716,781; debt under the provisions of the Local Government Act, £323,515. The more usual period for which the counties have borrowed money are twenty and thirty years. There are numerous instances, however, of shorter terms, especially in Lancashire. The rate of interest usually ranges between 4 and 5 per cent., occasionally under 4 per cent. Middlesex, whose earliest loan within the scope of this return dates forty years back, has in all borrowed £1,008,600, and paid off rather more than one-half, or £508,000. In the boroughs, loans for twenty and thirty years, as well as for briefer terms, are common; but they are frequently contracted for fifty years, and in certain cases for one hundreds or even more. Thus Rochdale, under its Waterworks Act, has one hundred years, commencing in 1876, to pay off a loan of £196,000. Oldham took a loan in 1853 of £250,000 for gas and Waterworks, repayable in one hundred and twenty years, with 4 per cent. interest. The rate paid by the towns appears to have been about the same as in the counties. Oldham raised some money at 3 1-2 per cent., and Middlesborough is stated to be subject for some of its loans to 6 1-2 per cent. interest. In certain of these Middlesborough cases the 6 1-2 per cent. "includes interest and redemption," probably it does in all. The heaviest loans raised for a single purpose are, apparently, by Manchester, £3,000,000, for waterworks and improvements; by the city of London, £2,475,000, for Holborn Valley improvements; and by Liverpool, £2,204,000, for waterworks. Some of the moneys borrowed by the city at rates exceeding 4 per cent., the corporation, on renewal, reduced to a lower rate. Sometimes the town debts are extinguished by equal annual instalments of principal and interest; sometimes that end is provided for by the creation of a sinking fund, through a specified yearly per centage on the original loan."

The Publication of Legal Notices.

A bill has recently been in the hands of Governor Dix, of New York, establishing what is known as a "legal paper" in New York city, which was to be a medium of legal advertising, and which was to be paid $15,000 a year for publishing court calenders. We have not heard whether the governor approved it or not, but we noted the fact that the daily papers were greatly opposed to it on grounds of principle as well as of interest. It would have diminished their advertising patronage. They asserted that legal advertisements, by being published in such a paper, would be hid away from the public eye, but they did not tell us that they are already hid away by being divided between the twenty-five or thirty papers whose columns receive such advertisements in that great city. The New York Council of Political Reform, however, took the matter up and gave some show of respectability to the opposition to the bill. If anything could properly characterize the newspaper opposition to it, it would be an assertion made by the New York Evening Post that the daily papers of that city publish the court calenders gratuitously. Unless we are greatly mistaken there is no daily paper in that city which publishes full and trustworthy court-calenders, except the Daily Register, a legal journal.

Upon the subject of the sustentation of legal journals (if we might borrow a word from our Presbyterian friends) it may be observed that nearly all the weekly law journals in the United States appear to owe their support largely to legal advertising. The Chicago Legal News and Philadelphia Legal Intelligencer are conspicuous examples of this, although the former unquestionably has a great circulation. These journals carry enormous lists of legal advertisements compactly printed in fine type. If we mistake not, the Albany Law Journal, the Philadelphia Legal Gazette, and the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL are the only weekly law journals whose subsistence is not derived in part from this source. Most of the American weekly law journals have either been made mediums of legal advertising by rules of court, as in Pennsylvania, or by special statute, as in case of the Chicago Legal News. In Missouri every newspaper may be a medium for the publication of legal notices. 1 Wagn. Stat. p. 609–10, § 42; 2 Ibid. p. 1009, § 17. And it was held in Kellogg v. Carrico, 47 Mo. 157, that a paper devoted exclusively to the dissemination of legal intelligence is a "newspaper;" so that where a deed of trust provided that notice of the sale should be given in some St. Louis "newspaper," a notice in the St. Louis Legal Record and Advertiser—a daily law journal—was good. The court said: "It is not the particular kind of intelligence published that constitutes one publication a newspaper rather than another. Newspapers are devoted to the dissemination of intelligence on a great variety of subjects, such as politics, commerce, temperance, religion, and so on; and the law and legal topics and occurrences are not excluded from the range of newspaper enterprise. A paper devoted to the gathering up and dissemination of legal news among its readers, is, or at least may be, a "newspaper." We suppose the court mean that if it is something more than a mere advertising sheet or a court calender, it is a newspaper. The Missouri statute which regulates the publication of notices to non-resident defendants in the commencement of suits, is as follows: "Every order against non-resident, absent or unknown defendants, shall be published in some newspaper published in this state, which the court, judge or clerk making the order, may designate as most likely to give notice to the person to be notified; the publication shall be for four weeks, successively, the last insertion to be at least four weeks before the commencement of the term at which the defendants are required to appear." 2 Wagn. Stat. p. 1009, § 17. By the statute relating to execution sales it is provided that notice shall be given "by advertisement in some newspaper printed in the county, if there be one regularly published, weekly or daily, and if not, by at least six printed or written handbills," etc., 1 Wagn. Stat. p. 609-10, § 42. Under these statutes and the foregoing decision, there would seem to be no doubt that a law journal "weekly or daily," which is not a mere advertising sheet, may be a legal and proper medium for the publication of legal notices. It is, however, provided by a statute applicable to St. Louis county, in regard to sheriff's sales, that the sheriff of St. Louis county shall advertise all sales made by him under execution or other lawful process from the courts of said county, for twenty consecutive days previously to the day of such sale and publication. This would prohibit the sheriff of St. Louis county from advertising judicial sales in a weekly journal of any kind. The general statute above quoted, in regard to the publication of non-resident notices, appears, however, to be in force in St. Louis county as well as elsewhere throughout the state.

Digitized by Google

The advantage and proprety of concentrating all legal advertising in one journal in each county are so obvious that none except certain newspaper publishers can fail to see it. The policy of the law is, to give notice to the absent or unknown defendant, if possible; or, in case property is to be sold under judicial process, to notify the largest number of those who will be interested in purchasing. Where the legal advertising of a county is distributed among a large number of journals, neither of these objects is attained. To attain the desired object such notices ought either to be published in all, or else concentrated in one. To publish them in all is beyond the question. It would in many instances make litigation so expensive that litigants would seek their rights vi et armis, rather than in a court of justice. The only objection which could be urged to thus concentrating them in one journal is that it would savor of monopoly. To this it may be answered that the object of publishing such notices is not to feed and support newspapers, but to protect the rights and interests of litigants. While such an arrangement might very likely benefit the particular journal which should do the advertising, it would be a much greater benefit to the litigating parties; because the expense of publishing such notices, if all were published in one journal, could be greatly reduced below what is at present paid. As it is now, under the Missouri law, it is clearly a monopoly—not in a particular newspaper, but in the clerk or sheriff to whose discretion is left the distribution of these favors. If so disposed, he turns it into a matter of personal revenue by contracting with certain journals to publish these notices at prices less than allowed by law, and pocketing the surplus. There is good reason to believe that this is frequently done in this state; and that litigants, instead of having such advertising done at the lowest competing rates, are thus compelled to pay a premium to dishonest and corrupt officials.

—THE court of commissioners for the distribution of the Geneva Award will meet at Washington on the 22d inst.

—GEN. WILLIAM S. HILLYER, the last of General Grant's original staff, and a well and favorably known member of the legal profession, died in Washington on the 12th inst., of congestion of the lungs.

Bankrupt Act—Retroactive Operation of Amendment of June 22, 1874.

I. In re OBEAR AND In re THOMAS.

United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Missouri, July 8, 1874.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge.

1. Bankrupt Act—Retroactive Operation of Amendment of June 22, 1874.—While the late amendment to the bankrupt act is retrospective in its operation so as to bring within it all cases commenced since December 1, 1873, and in which at the time of the passage of said amendment (June 22, 1874), the petitions for the adjudication remained to be acted on, yet it does not annul or disturb judgments rendered or adjudications made and in force at the time of the taking effect of said amendment.

These are petitions for review under section 2 of the bankrupt act.

Facts in the case of E. G. Obear: On the 4th day of May, 1874, a creditor's petition was filed against Obear in the District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri, stating that, being a broker and trader, he did, on the 28th day of May, 1873, suspend, and did not within fourteen days, nor at any time thereafter, resume payment of his commercial paper. To an order to show cause Obear appeared on the 13th day of May and admitted the petition, and he was thereupon, on that day, by the court, adjudicated and declared a bankrupt, and subsequently, June 22d, an assignee was elected, to whom a deed of assignment was made, and was regularly proceeding in the discharge of his duties until June 30th, when the district court, on its own motion, made the following order: "It is ordered that the petitioning creditor amend his petition within thirty days so as to conform to the 12th section of the act of Congress, approved June 22d, 1874, in the following respects, to-wit:

"1st. By alleging that the number of unsecured creditors who have joined therein, constitute, at least, one-fourth in number, and that the aggregate of their debts, provable under this act, amounts to, at least, one-third of all the debts so provable.

"2d. Said amended petition shall be signed and verified by the first five signers thereof, if so many there be, in the manner and form required by said act.

"3d. The allegation in the original petition of the suspension of the debtor's commercial paper for fourteen days, shall be so amended as to aver the suspension and non-resumption thereof within a period of forty days before the filing of the original petition of his commercial paper made or passed in the course of his business as such broker or trader.

"And it is further ordered that all other proceedings in the case be stayed until said amended petition is filed."

To this order the petitioning creditor, the bankrupt and certain secured and unsecured creditors excepted; and it is to have the same reviewed that the petitioning creditor has brought the present petition.

Facts in the case of James S. Thomas: In this case a creditor's petition was filed against Thomas on the 25th day of April, 1874, duly charging as an act of bankruptcy the suspension of his commercial paper on the 15th day of November, 1873. Such proceedings were had that Thomas was regularly adjudicated a bankrupt on the 25th day of April, and his case referred to a register. Creditors met on May 30th, and resolved to proceed under section 43 of the bankrupt act, and appointed a committee of one, John G. Priest, as trustee, to whom all the property of Thomas was conveyed, and who has since then been engaged in winding up and settling the trust. On the 30th day of June the district court, on its own motion, entered an order similar to the one in Obear's case, above given, and which was excepted to in like manner, and is now here for review at the instance of the petitioning creditor, the bankrupt and other creditors.

J. B. Woodward, for Obear's creditors; Hill & Bowman, for Thomas' creditors.

Digitized by Google

No appearance contra.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—In both the cases before me the proceedings in the district court were commenced after December 1, 1873, and the adjudication of the debtors as bankrupts was made before the late act amending the bankrupt act took effect, and in neither of the cases had the estates then been fully settled.

The recent amendment to the bankrupt law makes several important changes in respect to involuntary bankruptcy, and among other changes it requires that at least one-fourth in number of the creditors, representing one-third in amount of the provable debts, shall petition for the adjudication; and the time of the suspension of the payment of commercial paper, constituting an act of bankruptcy, is extended from fourteen days to forty days, and it prescribes and limits what shall be considered such paper.

The amendatory act approved June 22d, 1874, is made retroactive in the following language:

"The provisions of this section shall apply to all cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy commenced since the 1st day of December, 1873, as well as to those commenced hereafter. And in all cases commenced since the 1st day of December, 1873, and prior to the passage of this act, as well as those commenced hereafter, the court shall, if such allegation as to the number or amount of petitioning creditors be denied by the debtor by a statement in writing to that effect, require him to file in court forthwith a full list of his creditors, with their places of residence and the sums due them respectively, and shall ascertain, upon reasonable notice to the creditors, whether one-fourth in number and one-third in amount thereof, as aforesaid, have petitioned that the debtor be adjudged a bankrupt. But if such debtor shall, on the filing of the petition, admit in writing that the requisite number and amount of creditors have petitioned, the court, if satisfied that the admission was made in good faith, shall so adjudge, which judgment shall be final, and the matter proceed without further steps on that subject. And if it shall appear that such number and amount have not so petitioned, the court shall grant reasonable time, not exceeding, in cases heretofore commenced, twenty days, and in cases hereafter commenced, ten days, within which other creditors may join in such petition. And if, at the expiration of such time so limited, the number and amount shall comply with the requirements of this section, the matter of bankruptcy may proceed; but if, at the expiration of such limited time, such number and amount shall not answer the requirements of this section, the proceedings shall be dismissed, and in cases hereafter commenced, with costs," etc.

Undoubtedly the new act is retrospective in its operation so as to bring within it all cases commenced since December 1st, and in which, at the time of its passage, the petitions for the adjudication remained to be acted on.

Without entering upon the enquiry as to the competency of Congress to annul by mere legislative declaration prior adjudications of bankruptcy, regularly made, in pursuance of laws in force at the time, and the conveyance and acts thereunder, I am of the opinion that Congress did not intend by the amendatory act to overturn or disturb adjudications then already made and in force. The arguments in support of this view are derived from the language of the amendment; from the accepted principle of construction that statutes are to have no further or greater retrospective operation than plainly appears to have been the legislative intention, and from the failure of Congress to make any provision for the necessary consequences of setting aside all adjudications in bankruptcy, and all acts done under them throughout the United States for the seven preceding months.

While the language making the law retroactive as to cases commenced since December 1st is very broad and applies to "all cases" commenced since that day and prior to the passage of the amendatory act, yet it is obvious that the purpose of Congress was to put such cases upon the footing of new cases so as to enable them to participate equally in the benefits of the new provisions. But it is implied from the nature of the proceedings and the steps that are prescribed to be taken in respect to both old and new cases, that by the language quoted, Congress contemplated pending cases in which no adjudication had yet been made. The law requires the adjudication to be made upon the petition of creditors, and as amended, requires a given proportion of the creditors to concur, and limits the time within which, both as to old and new cases, the requisite number and amount must join in the petition. The court determines whether the requisite number and amount have or have not petitioned—if they have, the matter proceeds and the adjudication will or will not be made, depending upon whether the alleged acts of bankruptcy are or are not established. On the other hand, if the statutory requirement as to the number and amount of creditors is not met, the provision is that the proceedings shall be dismissed. All this clearly shows that Congress had in contemplation cases in which no adjudication had been made, for these steps are all preparatory to an adjudication, and this view is further confirmed by the provisions of section 13 amending section 40 of the original act.

Besides, it is impossible to suppose that Congress overlooked the fact that throughout the United States, between December and June, there were many hundred cases in bankruptcy in which adjudications had been made and which were in various stages of progress, some in which little had been done, others in which property had been sold, suits decided, and dividends made, but which were not yet entirely closed. If it had been intended by Congress to annul all that had been done under the bankrupt act since the first day of December, overturning adjudications, and disturbing settlements, payments, dividends, conveyances, etc., it is quite incredible that provisions would not have been made for this extraordinary and confused state of affairs. The amendatory act is silent as to the rights and remedies of the various parties who would be affected by legislation having this grave and extensive retrospective operation. The argument, then, is a strong one that no such consequences were intended; and the more so since the retroactive provisions may have full effect given them by holding them as intended to apply to all cases commenced since the 1st day of December which had not progressed to an adjudication at the passage of the amendatory act.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the orders of the district court in each of the cases under review were erroneous, and they are accordingly reversed. These orders were purposely made as they were, not as necessarily embodying the opinion of the district court, but that they might present for review cases which would measure the scope of the retroactive operation of the amendatory act. And what I hold is that it does not affect decrees or adjudications then made, while conceding that its remedial provisions do in many respects apply to cases brought since December 1st, and which were pending when it went into operation.

ORDERS REVERSED.

II. In re ANGELL.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Michigan, July 9, 1874.

Before LONGYEAR, District Judge.

1. Bankrupt Act of 1874—Retroactive Provisions.—The provisions of § 12 of the Amendatory Bankrupt Act of 1874, which relate to the number and value of petitioning creditors apply only to cases where the petition for adjudication is still pending, and not to cases in which adjudications had passed upon the petition before the approval of the act.

This was on the motion of the bankrupt to dismiss the proceedings unless the petitioning creditor shall procure other creditors to join with him in the petition for adjudication, so that at least one-fourth in number of all the creditors, and whose aggregate debts shall amount to at least one-third of the debts provable, etc., as required by the act of Congress approved June 22, 1874, entitled

Digitized by Google

"An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy,'" etc.

The case is one of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy. The petition for adjudication was filed on the 28th day of May, 1874, by a single creditor; and, having been filed before the recent act, it of course contains no allegation as to number and amount of creditors and debts; and it is conceded that the number and amount are less than one-fourth and one-third, as required in those respects by said act. The debtor failed to appear, and on the 8th day of June, 1874, the return day of the order to show cause, he was duly adjudicated a bankrupt, and the usual warrant was at once issued and was executed. All of which proceedings took place, as will be observed, after the first day of December, 1873, and before the recent act.

No objection, whatever, is taken, nor does any exist to the sufficiency of the petition to the jurisdiction of the court, or to the regularity of the proceedings, as the law then was; and it is fully conceded that but for the said act of June 22, 1874, the proceedings and adjudication are unimpeachable.

The provisions of the act upon which this motion is founded are contained in section 39 of the original act as amended and re-enacted, being section 12 of the amendatory act, and they are as follows (the portions here involved being in italics):

"Section 39. That any person residing and owing debts as aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, shall" (commit certain specific acts), "shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed, shall be adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one or more of his creditors, who shall constitute one-fourth thereof, at least, in number, and the aggregate of whose debts, provable under this act, amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable: Provided, that such petition is brought within six months after such act of bankruptcy shall have been committed. And the provisions of this section shall apply to all cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy commenced since the first day of December, 1873, and prior to the passage of this act, as well as to those commenced hereafter," etc.

LONGYEAR, J.—That the provisions of the recent act requiring one-fourth in number and one-third in amount of the creditors to join in an involuntary petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, were intended to apply, and can and must be applied to all cases commenced between December 1, 1873, and the passage of that act, in which there has been no adjudication, I entertain no doubt; and it has been so held by the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois. In re Scammon, 6 Chi. Leg. N. 328; 1 Cent. Law J. 328. But the question here goes beyond that. It is whether those provisions were intended to apply, and can be applied, to cases so commenced, which had passed into judgment before the passage of the act.

The act cannot be given the application and effect contended for, because it involves the vacating and annulling the judgment of the court, and granting a new trial. No rule of constitutional law is better settled than that, in a constitutional government, with a division of powers, like that of the United States, no legislative enactment can have the effect and operation to annul the judgment of a court already rendered, or grant a new trial, especially as it respects adjudications upon the private rights of parties. "When they have passed into judgment," says Justice NELSON, in State v. Wheeling Bridge Company, cited below, "the right becomes absolute, and it is the duty of the court to enforce it." (Cooley's Const. Lim. 93-95 and cases cited; The State v. The Wheeling, etc., Bridge Company, 18 How. 421, 431; and see also the dissenting opinions of Justices MCLEAN, GRIER and WAYNE, at pages 437, 449; Mason v. White, decided by the Supreme Court of Michigan at the January term of 1874, not yet reported.)

Courts will not presume that Congress intended to exceed its powers, or in any manner to invade the domain of the judiciary, unless such intent is clearly expressed by the words used, or by necessary implication. The words used in a statute may be broad enough, and they probably are in the statute under consideration, to admit of such a construction; but the courts will in no case give them a construction that involves the exercise of an excess of power, where, by a more limited application of them, such exercise of power is not involved.

In the present instance the enactment in question is given full effect, and in my opinion all the effect Congress intended it should have, by applying and limiting it to cases still pending, and undisposed of by adjudication. It is abundantly evident that Congress did not intend these provisions to apply to cases already adjudicated, for the following reasons:

1. It was not in their power to do so, as already shown.

2. They did not so expressly enact.

3. The provisions can have full and consistent effect without giving them such application.

4. They made no provision for the saving of rights accrued or acts done under adjudications in cases where the proceedings might, under the provisions in question, eventually fail and be dismissed. And this has still greater force from the further fact that they did make such saving provision in case of a discontinuance of proceedings as provided by section 14. Other reasons will readily suggest themselves, but the foregoing I consider conclusive.

I hold, therefore, that the provisions in question apply only to cases where the petition for adjudication is still pending, and not to cases in which adjudications had passed upon the petition before the approval of the act.

It results that the motion must be denied.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

NOTE.—The retroactive clauses of the late amendment to the bankrupt act have already, in several instances, come before the federal courts for construction and application. Recently we published the decision of Judge BLODGETT (in re Scammon, ante, p. 328), in which, however, there had been no adjudication.

Judge HOPKINS, of the United States District Court for the Western District of Wisconsin, in the case of Raffaux, bankrupt, decided on the 9th inst. held that the amendment did not disturb adjudications already made. The facts upon which the question arose were these:

The bankrupt has filed affidavit showing that the requisite number of his creditors did not petition for his adjudication according to the 12th section of the recent act amendatory of the bankrupt law, and moves that the proceedings be dismissed unless a sufficient number join in the petition within the time prescribed in said act. The petition was filed against the bankrupt in this case on the 5th day of February, 1874, and an order was made requiring him to show cause, on the 16th day of February, why he should not be adjudged a bankrupt, which was duly served upon him. On the 16th of February he was adjudged bankrupt by default, and a warrant issued to a messenger in due form, upon which his property was served, and his creditors notified of the first meeting before the register to elect an assignee. On the day fixed an assignee was duly chosen by the creditors, who then and there accepted, qualified and proceeded in the execution of his trust, under the assignment. He was pursuing his duties as such assignee when the amendatory act above mentioned was passed. The question raised by this motion is whether the amendatory act applies to cases in the advanced condition this was when the act took effect.

The conclusion of the learned judge was expressed by him in the following language: "My conclusions upon the case here presented are, that it is not necessary to amend the petition, where there had been an adjudication before the amendment took effect; that the provisions of the amendment in regard to the number and amount of the petitioning creditors do not apply to such cases; but on the contrary, hold that the judgment of adjudication based upon a petition conforming to the provision of the law in force when made, is valid, and as binding upon the debtor and his creditors as if the amended act had not been passed; that the adjudication removes the case beyond the domain of legislative control. The motion of the bankrupt is denied."

In The Matter of Rosenthal, bankrupt, before the Judge of the United States District Court for the Western Districts of Missouri, presented the following questions as stated in the opinion of Judge KREKEL: "Can a bankrupt by a mere protest made to the assignee, alleging want of jurisdiction in the court, in a case commenced since the 1st of December, 1874, and prior to the late amendments of the bankrupt law, stop the declaring of a dividend which could legally be declared under the law prior to the amendments?" The court very properly held in the negative, and in the course of its opinion remarked:

Digitized by Google

"All parties, debtor as well as creditors, may be willing that the proceedings pending shall go on to final settlement. It would require a very plain provision of law to show that Congress intended to arrest and oust the court of the jurisdiction of a case which had been commenced and prosecuted under existing laws and progressed to the satisfaction of all parties."

County Bonds—Power to Issue Coupons—Mode of Signing—Sufficiency of Declaration.

NATHANIEL THAYER v. MONTGOMERY COUNTY.

United States Circuit Court, District of Kansas, June Term 1874.

Before Mr. Justice MILLER.

1. If the bonds to which coupons are annexed are properly signed and sealed by the officers of the county, it is no defence to an action on the coupons that they are signed by only one of the county officers.

2. A declaration upon county bonds should shew by averment, or by recital in the bonds made part thereof, that the bonds were issued for some authorized purpose or object. This principle applied, and the declaration held sufficient.

3. Bridge bonds—construction of local statute respecting; Kansas Municipal Bond Registration Act construed; Kansas Municipal Bond Curative Act construed; election and conditions precedent to issue of bonds—see cases in note.

Action on coupons on county bonds. The bonds in suit are in the usual form, signed by the chairman of the board of county commissioners, attested by the clerk and are under the seal of the county. They are payable to the "Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company, or bearer," and contain the following recital: "This bond is executed and issued under the provisions of and in conformity to the laws of the state of Kansas, and in pursuance of the vote of a majority of the electors of Montgomery county, of June 21, 1870."

The petition set out the bond and coupons in suit in full, but did not contain any express averment of the purpose for which the county issued the bonds, and such purpose did not appear otherwise than on the face of the bonds. The coupons were signed only by the county clerk.

Demurer to petition on three grounds:

1. That the county clerk had no authority to sign coupons.

2. That it does not appear that the vote was by the qualified electors of the county.

3. That the authority or right of the county to issue the bonds in suit is not averred, and does not appear on the face of the bonds.

N. T. Stevens, for plantiff; Clark, Gamble & Shannon, for the county.

Mr. Justice MILLER, orally overruling the demurrer, said in substance:

I. As to the first ground of demurrer: The bond itself being duly signed and sealed by the proper officers of the county, and the coupons being part of the bond, it is no defence to the coupons that they are not signed by the chairman of the board as well as by the clerk.

II. The omission in the recital of the bond of the word "qualified," in describing the electors is immaterial. The electors are the qualified electors.

III. The third ground of demurrer presents to my mind a more serious question. It is that an authorized, lawful purpose for which the bonds were issued should be alleged in the declaration or be recited on the bonds, which are made part thereof. This, I think, is a sound proposition. The power of counties to issue bonds is not inherent or general. They are authorized to issue bonds or negotiable paper, only for limited or specific objects or purposes and hence it should appear by averment in the petition or by recital in the bonds that they were issued for one of these specified purposes.

I should have preferred that the petition here should have alleged that these bonds in suit were issued by the county in payment for stock subscribed by it in the railroad company, but I must pass upon the sufficiency of the petition as it stands. The petition sets out the bond in full, and although my conviction is not strong and clear, yet, taking a somewhat liberal view of the bonds, I think it can be gathered from them that they were issued under the statute of the state, by the county, to aid corporation payee in the construction of its road. In this view, I incline to hold, though with some hesitation, that the petition is good.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

NOTE.—We append in the form of a note other rulings of the Circuit Court for the District of Kansas, at the June term, 1874.

Coler v. Wyandott County.

Bridge Bonds—Local Statute—Election.—Action on bridge bonds issued by the county, reciting that they were issued under the internal improvement act of 1866, as amended in 1871. Special plea that the bridge for which the bonds were issued cost more than $1,000, and that the question of incurring the debt was not submitted to the voters at a general election, of which the plaintiff had notice. This plea was based upon section 13 of the act in respect of bridges, of 1867. It was urged in support of this plea that the act last mentioned was an implied repeal of the internal improvement act of 1866, as to bridges. But the court (MILLER and DILLON, JJ.) decided otherwise, holding that the bridge act of 1867 contemplated the case where bridges were to be paid for out of the county treasury, from the ordinary revenue, and that the internal improvement act of 1866, as amended in 1867 and 1871, contemplated the case of bridges to be paid for by the issue and sale of bonds, and that the vote under the last named act need not necessarily be at a general election, as the act provides that it may be at such time and place as the county commissioners may order.

Grant & Smith, for the plaintiff; Wheat & Cook, for the county.

January v. Johnson County.

Registration Act—Municipal Securities.—Before Mr. Justice MILLER. The act of the State of Kansas of March 2, 1872, providing for the registration of municipal and county bonds, is not a curative act in the sense that it takes away any valid defence which the city or county would otherwise have to bonds theretofore issued.

Grant & Smith, for the plaintiff; Mr. Cobb, for the county.

Thayer v. Johnson County.

Election—Condition Precedent—Curative Act.—The bonds in question were issued to the Kansas and Neosho Valley R. R. Co., or bearer, part dated in September, 1867, and the rest in June, 1868. There is no recital in the bond, except that it purports to be a "stock bond," and states that it is issued "by order of the board of commissioners of the county of Johnson." They are signed by the chairman of the board, attested by the clerk, and are under the seal of the county.

The present questions arose on demurrer to several special pleas in the answer. The general nature of these pleas appear in the opinion.

Pratt & Ferry and C. W. Blair, for the plaintiff; Cobb & Cook, for the defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge:—I am of the opinion that the second count of the answer is insufficient. It does not deny that the plaintiff is a holder of the bonds in suit for value without notice. Part of the bonds were issued after the curative act of February 25, 1868 (Gen. Stats. of Kansas, 1868, p. 892.) This act, it seem to me, validates bonds thereafter issued as against the two objections urged against them, one of which is that the particular railroad company, to which the subscription was to be made was not named in the order of submission, and the other, that the line of the road was not located through the county prior to the election. If the bonds issued in June 1868, under the order and vote of 1865, are valid by reason of the curative act of February 25, 1868, I am inclined to think the bonds issued in 1867, under the same order and vote, are also made valid. But, however this may be, the plaintiff, as a presumed bona fide holder, may, under the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, recover, as against the matters pleaded in the second count of the answer, no notice thereof to plaintiff being charged in this count.

The third count is like the second except that it charges notice to the plaintiff of the order of submission, and denies that the plaintiff is a holder for value. Under the statute under which the vote in question was taken the supreme court of the state has decided "that some corporation must be named [in the order for the vote] as the recipient of the subscription and bonds, or the proceeding will be without warrant of law and void." Lewis v. Commissioner, of Bourbon County (1 CENT. LAW JOUR. 16.) As the plea in question alleges notice to the plaintiff of this order, it would, if this view be correct, and if the doctrine of the state supreme court were followed by this court, be a good defence. But as to the bonds issued since the curative act, and, as it seems to me as to those issued before the same, they are validated by this act.

Digitized by Google

As the fourth plea does not charge notice to the plaintiff that the bonds were issued without any subscription having been made or stock received, it sets up no defence available against an innocent holder of the bonds for value.

The 6th and 7th pleas set up, the one the failure of consideration, and the other, the want of consideration, for the bonds in question, with notice to the the plaintiffs. These constitute good defences. Under the statutes of Kansas, bonds can be issued only in payment for stock, and no statute has been cited under which, as I think, the transaction of June 19, 1868, can be upheld. Sound policy requires that local and municipal officers be kept within the limits of their powers.

The result is that the demurrer to the second, third and fourth counts of the answer is sustained—as to sixth and seventh counts, overruled.

Book Notices.

LIVES OF THE LORD CHANCELLORS OF ENGLAND. By Lord CAMPBELL. New edition, edited by John Allan Mallory, of the New York bar. New York: James Cockcroft & Co. 1874. St. Louis: Soule, Thomas & Wentworth.

This beautiful and illustrated edition of this famous work leaves nothing to be desired, and affords almost nothing to be criticised. It is produced with the same taste that marks the publications of the house of Cockcroft & Co., and at a price much less than the English editions can be had for, which are no better.

We forbear any extended notice of a work so well known, both in Great Britain and in this country. It has done more to make Lord Campbell known to the world than all the labors of his long life as an active lawyer, who held, in the course of his career, successively the places of solicitor-general, attorney-general, member of parliament, lord chancellor of Ireland, chief justice of the Queen's bench, from which in 1859 he retired, when he was appointed by Lord Palmerston lord chancellor of England, in the possession of which office he died in London, in 1861, at the advanced age of 80 years. The Lives of the Lord Chancellors was first published in 1846, and such has been its popularity that it has gone through several editions in England, and been several times reprinted in this country. About five years before the death of its illustrious author the whole work was carefully revised by him, and in submitting the new edition to the public in 1856, he declared that it was "in as perfect a state as I can ever hope that it may attain." This edition is reprinted from that, and contains a variety of illustrations, adding to the beauty and value of the work. The work has some well-known faults, but they are of minor consequence, and it will, perhaps, ever remain the work on this subject, combining as it does all the charm of biography with the instruction of history, and tracing in connection with the lives of the chancellors the growth and development of English law and English institutions.

THE LAW OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS. By JOHN F. DILLON, LL. D. Second edition, revised and enlarged. 2 vols. New York: James Cockcroft & Co. 1873.

The second edition of this work is thus noticed by the Albany Law Journal, March 14, 1874:

"It is not often that law books are composed in a manner so faithful and satisfactory as the work of Judge DILLON on municipal corporations. For eight years the work grew with the author; it was a part of his legal life; he infused into it loving care and intellectual pride, and thus it became the product of the author's genius, ability and desires. The field in which Judge DILLON labored was essentially a new one in legal literature, although the materials for a work of the kind had been long accumulating, and had become abundant. But no complete treatise on the subject of municipal corporations had appeared in America before the work of Judge DILLON; and the English treatises upon the same subject were substantially inapplicable, in many respects, to our institutions. The American municipal corporation is really a growth of our own institutions, and has little in common with the municipality of Great Britain; consequently, the law of England, upon subjects coming under this genera head, needs considerable modification to render it applicable to our institutions. In fact, the law of municipal corporations in America is a peculiar system—a jurisprudence almost sui generis; and we might as well first as last, make up our minds to base that jurisprudence upon the deep foundations of the nature and spirit of our institutions. The functions of American municipal corporations are far more varied and extensive than those of European municipalities. The duties, liabilities and powers of municipalities in this country are not specifically and particularly defined. Much is involved in obscure and general language, which often requires the most subtle reasoning and analysis to limit and define. The American municipality is, in fact, a quasi government, possessing nearly all the functions of a general government. These functions being delegated by the state governments, questions are continually arising as to the extent of power delegated, the power reserved, the concurrence of powers, the duty and liability of municipalities under their delegated functions. To construct from the great mass of decisions, upon these and kindred questions, a clear and well-reasoned work, has been the endeavor of Judge DILLON. The task was not without manifest difficulties; but the author, in connection with his judicial duties, so far overcame these difficulties as to bring out, in 1872, a complete work of 800 pages upon Municipal Corporations. The comparative novelty of the work, its great usefulness and wide-spread application, combined with the ability and learning with which it had been prepared, made its advent into the libraries of the profession and into the courts almost a legal ovation. From the very first it received the highest judicial and professional encomiums, and none were found to offer adverse criticism. The favor which the first edition received was such that it was soon exhausted, and the author has prepared a second and revised edition. The first edition was contained in one volume; but the second edition contains 200 pages of additional matter, and the work is, therefore, divided into two volumes of about 500 pages each. The author reiterates the fact that he has done all the work himself, and has not committed the preparation of the text or notes to others. No one who has examined the work would have supposed that any part of it had been entrusted to to any less competent hands than his own. The whole work is singularly uniform in ability and care, and everywhere shows marks of patient and faithful endeavor on the part of the author. In the second edition the general arrangement is not altered, but the recent cases are incorporated. The principal changes are made under the heads of "Municipal Securities," "Taxes," and "Assessments." The large number of recent decisions on negotiable bonds of municipalities are embodied in the revised work. The success which has attended the publication of this work on "The Law of Municipal Corporations," is a striking instance of the appreciation of the profession for law books prepared with zeal, care, research and ability. Judge DILLON has, as yet, furnished no grander monument of his genius than the present treatise. It is, indeed, monumentum perennius ære.

Summary of Our Exchanges.

—THE Daily Register for several days past has been publishing the opinion of Surrogate HUTCHINGS in the Rollwagen Will case, which has attracted considerable public attention. It contains little else of general interest.

—THE Southern Law Review for July contains an unusual number of interesting articles. Chancellor Cooper contributes another paper on Modern Theories of Government. E. S. Hammond, Esq., of Memphis, contributes a very interesting and instructive paper, criticising the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of Tennessee in Click v. Burris, Knoxville, Term, 1871, that in chancery sales when it appears that an increase bid of ten per cent. has been offered, the biddings will be re-opened. The rule of the Supreme Court of Tennessee is handled without gloves, and reasons are adduced against reviving a pernicious practice which has been abolished by statute, even in England, which the learned court which has so recently legislated it into existence in Tennessee will hardly be able to refute. The Right to Disinherit without Cause, is discussed in a short paper by Judge Bliss, of Columbia, Mo., formerly one of the judges of the Supreme Court of this State. Edmund S. Mallony, Esq., of Jackson, Tenn., contributes a somewhat exhaustive paper on the Wife's Separate Estate. As the law on this subject has been thrown into confusion by recent decisions in Tennessee, and is in a transition state in most of the states of the Union, discussion of the question is well-timed and appropriate. M. F. Taylor, Esq., of St. Louis, criticises severely the "Slaughter-House Cases," 16 Wallace, 36. Free discussion of judicial decisions of this kind is good. There is no court so exalted but that it may possibly be benefited by it. A second paper on The Privilege Tax is furnished by J. S. Wiltse, Esq., of Chattanooga, Tenn. The next paper is entitled The Rule of Private International Law as to Sales made where Lawful, when the Goods sold are to be removed for Re Sale where Unlawful. It is from the pen of Simon Obermeyer, Esq., of the St. Louis bar. Mr. Obermeyer states the question which he discusses as follows: "A. is domiciled in Missouri. B. is domiciled in Massachusetts. In the former state there is no statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors. Under the statutes of Massachusetts, the sale of such liquors, except for certain specified purposes, is unlawful. A. is a wholesale dealer in liquors, and sells to B. a bill of his goods. B. takes the goods to Massachusetts, and re-sells them in violation of the laws of his state. B. fails to pay A. the price of the liquors, and A. sues him in the courts of Massachusetts. Can the plaintiff recover? What is the remedy of the vendor in the forum of the vendee? Our subject invites us to the discussion of this question." And Mr. Obermeyer discusses it at considerable length, collecting an unusual number of authorities, which his access to the St. Louis bar library enabled him to do. Edward Mc Crady, Jr., Esq., of Charleston, South Carolina, discusses in a brief paper the subject of Private Communications to Judges, in which he denounces in severe terms, the practices of communicating privately with judges, in regard to causes pending in court. "The People" is a paper by William O. Bateman, Esq., of St. Louis, discussing the nature of sovereign power in popular governments, and the relation of the people to their constituted governments. A valuable paper on the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Federal Constitution is contributed by D. D. Shelby, Esq., of Huntsville, Ala. The Philosophy of Punishment is considered by Horace Chilton, Esq., of Tyler, Texas. The Review also contains a digest of the English Law Reports for February, March and April; a digest of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and a select digest of State Reports. It also publishes an exhaustive opinion of Hon. JOHN R. FLIPPIN, of the Criminal Court of Shelby county, Tennessee, in State v. Miller, on the disqualification of jurors in criminal cases, on account of impressions or opinions formed from reading newspaper accounts of the facts of the case. Also an opinion of Chancellor COOPER, in which he considers the effect of voluntary settlements with reference to the rights of existing creditors, and holds that such settlements are not void per se. Also an opinion of the Virginia Court of Appeals, in Rollo v. Andes Insurance Co., holding that bonds deposited with the treasurer of the state by a foreign insurance company, under the laws of the state, cannot be attached by garnishment at the suit of a foreign creditor of the insurance company. The Review also publishes an argument of John Reid, Esq., of counsel for the defendants, and representing the depositors, in the case of The State of Tennessee v. Samuel Watson, trustee of the State Bank of Tennessee, et al., delivered before the Supreme Court of the United States at its last term. The case involves the legality of bank notes issued in aid of the late Confederacy. Mr. Reid being for the depositors, is, of course, against the note-holders, and argues that the notes are tainted with illegality, and hence invalid.

Digitized by Google

—THE American Law Review for July, contains three valuable papers—one by Mr. Bigelow, of Boston, being an enlargement of a note from his forthcoming work on the Law of Torts, entitled Fraudulent Representations by Agents. Another (anonymous), on The Three Degrees of Negligence; and another on Testamentary Powers of Sale. The rest of this number is taken up with a digest of English and American Reports, Book Notices, Summary of Events, and an Index and Table of Cases, to accompany Volume VIII.

—THE Chicago Legal News for July 18, publishes an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, by HUNT, J., in Habich v. Folger, holding that the judgment under consideration by the court was binding upon the corporation and the receivers, and in case of suit brought by either of them against the trustees, would be an indisputable bar to their right of recovery in any State in the Union. This is one of those cases which, to be understood, the opinion must be supplemented with a statement of the facts. As this is not done, it is unintelligible. The News also publishes the opinion of federal district judge HOPKINS, of the Western District of Wisconsin, in the case of Raffaux, a bankrupt, and credits it to judge LONGYEAR, of the Eastern District of Michigan. We notice this opinion elsewhere in this number. The News also publishes judge LONGYEAR'S opinion in re Angell, published by us elsewhere in this number. Also the opinion of DILLON, J., in Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Merrick Co., which we notice editorially in this number. Also the opinion of judge KREKEL, in re Lowenthal, which we notice elsewhere in this number. Also an opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, by CRAIG, J., in Le Moyne v. Quimby, holding that a creditor who has his claim against a deceased person's estate, allowed in the county court, has no right to file a bill to remove a cloud from the title to the land of the deceased, or to settle conflicting interests of the several owners; that the allowance of a claim of a creditor against the estate of a deceased person, only establishes the debt of the creditor. It differs materially from a judgment. The Legal News says: "If it is intended to announce in this opinion that a creditor who has a claim allowed in the county court, against the estate of an insolvent intestate, cannot file a bill to remove clouds from the real estate of such deceased intestate, and to have the real estate sold for the purpose of paying his own and the other claims against the estate, then we do not think it is in harmony with the former opinions of the court." The Legal News says that the Supreme Court of Illinois, in several cases, have said that, ordinarily, an execution must issue on a judgment, and be returned unsatisfied, before a court of equity will entertain a bill to reach real estate, in which the judgment debtor has not such an interest as can be sold on execution; but in proceedings against intestate estates, which are insolvent, a resort to equity may be had without this preliminary step, since, by our statute, an execution cannot issue upon a judgment against an administrator; that in such a case the administrator must be made a party defendant to the suit. See Mc Dowell v. Cochran, 11 Ill. 33; Street et al. v. Hoagland et al., 39 Ill. 265; Bay v. Cook, 21 Ill. 336. The Legal News also publishes an opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois by SCHOLFIELD, J., in Hallida v. Hunt, holding that the Illinois patent law of 1869 is unconstitutional. Judge DAVIS, in the United States Circuit Court for the district of Indiana, in ex parte Robinson, reported in 2 Chicago Legal News, 297, held that the law passed by the egislature of Indiana to regulate the sale of patent rights was void; that property exists in inventions by virtue of the laws of Congress, and no state has the right to interfere with its enjoyment or to annex conditions to the grant. Unless we are mistaken the precise question was before the Supreme Court of Ohio and was decided otherwise some years ago.

The Legal News also publishes an opinion of the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of Ohio, by WELKER, J., in Commercial Bank of Cleveland v. Simmons, holding that the right of a national bank to sue in the federal courts is not controlled by the judiciary act, and that a national bank has the right to bring suit in the United States circuit court of the district where it is located, upon a note endorsed to it by the payee, who is also a citizen of the state, and a resident of the district.

—The Albany Law Journal for July 18 contains a very intelligent discussion of the question, Can a Judge Direct a Verdict of Guilty?—the occasion of which is the remarkable ruling of Mr. Justice HUNT of the Supreme Court of the United States, sitting at nisi prius, in the Northern District of New York, in the case of The United States v. Susan B. Anthony et al., in which the learned justice refused to poll the jury, but directed a verdict of guilty to be entered by the clerk. This ruling, it will be remembered, was strongly censured by the house judiciary committee, and also by Senator Carpenter, of the senate judiciary committee. We select the following sentences as embodying the opinion of the editor of the Albany Law Journal on the ruling in question. "In effect, Miss Anthony had no trial by jury. She had only a trial by Judge HUNT. This is not what the constitution guarantees her. We think this is so, irrespective of the question of intent. She cannot be pronounced guilty until a jury have so found her, as the result of their opinion, and not merely as the result of the judge's opinion." The Albany Law Journal also contains a selection from the Solicitor's Journal, on Warranty of Care, and another on Exoneration from Performance of a Contract by Default of the other Contracting Party. It also publishes The Oregon Steam Navigation Company v. Winsor, on Contracts in Restraint of Trade, published in the last number of this journal; and also an opinion by Mr. Justice CLIFFORD in the Supreme Court of the United States, holding that a maratime lien for advances, gives the person making the advances an insurable interes in the vessel.

—The Chicago Railway Review (by the way, an excellent and well-conducted journal in its line) discusses the effect of the recent decision of DAVIS and DRUMMOND, JJ., on the Potter Railroad Law of Wisconsin, and collates a number of articles from other journals on the subject. It also publishes a long decision of the Supreme Court of Indiana on the rights of passengers and railway companies under 1000-mile tickets. We regret that this was printed without a syllabus. We shall, perhaps, find space to reprint or notice it hereafter.

Legal News and Notes.

—HON. GEO. H. BROWN, who was recently elected chief justice of Rhode Island, has declined that position.

—WASHINGTON city is becoming celebrated as a divorce market. Judge WYLIE, of the District Supreme Court, has recently been untying them at the rate of three or four a day.

—AT adjudicature of prizes at University College, London, on Wednesday, June 24th, both the first and second prizes in jurisprudence were awarded to young ladies. The lady who took the first prize achieved a like success two years ago in political economy, and the London Athenæum (July 27th) uses these facts as an argument for the proposed admissions of females to all the classes in that university, and to degrees in the arts and in law.

Digitized by Google

—It is common enough for wives to apply to the courts and get divorces in cases of cruel treatment by their husbands, but rarely is an application made by a husband for divorce on the ground of cruel treatment by a wife. Such a case came up, however, before Judge Westbrook in the supreme court yesterday. Jules D. Meyer, the complainant, charged his wife, Helen D. Meyer, with cruel and inhuman treatment, and so satisfied was the judge with the truth and gravity of the complaint that he granted the divorce, though, as he said, with great hesitation and reluctantly. There is, then, after all, law for the man as well as for the woman when the case is clear. —New York Herald, July 7.

—The frequent occurrence of railroad accidents, occasioned by some fault or negligence of the employees of the road, and the failure to fasten the responsibility upon the proper party, has caused coroner's juries to attempt to fix the blame directly upon the company, where it generally belongs. In a late English case of a woman killed by a railroad collision, the jury very sensibly rendered a verdict that the death "was caused by the imperfect and reckless mode of working the line, and the employment of inexperienced men at low wages." There is a wise suggestion contained in this verdict. Skilled men cannot be employed at low wages, and any attempt to manage a road by unskilled employees is risking the lives of the lpassengers to save a few dollars salary, and should meet with prompt public censure. It is not a place for the practice of economy.—Washington Cronicle.

—We learn from the Albany Law Journal that at a recent term of the Superior Court of Massachusetts, held at Springfield, the case of George H. Knapp, against whom charges had been preferred by the bar association, was called. Mr. Knapp did not appear in person or by counsel. A. L. Soule, appointed to conduct the hearing, called several witnesses whose testimony showed that Mr. Knapp had collected claims and kept the money, had prosecuted claims previously settled, had often been grossly intoxicated, and in other ways, had conducted himself in an unbecoming manner. Judge Aldrich reviewed the testimony at some length, spoke of his personal relations with Mr. Knapp, and decreed Mr. Knapp's removal from the bar.

—One of the most striking instances of speedy justice, of which there is any example in countries where the rights of accused persons are respected, is thus related in a telegram from Hartford, Conn., July 9. We do not vouch for its truth: "This morning, about half past seven o'clock, James McCabe broke into the jewelry store of W. M. Beaman, in State street, and stole $2,300 worth of watches and chains from the safe. The safe had been unlocked by a clerk who had temporarily closed the store to get breakfast. McCabe was seen by a clerk in a neighboring establishment, who soon reported the facts to the police, and officers were dispatched to various points. At eight o'clock McCabe was secured in East Hartford, and at half past three he was in the Connecticut state prison to serve out a term of seven years. He is a New York burglar and has been in the Albany penitentiary."

—The Chicago Legal News takes to task Messrs. Shearman and Redfield for not incorporating into the last edition of their work on Negligence cases published in the legal journals and not elsewhere reported. It says: "So far as we have been able to examine, the authors appear to have cited the most important recent cases reported in the regular series of reports; but to have ignored entirely the American law periodicals, and, as a consequence, to have deprived their readers of the benefit of the recent leading opinions from one to three years. We will only cite one case of many we have noticed. In Tyler et al. v. The W. U. Telegraph Co., Judge Breese, in the supreme court of this state, on the 7th of February, 1873, delivered one of the ablest and most elaborate opinions ever delivered in America, upon the right of telegraph companies to require messages to be repeated, and the right as claimed by such companies to purchase exemption from liability for negligence. Although the questions decided in the opinion are discussed in this work, the opinion is not cited. It was published in the Legal News on the 13th of September, 1873, and afterwards in other legal periodicals."

—We regret exceedingly to have received with the last number of Chaney's Quarterly Michigan Digest, the following announcement: "Valedictory.—With this number the Digest suspends publication for want of income enough to pay for its type-setting. In dropping an undertaking which we had hoped would prove more lasting, we have, nevertheless, to return our warm thanks to those lawyers who gave it from the start a welcome as unexpected as it was complimentary, and whose good opinion constituted a "moral support" which, in that direction at least, left nothing to be asked for.

Henry A. Chaney, Editor.
W. S. George & Co., Publishers.

"Lansing, Mich., June, 1874."

This was an exceedingly well-edited publication. Every page bore marks of good judgment and painstaking accuracy. In taking leave of our valued friend, the Quarterly Digest, we may be permitted to express the hope that Mr. Chaney will not lay down his pen for the more profitable contests of the bar, but will advance into the higher walks of legal authorship, and give us a treatise on some of the titles of the law.

—The following specimen of Chinese conveyancing, which has recently come to light in a San Francisco police court, is worth considering. It expresses so clearly and unequivocally the intention of buyer and seller that it would be impossible for legal ingenuity to pick a flaw in it. It will be observed that the consideration, the receipt of the purchase money, and the delivery of the chattel, are all distinctly declared. The only objection to the instrument is that the transaction is "tainted with illegality," according to the vulgar notions of the outside barbarians. The instrument was in Chinese, and was interpreted as follows: "Loi Ho makes this distinct agreement to sell one because of her present distress, having no money to use, but having a girl named Ah Cheung, aged thirteen years, born in the first month of the year, the twentieth day, at two o'clock A. M. Now Loi Ho is willing to sell this girl to another person to get money to use. The middle man, Ah Loke, finds Qui Foh willing to buy her. The three persons (Loi Ho, Qui Foh and Ah Loke), face to face distinctly determined the price of her body to be $200. From the day of this agreement, the money being all paid in presence of all, Loi Ho with her own hands having received the money, the girl and the money both exchange hands. Qui Foh may take the girl, Ah Cheung, for her own until she has grown up to full size. This is true money and a true bargain. No other person has any part in it. That there may be proof of this, Loi Ho makes this bill of sale, one paper, and gives it to Qui Foh to receive and keep for proof.

"Signed by Loi Ho, her finger mark."

Notes of Cases.

Contract to Convey Made by Agent—Statute of Frauds.—Where the name of the agent, with whom a contract for the purchase of real estate was made, appears in the written memorandum of the agreement signed by the purchaser, who is the party to be charged, the statute of frauds is satisfied, although the names of the principals are not disclosed therein. Walsh v. Barton, 24 Ohio State, 28.

Specific Performance—Burden of Proof.—When a vendor of land, having contracted to convey a perfect title, brings his action to compel specific performance against the vendee, who denies the sufficiency of the vendor's title, the burden of showing title in himself rests on the plaintiff, and the introduction of a deed of recent date executed to himself, without further proof of title, is not sufficient. Ibid.

Specific Performance—Lien upon Property, when a Defence by Purchaser.—A purchaser of land, who is entitled under his contract to a perfect title, cannot be compelled to perform his agreement if the property purchased be subject to a judgment lien, unless he can be protected by the decree from loss or inconvenience by reason of the lien, although it be shown that the judgment debtor has other property sufficient to satisfy the judgment. Ibid

Railroad Companies—Power to Purchase Land—Ohio Statute.—The power to purchase land, conferred upon a railroad company by section 14 of the act of February 11, 1848 (S. & C. 273, note), is not limited to the acquisition of such lands as may be necessary for operating or maintaining its road. Ibid.

———. ———. ———. If, in making a purchase of real estate, the company abuse the power conferred upon it by said section, still, after re-sale and conveyance, the title becomes indefeasible in the hands of its vendee Ibid.

Digitized by Google

Interpretation—Mortgage of a Railroad, Etc.—A mortgage executed by a railroad company on "the road" of the company, "whether made or to be made, acquired or to be acquired, and all property, real or personal," of the company, "whether now owned or hereafter to be acquired, used or appropriated for the operating or maintaining the said road," is not a lien upon real estate of the company, then owned or afterward acquired, which has not been used or appropriated for operating or maintaining the road. Ibid.

Deed by Corporation—Proof of Execution.—A deed, purporting to have been executed by the president of a railroad corporation, under the seal of the corporation, as authorized by section 15 of the Ohio act of May 1, 1852 (S. & C. 279), if objected to, cannot be given in evidence without proof of its execution. Ibid.

Vendor and Purchaser—Agreement of Vendee to Maintain Fence.—Where it is stipulated in a deed-poll that the grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall build and perpetually maintain a fence on the line between the land granted and other lands owned by the grantor, and the parties to such deed, at the time of its execution, contemplate the subdivision of the granted premises into building or town lots, and their subsequent sale, the burden of maintaining such fence will not attach to, or run with, lots which do not abut on the line of the proposed fence. Ibid.

Auction Sales—By-Bidders.—Where a "sale" at auction is announced to be "positive," it is an act of fraud on the part of the vendor, or his agent to employ by-bidders to keep up the price for his benefit. Ibid.

Railroads—Fencing Track—Killing Cattle—Contributory Negligence of Owner in allowing Cattle to Run at Large.—In Marietta and Cincinnati Railroad Company, as Reorganized, v. Stephenson and Brown, 24 Ohio State, 48, the following points are ruled:

1. Inclosures of railroads, as required by the Ohio act of March 25, 1859 (S & C. 331), must be separate and distinct from the enclosures of adjoining proprietors.

2. The obligation to construct and maintain fences upon both sides of railroads, imposed by that act upon railroad companies, is not limited to owners and occupiers of adjoining lands, but extends to the public generally.

3. The rule of the English common law, which requires the owners of domestic animals to restrain them from running at large, has never been adopted or recognized as the common law of this state.

4. The owner of such animals running at large is not guilty of a breach of any duty imposed upon him by the Ohio act of April 13, 1865 (S. & S. 7), if they be at large without the omission on his part of reasonable care.

5. Where cattle running at large, without the fault of the owner, enter the enclosed field of another person, through which a railroad passes, and thence go upon the track of the road by reason of the want of fences which it was the duty of the railroad company to have constructed so as to separate the railroad from the adjacent lands, such owner is not guilty, under the Ohio act of April 7, 1865 (S. & S. 373), of contributing, by his own wrong, to an injury done by a passing train to his cattle while upon the railroad.

1. Federal Court Practice—Parties as Witnesses.—The federal statute of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. 351), making parties competent to testify, is remedial, and is to be liberally construed. Nash v. Williams, Supreme Court United States, October Term, 1873.

2. ———. ———. Although a party has made one deposition in a cause, he is not precluded from making another, nor is the sanction of the court necessary to validity of the second deposition. Ibid.

Lost Records—Secondary Evidence.—In Nash v. Willi ms, Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1873, secondary proof was offered of a judgment, the original record of which was destroyed by fire in the year 1862. The proof in question consisted of a copy of the judgment, the latter duly certified by the clerk of the court by whom the judgment was rendered. It was proved that the certified copy had been destroyed. The judgment in question was recovered upon a prior judgment in favor of the same plaintiff against the same defendant. There was evidence tending to show that a certified copy of the latter existed, but it was not positive. There was no proof of the existance of such a copy of the judgment sought to be proved. There was a discrepancy as to a single word in the copy offered in evidence. It set forth that the clerk had assessed the damages at "forty-three thousand nine hundred and sixty-six dollars and thirty-four cents, and that it was, therefore, considered by the court that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of forty three thousand nine hundred and thirty-six dollars and thirty-four cents," etc. It was satisfactorily proved, aliunde, that thirty instead of sixty was correct, the latter being a mistake of the copyist. Under these circumstances it was held that the secondary evidence offered was properly admitted. Mr. Justice SWAYNE, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The principle established by this court as to secondary evidence in cases like this is, that it must be the best the party has it in his power to produce. The rule is to be so applied as to promote the ends of justice, and guard against fraud, surprise and imposition. Renner v. The Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. 597; 1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 84 and note. The copy here in question was properly admitted. Winn v. Patterson 9 Pet. 676 This court has not yet gone the length of the English adjudications, which hold, without qualification, that there are no degrees in secondary evidence. Doe v. Gilbert, 7 Mees. & W. 106. The act of Congress of March 3, 1871 (16 Stat. 474. ch. III.), provides for putting in a permanent form proof of the contents of judicial records lost or destroyed, such proof to take the place of the original records for all purposes The statute of Texas upon the subject of proof in cases of lost records (Paschal's Dig., Art 4,969) has also been referred to in this connection. There is nothing in either the act of Congress or the statute in conflict with the action of the court we have been considering."

Administration of Estates—Presentation and Allowance of Claims—Texas Statute.—A statute of Texas requires all claims against the estate of a decedent to be presented to his legal respresentative, and to be allowed by such representative, and to be approved by the probate judge. Until so allowed and approved they have no legal validity, and cannot be recognized as debts against the estate. If disallowed, or not approved, they must be sued upon within three months. If sued without a refusal to allow or approve, there can be no recovery. The absence of such fact is fatal to the action. Paschal's Dig., Art. 1,309, 1,311; Danzy v. Swenney, 7 Tex. 625; Marlin v. Harrison, 7 Tex. 456. Construing this statute, it is held in Nash v. Williams, Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1873, that where the order of sale sets forth that the claims had been allowed by the administrator, but is silent as to its approval by the probate judge, it is not void so that it can be impeached collectually. Upon this point Mr. Justice SWAYNE expresses the rule of the Supreme Court of the United States, as follows:

"The application of the judgment creditor and the answer of the administrator gave the judge jurisdiction over the parties and the real estate of the deceased. Paschal's Dig. Art. 1,305. Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine. To make the order of sale required the exercise of this power. It was the business and duty of the court to ascertain and decide whether the facts were such as called for that action. The question always arises in such proceedings—and must be determined—whether, upon the case as presented, affirmative or negative action is proper. The power to review and reverse the decisions so made is clearly appellate in its character, and can be exercised only by an appellate tribunal in a proceeding had directly for that purpose. It cannot and ought not to be done by another court, in another case, where the subject is presented incidentally, and a reversal sought in such collateral proceeding. The settled rule of law is, that jurisdiction having attached in the original case, everything done within the power of that jurisdiction, when collaterally questioned, is to be held conclusive of the rights of the parties, unless impeached for fraud. Every intendment is made to support the proceeding. It is regarded as if it were regular in all things and irreversible for error. In the absence of fraud no question can be collaterally entertained as to anything lying within the jurisdictional sphere of the original case. Infinite confusion and mischiefs would ensue if the rule were otherwise. These remarks apply to the order of sale here in question. The county court had the power to make it and did make it. It is presumed to have been properly made, and the question of its propriety was not open to examination upon the trial in the circuit court. These propositions are sustained by a long and unbroken line of a judications in this court. The last one was the case of McNitt v. Turner, 16 Wall. 366. They are not in conflict with the adjudications of Texas upon the subject.

"The statute of Texas does not require the evidence upon which the judgment of the court proceeded to be set forth in the record. Such a statement can do no good, and its omission does no harm. As regards public officers, acts done which presuppose the existence of other acts to make them legally operative, are presumptive proofs of the latter.' Bank United States v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. 70. "Facts presumed are as effectually established as facts proved, where no presumption is allowed." Ward's Lessee v. Barrows, 2 Ohio State, 247. In the case last mentioned a sale for taxes came under examination. It was held that certain acts of the county auditor were presumptive proofs that he had administered to the collector the oath prescribed by law touching the delinquent list. The sale was sustained. Here the judge who made the order of sale was the judge to approve the claim. The order was presumptive proof of the requisite approval. Such approval was necessarily implied, and what is implied in a record, pleading, will, deed, or contract, is as effectual as what is expressed. United States v. Babbit, 1 Black, 61."

Lost Depositions—Secondary Evidence of their Contents when the Witness is Living.—In Burton v. Hard. Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1873, it is held, that where a deposition has been regularly taken and filed with the papers in the case, and is subsequently lost or destroyed without the fault of the party at whose instance it is taken, such party has a right to give in evidence a copy of the same, although the witness be living. The witness in this case resided in another state. Mr. Justice SWAYNE discussed the rule as follows:

Digitized by Google

"It is an axiom in the law of evidence that the contents of any written instrument lost or destroyed may be proved by competent evidence. Judicial records and all other documents of a kindred character are within the rule. Renner v. The Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. 581; Riggs v. Tayloe, Ibid, 483; 1 Greenleaf's Ev. sec 509. But it is said a different rule as to depositions —unless the witness be dead—obtains in Vermont, and the cases of Follet v. Murray, 17 Vermont, 530, and Low v. Peters, 36 Ibid, 177, are referred to as supporting the exception. Those cases are unlike the one before us. In Follet v. Murray the witness resided within the state, and there being no copy of the caption it did not appear that the deposition had been regularly taken. In the other case the witness was dead, and no question was raised as to any defect in the lost original. The copy was, therefore, admitted as of course. If a deposition be not properly taken, it is not made admissible by the death of the witness. Johnson v. Clark, 1 Tyler, 449. In Harper v. Cook, 1 Carr & P. 139, it was held that the contents of a lost affidavit might be shown by secondary evidence. The necessity of retaking it was not suggested. In the present case the witness lived in another state and more than one hundred miles from the place of trial. The process of the court could not reach him; for all jurisdictional purposes he was as if he were dead. It is well settled that if books or papers necessary as evidence in a court in one state be in the possession of a person living in another state, secondary evidence, without further showing, may be given to prove the contents of such papers, and notice to produce them is unnecessary. 22 Con 272; 4 Bennet (19 Mo.), 475; 10 Barb. 376; see also 3 Monroe, 532; 7 Pick. 10; 9 Cow. 115; 13 J. R. 58. Here there was nothing to prevent the operation of the general rule as to proof touching writings lost or destroyed. The deposition was one of the files of the case. The plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of the contents of that document. Having been lost without his fault, he was not bound to supply its place by another and different deposition, which might, or might not, be the same in effect with the prior one."

Secondary Evidence of the Contents of Bank Books.—In the same case it is ruled that secondary evidence is admissible to prove the negative fact that the books of a bank located in another state do not contain certain entries, the party offering the evidence having shown that he had attempted to procure the books themselves, but that those having them in custody had refused to permit them to be taken. The court also apply the rule laid down by Greenleaf with regard to voluminous documents, as follows:

"When it is necessary to prove the results of voluminous facts or of the examination of many books and papers, and the examination cannot be conveniently made in court, the results may be proved by the person who made the examination. 1 Greenl. Ev. sec. 93. Here the object was to prove, not that the books did, but that they did not show certain things. The results sought to be established were not affirmative, but negative. If such testimony be competent as to the former, a multo fortiori must it be so to prove the latter."

Homestead Exemption.—The constitution, and probably Comp. Laws of Michigan, §§ 6137–6145, exempt a homestead only as an entirety—not a part of or an undivided interest in a homestead. Existing laws furnish no practical mode of securing a homestead in an undivided portion of premises, particularly where the claim is set up to the upper story only of a building used in common. Amphlett et ux. v. Hibbard, Supreme Court of Michigan, April Term, 1874.

———. Evidence of Homestead Rights.—A deed of property claimed as a homestead, executed after the time when it is claimed that the homestead right attached, bears materially on the question of that right, and is admissible in evidence in ejectment brought for the premises.—Ibid.

———. Purchase Money—Mortgage Unsigned by Wife.—A mortgage for purchase money upon an undivided half of certain property was held a valid security upon that half, though the mortgagor's wife did not join; also that, it would take precedence of any homestead rights in that half. The conveyance and mortgage back being contemporaneous and to be construed as one, the title vests only subject to the mortgage.—Ibid.

Homestead—Case in Judgment.—Hibbard brought ejectment. The Amphletts claimed a homestead right, but circuit judge decided against it, finding that John W. and Moses H. Amphlett had been tenants-in-common, and that J. W. and wife had deeded their undivided half to M. H. with warranty, the latter returning a mortgage on the whole property, his wife not joining. Neither was she made a party to the subsequent foreclosure, under which the property was bid off to Hibbard. The building on the premises was used partly by Moses' family, and partly by J. W. and M. H. for store purposes. M. H. and wife had also reconveyed to J. W. an undivided half of the whole without specifying which half. The judgment was affimed.—Ibid.

Conveyance—Election as to Undivided Portion.—If, in the absence of proof thereon, there is any right of election as to which portion passes by a conveyance of an undivided portion, the right belongs to the grantee.—Ibid.

———. Mortgage Void as against Homestead.—Where one, his wife not joining, mortgaged certain property in half of which he possessed homestead right, and afterward conveyed an undivided half of the property with warranty, it was held fair to presume that if it was intended to convey either half as distinct from the other, it was the half least encumbered. The mortgage would then be void as to the husband as well as to the wife, so far as the homestead half was concerned (Dye v. Mann, 10 Mich. 291; Beecher v. Baldy, 7 Mich. 488), and would not be made valid by the subsequent conveyance, even though the property should cease to be a homestead.—Ibid.

Registration—Subsequent Purchasers—Notice by Record.—In general, he who seeks benefit from the recording laws must incur all risks from the failure duly to record his papers, whether the fault be his own or an officer's. Such laws cannot be equitably construed to embrace cases not within them, or as giving constructive notice of things not shown by the records Where, e. g., a mortgage appears to be for less than the fact, or a deed to cover less than was embraced by it, it has been generally held that a subsequent purchaser may rely on the record as showing the exact facts. Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Chy. 288; Heister's Lessee v. Fortner, 2 Binn. 40; Sawyer v. Adams, 8 Vt. 172; Sanger v. Craigue, 10 Vt. 555; Jenning's Lessee v. Wood, 20 Ohio, 261; Chamberlain v. Bell, 7 Cal. 292; Baldwin v. Marshall, 2 Humph. 216; Shepherd v. Burkhalter, 13 Geo. 444; Miller v. Bradford, 12 Iowa, 14; N. Y. Life Ins. Co. v. White, 17 N. Y. 469; Barrows v. Baughman, 9 Mich. 213; Barnard v. Campau, Supreme Court of Michigan, April Term, 1874.

———. ———. Quære.—If a deed that has been incorrectly recorded is shown to a prospective purchaser of the lands conveyed by it, or if in this case the sheriff had shown to Campau his execution and the levy upon the land in question thereon endorsed, whether such positive and unequivocal notice would have any effect as against the record.—Ibid.

Oral Notice.—Mere oral notice simply puts the person notified upon enquiry; he need not assume that it asserts the facts, and if reasonable diligence furnishes no corroboration from sources likely to be informed, the notice loses all force. (Converse v. Blumrich, 14 Mich. 109.) Ibid.

Constructive Notice.—Subsequent purchasers are charged with constructive notice of what appears of record, and their rights are the same whether they have actually seen the record or not.—Ibid.

In Botsford, et al v. Kleinhans, et al, Supreme Court of Michigan, April term 1874, it appeared that Kleinhans & Draper, produce dealers, sued the plaintiffs in error, commission merchants, for wheat sold against orders and at a loss, and to recover a balance of account. After most of the wheat had been sold, a partner of the Botsfords had retired from business and the Botsfords had continued under agreement and public notice that they were to settle accounts and collect firm debts. Subsequent accounts between Kleinhans & Draper and the new firm were kept separate, but dealings continued as before and accounts of sales were rendered from time to time. The following points are ruled:

Evidence—Clerk's Letter.—In a suit between firms relating to certain sales, a letter, written in the name of one of the firms, by a boy in the office in answer to a dispach referring to the sales, was offered in evidence, but objected to for want of proof of authority to write it A member of the firm testified to the handwriting; also that the letter was written on paper having the printed heading of the firm and such as was used in the office at the time; also that the boy was in the firm's employ and sometimes wrote letters for it; though he said he did not know whether this particular letter was written by the firm's authority, or how or by whom it was sent. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to go to the jury on the question whether written by the firm's authority, and that the letter was properly admitted.

Evidence of Dealings with a Firm and its Successors.—In suing an old firm upon dealings which had been continued with its successors, i would be competent to admit in evidence a note payable to and endorsed by the new firm, if it related to the account with the old one.

Transfer of Accounts from old to new Firm.—Those who continue dealing with a firm after its composition has been changed, the new firm assuming the right and obligations of the old one, have a right to assume that the business will be kept separate, and cannot be bound without their knowledge, consent, or acquiescence, by the transfer of the old account, to the books of the new firm, and by the continuance of the accounts after the dissolution of the old firm.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JULY 30, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

SUITS BY NATIONAL BANKS IN FEDERAL COURTS.—Mr. District Judge WELKER of the Northern District of Ohio in the case of the Commercial Bank of Cleveland v. Simmons (6 Ch. Legal News, 344), has recently decided that a national bank may sue in the United States Circuit Court of the district where the bank is located upon notes endorsed to it by the payee, though the defendant is a resident of the same district. The United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Missouri at the last March term (present DILLON and TREAT, JJ.) decided the same point.

BANKRUPT ACT—RATROACTIVE CLAUSE OF AMENDMENT OF 1874.—In our note to the cases of Obear Thomas and Angell, last week, we omitted to state that Mr. District Judge WITHEY, on July 13, in re Pickering, decided that prior adjudications were not affected by the recent amendment to § 39 of the bankrupt act. He is reported as saying that the language of the amendatory act is broad enough to have this effect, but he holds that it is not in the power of the legislative deparment of the government to interfere to this extent with the decrees of judgments of the judicial tribunals.

Mr. District Judge HILL, of the District Courts for Mississippi has, in a recent case, ruled the same question in the same way.

Limits of the Taxing Power—Exemption from Taxation, when Valid.

The Supreme Court of Maine has recently rendered an important decision respecting the limits of the taxing power, and the power to exempt property, unless by general laws of uniform operation, from taxation. The court recognizes the principle decided by it in the case of Allen v. Jay 12 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 481, at the July term 1871, in which the legislature had authorized the town of Jay to lend $10,000 to certain men to enable them to build a saw mill and grist mill and to exempt the mills from taxation for ten years, and where the act was adjudged invalid. It also recognizes the decision of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in Lowell v. Boston, holding the "Sumner Street Fire Bonds" invalid, the principle of which was applied in The Commercial Bank v. Iola, 2 Dillon, C. C. R. 353, and which is now on error in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The recent decision by the Supreme Court of Maine was in the case of Brewer Brick Company v. Brewer, which involved the validity of a tax assessed by the defendant upon the plaintiffs' manufacturing establishment. The plaintiffs claimed that their property was exempt from taxation under the provisions of the general law of the state, which exempts manufacturing establishments to a certain extent for a term not exceeding ten years, provided the town shall, in a legal manner, assent to such exemption. The defendants claimed that the statute is unconstitutional, and hence the tax was properly assessed. They further contended that the plaintiffs were not, as brick makers, within the purview of the vote passed by the town. On both grounds the court are with the defendants. Upon the question of constitutionality, the court reiterated the conclusion arrived at in the Jay case, as well as in the subsequent case of the Boston Loan bill in Massachusets (Lowell v. Boston), that incidental benefits to the public derived from the investment of capital in private enterprises afford no justification for partial taxation, and hence towns and cities have no power to raise money by taxation to give away or to patronize or loan to such enterprise—and any efforts made to that end are void and illegal. Exemption from taxation the court regarded as equivalent to a gift of the same amount to the party exempted, and hence equally obnoxious to the principle involved. The court, however, recognizes the doctrine that the legislature has the right to pass general laws of exemption, but those laws must be uniform upon all subjects of the same class over the entire state. But the legislature cannot delegate the power to others, nor exact laws partial in their operation. The statute in question is obnoxious to both these objections, it being left to each municipality to accept or reject the provisions within its own limits. The court, therefore, decided the law in question to be unconstitutional, the tax assessed to be therefore legal, and the plaintiff's action, of course, not sustained.

Judge CUTTING dissented on the main question, but concurred in the result upon the other points in the case.

The Liability of Municipal Corporations for the Torts of Police Officers.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, at Montreal, in 1871, before DUVAL, Ch. J., and CARON, DRUMMOND, BADGLEY and MONK, JJ., in The Corporation of Montreal v. Doolan, it was ruled—DUVAL, Ch. J., and BADGLEY, J. dissenting—that a municipal corporation is liable in damages for an assault committed on a citizen by a policeman in the pretended discharge of his official duty. The case is reported in the Lower Canada Jurist for July. As this decision is directly opposed to the rule as settled in England and the United States, it may be interesting to examine the case and the views of the concurring judges.

The facts, as stated by Justice BADGLEY, in his dissenting opinion, were as follows:

"The plaintiff was a quiet and decent citizen and a respectable cab owner and driver, and on the occasion of the fire at Zion church in Montreal, he was called from his stand at the corner of Victoria Square and McGill street, and went near the church. Whilst there a person who had been severely injured by the fire was put into his carriage by some of the firemen, whose wet and dirty condition soiled and dirtied his carriage, and soiled his clean cushions, which of course did not please him, whereupon he called to them not to dirty his cushions, and was about taking his seat to drive the injured person, when two policemen, James Maubry, and Gideon Marineau, seized him and dragged him away from his horse and carriage, which were driven off at full speed by a stranger. The policemen dragged him off to take him to the station house, treating him very roughly. The same rough treatment was continued by the policemen until his arrival at the police office in Jacques Cartier Square, where the officer on duty said the policemen had no charge against the plaintiff, except that he would not drive furiously for them. He was immediately set at liberty, and after about a couple of hours, received his horse and carriage which were brought back to the stand, the horse much over driven and the carriage and cushions soiled and dirtied with burnt dust, ashes and cinders. For his own arrest and for the injury done his carriage he sued the corporation in damages, which, he averred, were caused by the policemen, as the alleged servants and agents of the corporation and acting under the general authority of that body, the policemen being on duty at the time and acting as such. The defendants pleaded, first their non-responsibility or liability for the misconduct of the city policemen or for their unauthorized, unlawful or wrongful acts, and not content with this plea, they further pleaded, that plaintiff used abusive language to the policemen, who were justified at the time in arresting him; and that he suffered no damage, and finally they pleaded defence au fond en fait."

Digitized by Google

It was also in evidence that he was put to the expense of $35 for getting his carriage repaired and put into clean order as before. In the court of premiere instance the action was dismissed upon the ground of the non-responsibility of the corporation for the unauthorized and wrongful acts of the city policemen; but this judgment was reversed by the judges of the Superior Court sitting in review, who awarded to the plaintiff the $35 as proved for the carriage injury, and $65 for his unwarrantable arrest, making his total damage $100, which judgment was entered in his favor against the defendant."

The following are the views of the concurring judges:

"CARON, J., for the majority of the court, was in favor of confirming the judgment. After referring to the pleadings and evidence, his honor stated that the French law must govern the case, and under this law he was clearly of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover against the corporation. Among other reasons, he remarked that it was the corporation that appointed the policemen. Equity also strongly sustained the claim of the plaintiff.

"DRUMMOND, J., concurring, said the judges were all agreed as to the facts, and as to the disgraceful conduct of the policemen. There remained simply the question on whom the responsibility should fall, upon the policemen alone, or upon the persons who employed them. The principle was one of vast importance. If the ruling laid down by the chief justice and Judge BADGLEY were to prevail everywhere, then, even in a case like the Westfield explosion, the directors of the company owning the steamer would have no responsibility whatever, though they employed an engineer who did not know what a vacuum was. For it might be said that they did not employ him for the purpose of blowing people up. But without digressing to that case, he thought even the English authorities are strongly in favor of the pretentions of the plaintiff. After citing several authors, he proceeded to say that the French authorities are still stronger, and most unquestionably fix the responsibility upon the employer in such cases. It was a very important question to what law we should resort in such cases. There was a great deal to be said in favor of the view of the chief justice, but he thought that where the civil rights of individuals were concerned, a government stood in the same position as an individual. He thought the subject had a right to resort to the law of France. This law was strongly in plaintiff's favor. Some American cases had been referred to, but his honor attached no weight whatever to these decisions; for in the opinion of eminent jurists, as well as in his own there had been more unjust opinions pronounced by judges in the United States in favor of corporations than in any other country. In England there was a gradual advancement towards a more enlightened regard for the rights of the subject, and Americans were a long way behind England in this respect. He was clearly of opinion that the corporation should be held liable.

"MONK, J., said the question was one of such importance that he would make one or two observations with regard to the technical points on which he concurred in the judgment. The preliminary question, whether this case was to be determined by English or French law, was of great importance. He was not prepared to say that the chief justice was wrong on this point, but he was rather disposed to concur with Justices CARON and DRUMMOND. He thought that the law which determined the rights of the individual against a public body must be the law of the land—the French law. And according to French law, in his opinion, there was no difficulty in holding the corporation liable. There was no difficulty whatever as to the facts. But supposing the case had to be decided according to English law, then there would no doubt be a difficulty, he admitted, in holding the corporation liable. He was not prepared to say that the authorities cited by the chief justice were not perfectly sound, and might be applicable to a case in which the general principle alone was involved. But there was another plea in the record. No doubt, an intimation from the defendants of what they considered their position would relieve the court from immense difficulty. How did the matter stand? The counsel for the corporation, knowing the facts and the law, thought proper not to content himself with a defence en fait, but went further and added a plea of justification. He said, admitting all that you say to be true, the policemen were justified in what they did. This plea relieved him, Mr. Justice MONK, from all embarrassment. Upon the plea of justification he certainly thought that the corporation was liable. They had thus taken themselves out of the general rule, and had made their position exceptional. All that remained was to look to the evidence, and upon the evidence they were responsible."

The judgment was confirmed, Chief Justice DUVAL and Judge BADGLEY dissenting.

This opinion, founded, as it confessedly is, upon French law, and supported only by the views of three judges against two, would not, of course, be regarded as authority by any American court. But it is, perhaps, worth considering, at least by our legislatures, whether the English and American rule finds any support in justice or common sense. Our courts, under special statutes to that effect, constantly give damages against municipal corporations for the property destroyed by riots; and, without statute, for damages caused by the negligence of their workmen in leaving excavations in streets unclosed; but refuse damages growing out of the negligence or torts of policemen, on the ground that they are public and not municipal agents. They are public agents in no higher sense than the city engineer, city architect, city street contractor and his force are public agents. The writer believes that it is demanded by justice and public policy that a municipal corporation should be held responsible for the wrongful acts of its public officers, done in the course of their official relations and under color of their office. Such a rule would be of vast service in protecting life, liberty and property from the aggressions of irresponsible and brutal persons, who, in many instances, are employed and retained on the police forces of our large cities in defiance of the rights and interests of the public. It would compel the corporation, through its agents, to select for police officers none but sober, prudent and competent men, and then to put a check upon their imprudent or wrongful conduct by compelling them to give a bond to the corporation to indemnify it against any liability it might sustain thereby. We know a case which happened in Saint Louis, where a medical practitioner in good standing was arrested without warrant on a charge of committing a criminal abortion, was publicly upbraided and accused of felony by a chief of police, was marched through a crowded street to a police station and there kept in confinement without bail for two days, when he was discharged, an investigation by a coroner's jury disclosing no evidence against him. This man was thus incalculably outraged in his feelings, and injured in his professional reputation by a police officer who was pecuniarily irresponsible. Is there a man in any community whose sense is not crazed and obscured by legal technicalities, and whose perception of justice is not blunted by legal precedents, that will not say that if, in the opinion of a jury, this arrest was malicious and without probable cause, the city of Saint Louis ought to have responded in damages? And what shall we say of still harder cases, such as one which recently occurred in New York city, where a police officer, in the exercise of his authority, wantonly shot and killed a citizen. His family, deprived of their head and support, were left hopelessly without remedy. Our legislatures ought to look to it, and sweep this rule away, as they have in many other instances been obliged to sweep away rules of law which the courts have established.

Digitized by Google

The American authorities have fully settled the doctrine that the municipal corporation which appoints a police officer is not responsible for his torts. The cases are collected, and the grounds of the doctrine stated in Dillon Munic. Corp. §§ 33, 34, 149, 773. This doctrine is not peculiar to American jurisprudence, but is borrowed from England; and if the courts are open to the censure pronounced by the Canadian judge as to giving unjust judgments for corporations, it should not have been limited to the "judges of the United States." However it may be with respect to private corporations, which we do not stop to discuss, we think it is not true of public municipal corporations that our courts have unduly inclined in their favor. And it is a proposition easy of demonstration that the courts of the United States have asserted a much larger measure of liability on the part of municipal corporations than has been asserted by the courts of Great Britain. The rule as to the non-liability of a municipal corporation for the torts of public officers is so strongly established by judicial decisions that it is not, perhaps, competent for the courts to change it, and the change, which on grounds of public policy seems desirable, must come from the legislature.

—T. C. T. BUCKLEY, Esq., a distinguished New York lawyer, died recently.

—THE persons appointed by the secretary of state under the law of Congress to index and annotate the new Revised Statutes of the United States are busily at work. They will not be able to conclude their labor until December 1st.

Negligence—When a Question for Jury.

PHILADELPHIA CITY PASSENGER RAILWAY COMPANY v. HASSARD.

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, May 11, 1874.

The defendants allowed the front door of their car to be open, the passageway to the rear platform to be obstructed by passengers, and the front platform to be unguarded by a fender. The plaintiff, a boy of ten years, issued by way of the front platform, and jumped off while the car was in motion, being thereby injured. Held, that under the facts, the court could not charge, as matter of law, that there was no negligence in the defendants, or that there was no contributory negligence in the plaintiff, having in view his years. Both of these questions were for the jury.

Error to the District Court of Philadelphia.

George W. Thorn, Esq., for plaintiff; George L. Crawford, Esq., for defendant.

WILLIAMS, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an action to recover damages for an injury occasioned by negligence. The plaintiff below, a boy ten years of age, was a passenger on the defendant's car, and, in getting off, jumped from the front platform while the car was in motion, and received an injury which resulted in the loss of a leg. At the time of the accident there were more passengers in the car than could be seated. Some were standing on the front and rear platforms, and others inside the car, in the passageway, between the seats. The plaintiff got into the car in company with his younger brother and sister, at or near the intersection of Walnut and Broad streets. The latter, upon entering the car, got seats near the door at the rear platform. The plaintiff, after standing awhile, obtained a seat at the upper end of the car, near the front door, which was open. The car stopped at Twenty-first street, and the younger children, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, got off with other passengers. But, as the car started, he saw them on the sidewalk, and tried to get out to the rear platform, but the passageway was so crowded that he turned and rushed out of the front door, and, as he says, told the driver to stop, who answered "all right," and slackened up with the reins. While the car was in motion the plaintiff jumped off upon a pile of loose bricks, and slipped under the car. The hind wheel passed over his leg, crushing the bone above the ankle, and opening the ankle joint. The driver testified that he slackened up because it was down grade; that he did not hear the boy ask him to stop, and that the first he saw of him he was falling or jumping off the front platform. He could not say whether he jumped off or fell off; that he checked his horses, put his break to the car and did his best to stop it. The conductor was on the rear platform making change for a passenger who was paying his fare, and did not see the plaintiff until he felt the bouncing of the car as it passed over his leg, and then he saw him crawl over to the sidewalk.

The court instructed the jury, in substance, that if the plaintiff's injury was occasioned by the negligence of the defendants, without any fault on his own part, then he was entitled to maintain the action. But if it was not occasioned by the defendants' negligence, or if his own negligence contributed to produce it, he was not entitled to recover. But in determining whether he acted with ordinary care, or was guilty of negligence, the jury must consider his conduct and action in view of his age. All that the law exacted of him was such prudence and discretion as is usually exercised by boys of his own age, and if he acted with as much care and prudence under the circumstances as children of his own age generally exercise, then he was not chargeable with negligence. No complaint is made in regard to these instructions, but it is alleged that there was error in the answers of the court to the plaintiff's fifth and seventh points, and to the defendant's first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth and tenth points. All of which, as it seems to us, were answered in substantial conformity with the instructions contained in the general charge. The assignments of error embracing the answers to these points, virtually raise but two questions:

Digitized by Google

1st. Whether, under the facts disclosed by the evidence, the court should have charged that no negligence was imputable to the defendants?

2d. Whether the court should have charged that the plaintiff's injury was occasioned by his own negligence or misconduct?

I. It was the duty of the defendants to carry the plaintiff and set him down safely, if they could do it by the exercise of reasonable care and vigilance. If the plaintiff, on account of his age and inexperience, was incapable of taking proper care of himself, then the defendants were bound to exercise the highest care and vigilance necessary and proper to secure his safety. Whether the carrier, in the case of an injury to a passenger, has exercised reasonable and proper care to prevent it, or has been guilty of neligence, it is, as a general rule, a question of fact for the jury. But there may be such an obvious disregard of duty and safety, as to make it incumbent on the court to declare it negligence as matter of law (Pennsyvania Railroad Company v. Ozier, 11 Casey, 60; Pittsburgh and Connell Railroad Company v. McClury, 6 P. E. Smith, 295;) and so the evidence may show such care and vigilance, and such an absence of any fact from which negligence can be inferred, as to make it the duty of the court to declare that no negligence is imputable (Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company v. Hummell, 8 Wr. 375.) But such cases are exceptions to the general rule, that what is negligence is a question for the jury, when the measure of duty is ordinary and reasonable care (McCully v. Clark & Thaw, 4 Wr. 399; Glassey v. Hestonville, etc., Passenger Railway Company, 7 P. F. Smith, 172; Kay v. Pennsylvania Railroad, 15 ib. 269; Pennsylvania Canal Company v. Bentley, 16 ib. 39; Westchester and Philadelphia Railroad Company v. McElwee, 17 ib. 311.) Is this then the case before us within the exception, or does it clearly come within the general rule?

It was undoubtedly the duty of the defendants to prevent children from getting on or off the front platform, or from riding in a place of so much danger (Pittsburgh, Allegheny and Manchester Railway Company v. Caldwell;) and if negligence is not imputable to them as a matter of law, because they did not enclose the front platform with a screen or fender, the fact that it was not so enclosed is a matter proper to be considered, in connection with the other facts of the case, in determining whether or not the defendants were guilty of negligence in allowing the front door to remain open, when the car was filled with passengers, some of whom were children, unattended by their parents or guardians, and who, from their youth and inexperience, may not have known that there was greater danger in getting off the front, than there was in getting off the rear platform. If the car was filled with passengers—if some were standing on the platforms, and others in the passage-way, blocking it up so as to make it difficult for the plaintiff to get to the rear platform, and impossible for the conductor to see him, how, under these circumstances, could the court say, as a matter of law, that it was not the defendant's duty to keep the front door closed, and that they were guilty of no negligence in allowing it to remain open? If the plaintiff did not know that it was more dangerous to get off the front, than to get off the rear platform, was not the crowded passageway and the open front door an invitation to him to go through it and get off the front platform? If the latter had been enclosed with a screen or fender, the door might have been allowed to remain open with safety. But there was nothing in the construction of the front platform, showing that it was not to be used by passengers in getting on and off the car; and the evidence shows that the plaintiff was not told or informed that he must not get on or off the front platform. It is clear, under all the circumstances, that the court could not have instructed the jury as matter of law, that it was not the duty of defendants to keep the door closed, and if so, the question of negligence was properly submitted to their determination. Where both the duty and the extent of its performance are to be ascertained as facts, a jury alone can determine what is negligence and whether it has been proved (McCully v. Clark & Thaw, supra.) The court below was, therefore, right in refusing to charge that no negligence was imputable to the defendants.

II. Was there error in not charging that the plaintiff's injury was occasioned by his own negligence or misconduct?

It may be conceded that if the plaintiff had been an adult of ordinary discretion and intelligence, he would have been chargeable with negligence in jumping from the front platform, while the car was in motion, and the court might properly have instructed the jury that his injury was occasioned by his own folly and imprudence. But the plaintiff was a mere boy, and the law, because of his tender age and inexperience, does not exact of him the same degree of care and prudence that it does of a person of mature years. A boy's capacity is the measure of his responsibility; and if he has not the ability to foresee and avoid danger to which he may be exposed, negligence will not be imputed to him, if he unwittingly exposes himself to it. Whether, then, the plaintiff had sufficient discretion and intelligence to know that he was exposing himself to great bodily harm in jumping from the platform as he did, was not a matter of law but a question of fact, and was properly submitted to the jury with the instruction that the law exacted of the plaintiff just that degree of care, prudenee and discretion that his years had given him and no more, and if greater prudence and discretion than that exercised by the plaintiff upon this occasion would characterize the conduct of other boys of his age, under similar circumstances, then the company is not to be held responsible because of the rashness and impulsiveness of this boy in springing from his seat, rushing by the driver and jumping from the car whilst it was in motion. The law governing the plaintiff's responsibility for the act which resulted in his injury, is clearly and accurately stated in the defendant's eighth and ninth points, which were affirmed by the court without qualification, and by their affirmance the question of the plaintiff's negligence was submitted to the jury with just such instructions as they asked. If the verdict of the jury was against the weight of the evidence, the defendant's remedy was a motion for a new trial, the granting or refusal of which was a matter within the sound discretion of the court below, and is not reviewable here.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

—Legal Intelligencer.

NOTE.—One of the most difficult practical questions relating to the law of negligence is, under what circumstances negligence is a question of law for the court, or a question of fact for the jury; in other words, under what circumstances the court may withhold a case from the jury and direct a nonsuit, on the ground that the testimony does not establish negligence; or under what circumstances the court may instruct the jury that the facts proved do not amount to negligence; and under what circumstances the question whether there has been negligence in the particular case is to be left, under general instructions, to be resolved by the jury. Under the practice which obtains in England, Massachusetts, and some other states, the judges are in the habit in many cases of determining this question for the jury, either by withholding it from them or directing them what verdict to render. But in other states, as Tennessee, for instance, where the judge is prohibited from directing an involuntary nonsuit, or from intimating to the jury his opinion on the weight of the evidence, of course the very opposite rule prevails, and negligence or no negligence is, under proper instructions as to the law, a question for the jury in all cases. But in many of the states, under what circumstances negligence is a question for the jury or for the judge, is being constantly mooted, and the evident tendency of opinion is to enlarge the power of juries over it. We recently published (ante, p. 202) an instructive opinion of Mr. Justice HUNT, of the Supreme Court of the United States, on this question. In the case of Crissy v. Hestonville, Mantua, and Fairmount Passenger Railway Co., recently decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and reported in the American Law Times Reports, N. S., 166, the plaintiff was a child of the age of thirteen years. He and his companion, a boy of the same age, signaled the driver as the defendant's car crossed Thirteenth street. The car was slackened to receive them; they stood there by the side of the driver all the way out to Forty-first street and Lancaster avenue. No objection was made by either the driver or conductor to their riding there; neither of them requested the plaintiff to step inside of the car; the conductor came to him and collected his fare; at Forty-first street and Lancaster avenue the plaintiff said to his companion in a voice sufficiently loud for the driver to hear, "I am going to get off here." The speed of the car was thereupon slackened; the plaintiff took hold of the dasher with one hand, and the iron on the car with the other, and stepped off; the car continued in motion; the plaintiff's foot slipped; he retained his hold to save himself; he was dragged two or three yards, and until the front wheel ran over his foot, causing the injury of which he complains. There was a crossing in the street where he desired to get off. The court below directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. This the supreme court held to be error. With reference to the general rule on the subject the court (MERCER, J.) says: "As a general rule, a question of negligence must be submitted to the jury. It should be where there is any substantial doubt as to the facts, or to the inferences to be drawn from them. Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Barnett, 9 P. F. Smith, 259; Johnson v. Bruner, 11 P. F. Smith, 58. There is no absolute rule as to what constitutes negligence. It is dependent upon the particular circumstances of the case. Where the measure of duty is not unvarying; where a higher degree of care is demanded under some circumstances than under others; where both the duty and the extent of the performance are to be ascertained as facts, a jury alone can determine what is negligence, and whether it has been proven. McCully v. Clarke et al., 4 Wr. 406; Pennsylvania Canal Co. v. Bently, 16 P. F. Smith, 30. Where the measure of duty is ordinary and reasonable care, it is always a question for the jury. Westchester & Philadelphia R. R. Co. v. McElwee, 17 P. F. Smith, 311."

Digitized by Google

And with reference to the particular facts, they say: "In view of the plaintiff's age, we think this evidence should have been submitted to the jury; the jury should have determined whether plaintiff had been guilty of negligence; he should be held to the exercise of that degree of care and discretion ordinarily to be expected of a child of his age, neither more nor less. Smith v. O'Conner, 12 Wright, 218. So in regard to the defendant's alleged negligence. The fact that the plaintiff was suffered to stand upon and get off from the front platform, and whether the defendant exercised proper care under all the circumstances, in not sooner stopping the car, should have been submitted to the jury. It is the duty of a railway company to cause its cars to come to a full stop, to permit a passenger to get off. Whether the defendant properly discharged his duty with a due regard to the age of the plaintiff, and of notice of plaintiff's desire to leave the car, should have been left to the jury."

Liability of a Railway Company for Injury to a Passenger Travelling on a Free Pass, where there is a Restriction Against Liability.

JACOBUS v. SAINT PAUL & CHICAGO RAILWAY COMPANY.

Supreme Court of Minnesota, April Term, 1874.

Hon. S. J. R. McMILLAN, Chief Justice.
" JOHN M. BERRY, } Associate Justices.
" JOHN B. YOUNG. }

1. Railway Negligence—Injury to Passengers—Free Pass Stipulating against Liability.—A railway company is liable for an injury to a passenger, although he was travelling on a free pass, which contained a condition that the company should not be liable "under any circumstances, whether of negligence of its agents or otherwise, for any injury of the person, or for any loss or injury to his property while using or having the benefit of it."

2. ——. ——. Negligence and Gross Negligence.—And held arguendo (citing authorities) that the distinction between negligence and gross negligence is not applicable to the case of railway carriers of passengers, because the law exacts of such carriers the greatest care, and makes them liable for the slightest neglect.

3. ——. ——. Contributory Negligence of Passenger—Remaining in Baggage Car.—The fact that the passenger at the time of the injury was in the baggage car, contrary to a rule of the company, is not such contributory negligence as will bar his recovery, although he may have been informed of the rule, and may have persisted in remaining there in violation of it.

BERRY, J.—The plaintiff brings this action to recover damages for injury occasioned to his person by the alleged gross negligence of defendant's servants in charge of defendant's railway train, upon which plaintiff was travelling. Plaintiff was riding upon a free pass, which, together with the conditions indorsed, is in these words, viz.:

"St. Paul and Chicago Railway. Pass D. Jacobus upon the conditions indorsed hereon, until December 31st, 1871, unless otherwise ordered. Not transferable.

" D. C. SHEPARD,
" Chf. Eng. and Supt.

" CONDITIONS.

"The person who accepts and uses this free ticket thereby assumes all risk of accident, and agrees that the company shall not be liable under any circumstances, whether of negligence of its agents or otherwise, for any injury of the person, or for any loss or injury to his property, while using or having the benefit of it."

Upon the pleadings and the charge of the court, the first question arising in this case is, whether the pass, with its conditions, protects defendant from liability for injury received by plaintiff while riding upon such pass, even though the injury was caused by gross negligence upon defendant's part. In our opinion, this question should be answered in the negative, for the reason that the degree of care and diligence exacted of a bailee should be proportioned to the importance of the business and of the interest at stake. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co., 8 Gray, 131; 57 Me. 202. The law imposes upon the common carrier of passengers the greatest care and foresight for the safety of his passengers, and holds him liable for the slightest neglect. McLean v. Burbank, 11 Minn. 288. And for like reasons the same extreme care is required, though the passenger be carried gratuitously.

Having undertaken to carry, the duty arises to carry safely. Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company v. Derby, 14 How. (U S.) 486; Nolton v. Western Railroad, 15 N. Y. 444; Steamboat New World v. King, 16 How. (U. S.) 474; 2 Redfield on Railways, 184–5 and notes; Perkins v. N. Y. Central Railroad Company, 24 N. Y. 200; Todd v. Old Col. and F. R. R. Co, 3 Allen, 21.

In the case at bar, however, the plaintiff was not merely a gratuitous passenger, i. e., a passenger carried without payment of fare or other consideration. He was a passenger upon a free pass, expressly conditioned that the defendant should not be liable to him for any injury of his person while he was using or having the benefit of such pass. Does this circumstance distinguish his case from that of a merely gratuitous passenger? Upon the question whether conditions of this kind are valid and effectual to exonerate the carrier of passengers, the adjudications differ.

In New York the conditions appear to be held sufficient to absolve the carrier from liability, even for the gross negligence of his employees. Wells v. New York Central Railroad, 24 N. Y. 181; Perkins v. same, Ib. 196; Bissell v. same, 25 N. Y. 442.

In New Jersey it is held that such conditians are good as against ordinary negligence, with a very decided intimation that the exemption from liability comprehends gross negligence also. Kinney v. Central Railroad Company, 34 N. J. 513.

In Pennsylvania, Illinois, Indiana, and several other states, the courts hold that no such condition will avail to protect the carrier from responsibility for the gross negligence of its employees. Ill. Central R. R. Co. v. Read, 37 Ill. 484; 19 Ib. 136; The Ind. Cen. R. R. Co. v. Mundy, 21 Ind. 48; Penn. R. R. Co. v. McCloskey's Adm'r, 23 Pa. St. 532; Mobile and Ohio Railway v. Hopkins, 41 Ala. 489.

There are two distinct considerations upon which the stringent rule as to the duty and liability of carriers of passengers rests. One is a regard for the safety of the passenger on his own account, and the other is a regard for his safety as a citizen of the state. The latter is a consideration of public policy growing out of the interest which the state or government, as parens patriæ, has in protecting the lives and limbs of its subjects. Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, §24; C. P. & A. R. R. Co. v. Curran, 19 Ohio State, 12; Phil. & Reading R. R. Co. v. Derby, supra; Steamboat New World v. King, supra; Smith v. N. Y. Central R.

Digitized by Google

R. Co., 24 N. Y. 222; Ill. C. R. R. Co. v. Read, supra; Penn. R. R. Co. v. Henderson, 51 Penn. State, 315; Bissell v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co., 25 N. Y. 455, per DENIO, J.; N. Y. Central R. R. Co. v. Lockwood (U. S. Cupreme Court), not yet reported [17 Wall, 357].

So far as as the consideration of public policy is concerned, it cannot be over-ridden by any stipulation of the parties to the contract of passenger carriage, since it is paramount from its very nature. No stipulation of the parties in disregard of it, or involving its sacrifice in any degree, can then be permitted to stand.

Whether the case be one of a passenger for hire—a merely gratuitous passenger—or of a passenger upon a conditioned free pass, as in this instance, the interest of the state in the safety of the citizen is obviously the same. The more stringent the rule as to the duty and liability of the carrier, and the more rigidly it is enforced, the greater will be the care exercised, and the more approximately perfect the safety of the passenger. Any relaxation of the rule as to duty or liability naturally, and it may be said inevitably, tends to bring about a corresponding relaxation of care and diligence upon the part of the carrier. We can conceive of no reason why these propositions are not equally applicable to passengers of either of the kinds above mentioned.

It is said, however, that is unreasonable "to suppose that the managers of a railroad train will lessen their vigilance and care for the safety of the train and its passengers, because there may be a few on board for whom they are not responsible." In the first place, if this consideration were allowed to prevail, it would prove too much; for it could be urged with equal force and propriety in the case of a merely gratuitous passenger as in a case like this at bar. Yet, as we have seen, no such consideration is permitted to relieve the carrier from the same degree of liability for a gratuitous passenger as for a passenger for hire.

Again, suppose (what is not at all impossible or improbable, as, for instance, in case of a free excursion,) that most or all of the passengers upon a train were gratuitous, or riding upon conditioned free passes, the consideration urged would be no answer to a claim that the carrier should be responsible. A general rule can hardly be based upon such calculations of chances. Moreover, while it might not ordinarily occur that the presence of a free passenger upon a train, for injury to whom the carrier would not be liable, would tend to lessen the carrier's sense of responsibility and his vigilance, it still remains true that the greater the sense of responsibility, the greater the care; and that any relaxation of responsibility is dangerous. Besides these considerations, it is to be remembered that the care and vigilance which a carrier exercises do not depend alone upon a mere sense of responsibility, or upon the existence of an abstract rule imposing stringent obligations upon him. It is the enforcement of the rule and of the liability imposed thereby—the mulcting of the carrier for his negligence—which brings home to him in the most practical, forcible, and effectual way, the necessity for strictly fulfilling his obligations.

It may be that on a given occasion the gratuitous passenger, or the passenger upon a free pass, is the only person injured (as, for aught that appears, was the fact in this instance), or the only party who will proceed against the carrier — the only person who will practically enforce upon the carrier the importance of a faithful discharge of his duty. These considerations, as it seems to us, ought to be decisive upon the point that sound public policy requires that the rule as to the liability of the carrier for the safety of the passenger should not be relaxed though the passenger be gratuitous, or, as in this case, riding upon a conditioned free pass.

It is contended that there was no proof of gross negligence on defendant's part, and that therefore the verdict was not justified. There was evidence that the train was a mixed train; that it was running from 40 to 45 miles an hour, according to the plaintiff, and according to the other witnesses from 15 to 22 miles an hour; that the lumber was upon a platform car, and that the stake of the lumber car, in consequence of the breaking of which the injury occurred, was a stick of butternut cord wood, and was cross-grained. There was also the testimony of J. T. Maxfield, of St. Paul, a passenger, who appears to be an intelligent and entirely disinterested witness, and who says: "I felt anxious about the lumber car. I was afraid of the speed. * * * I was apprehensive of danger from the character of our train. I spoke to the brakesman about it. * * Have traveled on trains a good deal." And taking all these facts together (to say nothing about others appearing in the case), it cannot be said that there was not evidence in the case proper to be considered by the jury, and having some reasonable tendency to establish negligence, which has been well described as being a negative word signifying the absence of such care as it is the duty of the negligent party to exercise in the particular case. Grill v. Iron Screw Collier Co., Law Rep. 1 C. P. 612; Steamboat New World v. King, supra. We will go further even, and say that the evidence, in our opinion, had a reasonable tendency to establish gross negligence in the sense of a great degree of negligence. Angell on Carriers, §22.

As to the point of the degree of negligence necessary to sustain this action, it is, however, to be remarked, in view of the stringent rule as to liability, that where the question is between a railway carrier of passengers and a passenger, there would seem to be no occasion for the ordinary distinction of different degrees of negligence, as slight ordinary and gross. As is well and forcibly said by Mr. Justice GRIER, in Phil. & Read. R. R. Co. v. Derby, supra: "When carriers undertake to convey persons by the powerful but dangerous agency of steam, public policy and safety require that they be held to the greatest possible care and diligence. And whether the consideration for such transportation be pecuniary or otherwise, the personal safety of the passengers should not be left to the sport of chance or the negligence of careless agents. Any negligence in such cases may well deserve the epithet of 'gross.'" So, in Steamboat New World v. King, Mr. Justice CURTIS, referring to the doctrine thus announced, says: "We desire to be understood to reaffirm that doctrine as resting not only on public policy, but on sound principles of law." A similar view of the impracticability of a distinction between different kinds of negligence, as applicable to cases of this kind, is taken in Perkins v. N. Y. Central R. R. Co., supra. The carrier being bound to exercise the greatest care, and being liable for the slightest neglect, what is said by Rolfe, B., in Wilson v. Brett, 11 Mees. & Welsby, 113, and endorsed by WILLIS, J., in Grill v. Iron Screw Collier Co., Law Rep., 1 C. P. 612, is in point in a caes of this kind, viz., that he "could see no difference between negligence and gross negligence; that it was the same thing, with the addition of a vituperative epithet." See also Angell on Carriers, §22, and Briggs v. Taylor, 28 Vt. 180.

It is further argued on behalf of the defendant, that the plaintiff, by his own negligence, contributed to the injury sustained, and for that reason he cannot recover. This argument is founded upon the fact that plaintiff was in the baggage car at the time of the accident, and, as defendant contends, wrongfully there. But, in the first place, the evidence is conflicting as to whether or not the plaintiff was informed of the rule of the company excluding passengers from the baggage car. If he was not so informed, and was suffered to remain there without objection, it could hardly be said that his presence there was negligence. Dunn v. Grand Trunk Railway, 58 Maine, 187. Again, if it be admitted that the plaintiff was duly informed of the regulation of the company excluding passengers from the baggage car, the evidence shows that he was at least permitted to remain there by the conductor. If he was thus permitted to remain, so that he was there with the knowlege of the conductor, and without any attempt on the part of the conductor to enforce the company's rule by removing him, his presence there would not be such negligence as would exonerate the defendant from the consequences of its negligence or want of care. On the contrary, his presence there under such circumstances would render it the duty of the company, in view of the fact that he was there, to exercise the highest care required for his safety, and to refrain from the slightest neglect tending to his injury. Dunn v. Grand Trunk Railway, supra; Isbel v. N. Y. & New Haven Railway Co., 27 Conn. 303; 2 Redfield Railway Cases, 474–502. Still again, admitting that the plaintiff was cognizant of the rule of the company excluding passengers from the baggage car, and that he persisted in remaining there without the permission or consent, yet with the knowledge of, the conductor. and was guilty of negligence in so doing, this negligence would not prevent his recovering unless it was contributory to the injury received. To be thus contributory in a legal sense, it must be a proximate cause of the injury—that is, it must have been near in the order of causation (Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, 37–38), and it must have contributed to some extent directly to the injury, and must have been not a mere technical or formal wrong, contributing either incidentally or remotely, or not at all, to the injury. Isbel v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co., supra; 2 Redfield R. cases, 485–490. Now, notwithstanding the fault or negligence of the plaintiff in remaining in the baggage car, and admitting that the baggage car was a place of greater danger than the passenger car, and that the plaintiff would not have been injured if he had not been there, his presence there, with the knowledge of the conductor, made it defendant's duty to exercise care to avoid injuring him while there; and if injury resulted from want of such care, the defendant is liable. Isbel v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co., supra.

Digitized by Google

If the iniury resulted from want of such care, i. e., negligence on defendant's part, such negligence, and not plaintiff's fault in being in the baggage car, would be the immediate and direct — the more proximate — cause of the injury, and defendant would be responsible for the same. Isbel v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R Co., supra; C. C. & C. R. R. Co. v. Elliot, 4 Ohio State, 476; Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, §25; Keith v. Pinkham, 43 Maine, 503; Huelsenkamp v. Citizens' Railway Co., 37 Mo. 537; Richmond v. Sac. V. R. R. Co., 18 Cal. 351; Lackawanna & Bloomsburgh R. R. Co. v. Chenewith, 52 Penn. State, 386.

In our opinion there was evidence in the case for the consideration of the jury in reference to these views of the law, and from which they might reasonably find that plaintiff's negligence in this case was not contributory to the injury received by him.

These considerations dispose of the case, the result being that the order denying a new trial is

AFFIRMED.

[Communicated.]

A Great Trial.

I had the good fortune to be present at the trial of General Geo. W. Cole (brother of Senator Cornelius Cole of California), at Albany, New York, in the forepart of December, 1868, for the murder of Hon. L. Harris Hiscock, a member of the New York State Constitutional Convention. The trial was one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of the kind that ever took place in this country, and, I think, presented the ablest array of lawyers ever grouped together in a capital case in America. No man was ever more ably defended than Gen. Cole. Nothing was wanting in the defence that ability could devise or money procure. The facts were plain and undisputed. Gen. Cole, believing that his wife had been seduced by Hiscock, was seized by a fit of madness at Syracuse, and rushed off to Albany, a distance of 150 or 200 miles, searched out Hiscock, found him at Stanwix Hall, a hotel, and shot him down in his tracks without warning. Hiscock probably never knew who or what hurt him, as Cole approached him from behind, was unseen by him, and he died almost instantly. The following lawyers were engaged in the case: For the prosecution, Hon. Henry Smith, district attorney, an able lawyer; and Hon. Lyman Tremaine (successful defender of Stokes and prosecutor of Tweed, and now member of Congress at Large) of Albany; Hon. Charles B. Sedgwick, among the ablest; and Frank Hiscock (brother of the killed man), also distinguished at the bar, from Syracuse. For the defence, the attorney of record, Wm. J. Hadley, Esq., distinguished for his energy, method and correctness of procedure, and legal acumen in criminal matters; and Hon. Amasa J. Parker, a walking encyclopedia of law, and withal an able advocate, both of Albany; O. M. Mitchell, Esq., of Syracuse, an inimitable examiner of witnesses, and erudite in the law of criminal evidence; Hon. William A. Beach, then of Troy, New York, but now of New York city, second to no man in the United States in all that goes to make up a great advocate; and lastly, the brilliant and invincible James T. Brady, also of New York city. The trial was presided over by Hon. HENRY HOGEBOOM, of Hudson, then about seventy years of age, one of the most profound jurists and able judges in the state, who held the scales of justice so evenly and impartially that it was impossible to tell what his opinions were as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. The trial was protracted, lasting eight or ten days, during which every principle or theory of law applicable to the case, was most learnedly and elaborately discussed and sifted to the bottom by the counsel, and decided by the court with great deliberation. Mr. Hadley opened the case to the jury on the part of the defence, and took the bold and imminent stand of justification by the seduction of Mrs. Cole by Hiscock, and in a two-hours' address sought to prove by reason and citations of law and cases in point (among which was the case of General Sickles), that the avenger ought to go free. Mr. Smith and Mr. Tremain summed up the case for the people, and Messrs. Mitchell, Beach and Brady for the prisoner. Mr. Beach's address was a masterpiece of ability, truly great, eloquent and ennobling, but not as well calculated to pursuade the jury as that of Mr. Brady. I had never before seen Mr. Brady to recognize him, consequently, when he arose to conclude the argument for the defence, I was disappointed at his appearance. He was the most ill-favored of all the lawyers in the case; somewhere about the medium height, his corpulence gave him the appearance of being extremely short, which, with a large head set down closely upon broad shoulders, completed the exact ideal of an over-fed, lazy, obtuse, loggerheaded New York alderman. He began by felicitating himself and the court upon past associations and experiences; paid the judge a deserved tribute of commendation and praise for the impartiality and ability with which he had presided at the trial; asked the indulgence of the court while he discharged the awful duty of making the final plea for his client's life, and supplicated forbearance from counsel, court and jury for anything he might say, in the ardor and excitement of the occasion, which transcended the limits of the case or the proprieties of the event, should he be so unfortunate. This part of his address consumed at least half an hour, and seemed to be entirely superfluous, but the result proved it to be otherwise. I well recollect how the members of the bar looked into each other's faces eagerly and blankly, and enquired what on earth Mr. Brady was "driving at," and why he was so prodigal of time as to squander it in that way? for he was limited to two hours. The length of this article and a defective memory will not allow me to give a full report, or even a synopsis, of this remarkable effort of one who was reputed to be among America's greatest advocates; and I shall therefore be excused from doing more than giving a brief outline and such extracts as my memory has retained. The defence was: First, justifiable homicide, as stated by Mr. Hadley in his opening; and, second, insanity, melancholia, or an uncontrollable frenzy, induced by by the acts of the adulterer, which possessed the prisoner at the time of the killing, and made him irresponsible. Mr. Brady is credited with originating the "melancholia" and "uncontrollable frenzy" of the latter defence. Unlike that of Mr. Beach, his speech was made up entirely of "small talk," and his illustrations were all common-place, and of the simplest character. He talked of "whittling spiggots for cider barrels," and accompanied his conversation—for that was all it was—with the motions of the act of whittling. He spoke of horses, dogs, cats and canary birds, and used numerous other common objects to demonstrate his theory of the defendant's irresponsibility. Beginning at the act of killing, he entered the dominion of the philosophy of human action, and carried the minds of the jurors from the effect of the defendant's act of killing to the cause of that effect; enlarged upon the theory of "uncontrollable" frenzy and "melancholia," and showed the almost uncontrollable impulse with which one is possessed when a pet cat or dog is, without cause, ruthlessly murdered by a cruel ruffian, to avenge the wrong. "Suppose," said he, "you had a beautiful canary bird, which through a series of years, had become endeared to you by its blithesome song and loving antics, as it fluttered about your apartments, thus relieving care and making life happier; at an unexpected moment, and in your very presence, some inhuman wretch strikes it down, crushing and mutilating its beautiful form, and extinguishing forever the warbled harmony with which you have been beguiled from care and fascinated to an extraordinary degree of delight. Would you not be seized by an impulse well-nigh amounting to uncontrollable frenzy, which would inevitably impel you to strike down the atrocious miscreant, and ought you to be held accountable for the act? If such impulses govern you at such a time, what bounds could be set to the fury and distraction that would surely attend the robbery of the virtue of the darling wife of your bosom, and the murder of your domestic peace and happiness?" He then dwelt upon Gen. Cole's military history; took him from home to do battle for his country, representing him as going from home with a light heart to the tune of "The girl I left behind me," to join the Union army; he eulogised the chivalry and heroism by which he was advanced to be a brigadier general; decorated him with the laurels of victory, and pictured him as returning home again to deck his hearthstone with his laurels, and share his well-earned glory with the adored being of his heart. "But," said he, "what did he find there? Alas! that hearthstone was desecrated; the spoiler had been there. Where joy and brightness had reigned luxuriantly, sorrow and gloom were. That beautiful fabric of domestic love and tranquility was overwhelmed in ruin, and the ravens of despair were croaking and gloating over the dark desolation. Gentlemen, what is home without its jewels; what is earth without its flowers; what is heaven without its stars? What would you have done under the weight of such an appalling calamity—what wouldn't you have done? I will tell you what I would have done." Then extending his hands upward, and looking heavenward, throwing his head back and his chest out, with slow utterance and impressive solemnity, he exclaimed, "S-o h-e-l-p m-e G-o-d A-l-m-i-g-h t-y! I would have immolated him on the spot!" He concluded his argument with a reference to the history of Julius Cæsar. "He was one of the greatest men that ever lived in his sphere of activity and life. He was assaulted in the senate chamber and killed. He was struck down by daggers as he stood erect in his toga, and never bowed his head. His best friend—the Hiscock of that day—struck the last blow at his heart. He exclaimed as that friend struck him, 'Et tu Brute!' and fell at the foot of Pompey's Pillar. He, also, experienced the pangs of knowing that it was his most trusted friend that struck him to the heart—

Digitized by Google

'For when the noble Cæsar saw him stab,
Ingratitude, more strong than traitor's arms,
Quite vanquished him.'

"Men may think that they are wise, and can stand any shock that may be given to them, but it remains to be known what may happen when a calamity such as was visited upon the prisoner shall befall them. When you, gentlemen, shall sit down to your Christmas dinners, your families may enquire what has become of the prisoner. I believe that you will be able to say that the prioner is free, and as ready to receive the congratulations of his friends as you will be."

As I have previously remarked, Mr. Brady's suavity to the court was, in fact, well timed, for it procured him an extension of time of half an hour, so that he consumed full two and a half hours with his argument. This was the last trial of note in which he was engaged, and his last great effort, as he died the following spring or summer. I am told he received $10,000 his services in this case. He was under his physician's care at this trial, and barely able to discharge the duty assigned him—that of speaking finally for the defence. Sometime after Mr. Brady's death I met Mr. Beach, and in a conversation with him, the conversation turning upon the Cole trial, asked him what he thought of Mr. Brady's speech, and whether or not it met his expectations.

"Ah! poor Brady, he was on his last legs," said he in reply. "I own I was greatly disappointed at the time, and entertained the opinion that the speech would have damned a tyro at the bar. But since then, after analyzing it in my own mind, I have come to consider it a remarkable effort. True, it was not great in the ordinary acceptation of the word, yet it was indeed wise and sagacious to the end in view—the convincement of the jury; by it he made himself thoroughly understood; and when he sat down, the case was virtually disposed of. Judging of Mr. Brady's ability by this address, I would not call him great, as he was generally reputed to be. He had a national reputation, but I judge it was attributable chiefly to the wonderful success before juries, and the secret of that success was his marvelous faculty of convincing. As he stood before you, his solemn earnestness, his humble manner, his plain action, his homely language, his simplicity of thought, expression and illustration, all told you that he was there to achieve success solely, and not to make a display of his own ability, if he had any. That to accomplish his purpose he desired, at the point of reason, to persuade and convince, not dazzle, fascinate and enthrall; and that impassioned eloquence, great thoughts, elegant diction, graceful gesticulation, and splendid flights of imagination, were not legitimate and sure means to that end, neither appropriate to the solemn occasion."

Mr. Brady found in Mr. Tremain a "foeman worthy of his steel." He closed the argument for the prosecution, and acquitted himself admirably. I can only recall one of the fine retorts which he made. The defence, among the arguments put forth in justification of the killing, referred to the fact that there was no statute law in New York making adultery a crime and punishing it as such, although there ought to be, and that, therefore, the defendant had no other redress than to avenge the wrong as he had done, the law affording him no remedy. Mr. Tremain called the attention of the jury to this reasoning and said: "It is recorded in Irish history that under the benign and auspicious reign of King Brian, the people were inspired by such a lofty sentiment and spirit of honor, virtue and religion, that a young and beautiful woman, adorned with jewels and costly dress, made a journey alone from one end of the kingdom to the other, with a wand only in her hand, at the top of which was a ring of great value. Yet no attempt was made upon her honor, nor was she robbed of her costly apparel or precious jewels. Ireland's great poet, Thomas Moore, has celebrated the event in these noble lines:

Rich and rare were the gems she wore
And a bright gold ring on her wand she bore;
But, oh! her beauty was far beyond
Her sparkling gems, or snow-white wand.

'Lady, dost thou not fear to stray
So lone and lovely through this bleak way?
Are Erin's sons so good or so cold,
As not to be tempted by woman or gold?'

'Sir Knight! I feel not the least alarm,
No son of Erin will offer me harm;
For though they love woman and golden store,
Sir Knight! they love honor and virtue more!'

On she went, and her maiden smile
In safety lighted her round the green isle;
And blest forever is she who relied Upon Erin's honor and Erin's pride.

"Such is the proud character of our free and happy country. Here woman is exalted to a station of nobility; her virtue venerated, and her honor protected and vindicated with a spirit of devotion and chivalry surpassed by no other nation on the globe. Here she may, as did the Irish maiden of old, go throughout the whole length and breadth of this fair land, however beautiful and attractive she may be, and still, if she will, retain her virtue untarnished and honor unsullied, and I hurl back the assertion that a statute is necessary to protect the chastity of American women, to the source from which it came as an atrocious calumny upon their character, fair fame and honor."

Mr. Tremain should be heard to be fully appreciated. His address, a masterpiece of ability and eloquence, was frequently interrupted by the applause of the audience.

Judge HOGEBOOM'S charge was a rare specimen of judicial excellence. The law enunciated was substantially as held in these cases: People v. Freeman, 4 Denio, Reports; People v. Willis, 32 N. Y.; People v. Obrien, 36 N. Y. "We are not here," said he, "to administer sympathy, but to execute justice; to carry into effect the laws of the land; to enforce their solemn mandates, and not to nullify or relax their positive commands by misplaced sympathy or morbid clemency. If our duty is clear, we foreswear ourselves if we do not perform it. I have taken a general oath faithfully to perform the duties of my office; you have taken a special oath well and truly to try, and true deliverance make between the people of the state of New York and George W. Cole, and a true verdict render according to the evidence, so help you God. This duty we must discharge at whatever hazard, whether painful or agreeable; neither manhood nor honor, the restraints of conscience, nor the the solemn mandates of the law, allow us to decline its performance, or hesitate at its execution. Many laws may not be in precise accordance with our views of policy, or even of strict justice, yet it would lead to the utmost confusion and injustice should we refuse to execute them. If we are dissatisfied, we should apply at the proper time to the proper form for their amendment, or seek to avert their excessive rigor by an appeal to executive clemency. Certainly it is to be regretted, if further legal enactments could be of any avail to restrain the unholy passions and devilish acts of the seducer and adulterer, that they have not heretofore been made. But the wisdom and efficiency of such enactments have been questioned. It is enough for us to know that we must administer the law as it is, and have no right to usurp legislative power, and apply to a past transaction laws of our own creation. Let us content ourselves with administering the law as we find it in our own appointed sphere of duty. Then shall we have a conscience void of offence toward all men, and the happy consciousness that in the spirit of our oaths, and in conformity with the obligations which rest upon us, we have, as faithful and law-abiding citizens, executed the laws of the land. You have a higher duty to discharge than either to please or to offend the prisoner or the people. You are to find a true verdict according to the facts established before you. You are to declare it without fear or favor, and without reference to the wishes of either side. True indeed, if under the influence of the evidence you conclude the prisoner's reason to have been dethroned, and he was not, at the time of this transaction, an intelligent agent, having not the power of mental discrimination between right and wrong in regard to the particular transaction which you are undertaking to investigate, he must stand acquitted before you upon the ground of criminal irresponsibility. But if he had this power of mental discrimination and could distinguish in regard to the moral qualities of his conduct, then, notwithstanding your pity for the man, and your sympathy for the sufferer, you must condemn the criminal, and especially you must not be led aside from the path of duty by a recollection of the severe rupture which has taken place in his domestic relations, unless the deceased is proven to have been connected therewith, and, in some sense, the author thereof, so as justly to call down upon himself, within the limits of the law, the just vengeance of an injured husband. These injuries, at least the intelligence of them, which was communicated to him, were of the most heartrending character, and must, of necessity, excite the ardent sympathy of every feeling heart. It may be difficult, perhaps impossible, wholly to divest ourselves of these feelings, but we shall fail to meet the stern and inexorable necessities of this hour, if we allow them to turn us aside from the path which the law has appointed for us to tread. That path is the path of duty; that duty is to find a verdict according to law and evidence; and whether it enjoins upon you the agreeable task of pronouncing a verdict of acquittal, because the evidence fails to satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the prisoner, or of his responsibility for crime; or the painful one of pronouncing a verdict of conviction, because the evidence satisfies you, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the prisoner's guilt and responsibility for crime, you will, I doubt not, acquit yourselves like men; and without fear or favor, without partiality or prejudice, discharge the solemn and responsible trust which the law has imposed upon you on this occasion. In this confidence I commit this case into your hands for your final deliberation and verdict."

Digitized by Google

The jury retired, and after an absence of several hours returned into court and rendered a verdict of "Not guilty," which was received with immense applause by the large audience present. And thus ended this great trial.

JOHN D. PARKS.

[Correspondence.]

Word Shrubbery.

BOSTON, July 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Jean Paul Richter, in his third preface to Hesperus, written at Baireuth in the fourth lustre of the present century, in contrasting the English language with the German, in which he wrote, said: "How entangled, and wild with foreign growth, after some centuries, will the English language, with its native but powerless stem, full of engrafted word shrubbery, capable only of inoculation, and fetching back from its duplicate, America, more new words than wares, be." At the expiration of half a century since Jean Paul so wrote, it is certain that "word shrubbery" is not on the increase, but rather on the decline both in England and in America; and especially is this true of law books and the written opinions of courts. A quarter of a century ago Judge FLETCHER wrote an opinion in Gregg v. Wyman. He was an able judge, and withal a good lawyer, yet, in that opinion he says: "It is a sound and wholesome principle that he who comes to ask the aid of a court of justice should come with clean hands." Of course the judge meant something else than what he said—as when the unlettered man of to-day says: "I don't take much stock in your remarks" means he don't believe what you say. Judge Fletcher had borrowed this "principle," as he calls it, from the English judges; and so significant did he deem it, that he states it a second time in the same opinion. It is no doubt true that it is "wholesome"—that is it conduces to health and happiness, and thereby, I suppose, to virtue also, that not only parties, but witnesses and counsel, not now to speak of judges, should come to the performance of their several duties in court with clean hands, which, alas! I am witness they do not always do. But this was not what Judge FLETCHER meant. I do not dispute the significance of the maxim, because, I suppose, everybody understands what is meant by it, and what is meant is true and important; but what is meant is not what is said, and, therefore, what is said is "word shrubbery" or gibberish. My point is, there is less such now, especially in law opinions, than when Jean Paul wrote.

Since Dr. Franklin there has been another "maxim" supposed to be worthy of his wisdom, that—"Every tub should stand on its own bottom." This, too, needs explanation. To say that it is safer and therefore better, that a tub should stand on its bottom rather than on the bottom of another tub, is, perhaps, open to no more serious animadversion than that of Lord Ellenborough, when Mr. Preston, a once famous English conveyancer, began an erudite harangue by saying: "An estate in fee simple, my lords, is the highest estate known to the law of England," whereupon Lord Ellenborough said: "Stay there; let me take that down," which having done, and read it over very deliberately, he added: "The court is much indebted to you for the information, sir."

Outside the profession, but in what I suppose was claimed as politer society, a quarter of a century or more ago, there was, I believe, a "maxim" that—"Every man must skin his own skunks." Now, to all except perhaps the exceptionably learned, this certainly needs explanation. If one really owned a skunk, and insisted upon his being skinned, since it is not known that skunk skinning has come to be a profession or established calling, there is no apparent injustice, except to the skunk, in one skinning his own. Indeed it might be better that one should do so rather than require his table-servant to do it for him. But the truth which this maxim illustrates, if any, is beyond my learning. The vice in writings in which these "maxims" are employed, is, that each such sentence must have its fellow—its expositive—as Mr. Choate remarked of a second presidential message, of his time, following soon after the first, and relating to the same matter. The second message was needful to tell us what the first one meant. I still insist the style in writing is simpler and clearer than formerly. But England is not indebted to Mr. Carlyle nor America Mr. to Emerson for this simpler style. Something is due to Mr. Macauley, and to the new readings of Plato and Spinoza—the best writer "top of the earth" when he lived in Amsterdam.

PELHAM.

Notes and Queries.

We thank "Milwaukee Subcriber" for the following. We hope other subscribers will take sufficient interest in each other's perplexities to follow his example, and help us make our department of Notes and Queries useful and interesting.

MILWAUKEE, July 20th, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I notice among the Notes and Queries in your issue of July 16 an enquiry from "Carthage Subscriber," as to the construction of the Missouri statute for a change of venue where there are several defendants and the application is made by one only. If I am not mistaken, the Missouri statute resembles the one we have in Wisconsin, and your correspondent will find that question discussed in the case of Wolcott v. Wolcott, et al. 32 Wis. 63. In the case cited there were four defendants, one of whom had made no appearance. The other three joined in one answer, charging among other things, that the fourth defendant was really interested with the plaintiff. An application for change of venue was made by the three defendants, based on the affidavit of one only of their number, that he believed the judge was prejudiced against him and his co-defendants, naming the other two. This application was granted and the plaintiff appealed from the order granting the change of venue on the ground that the words "any party" in the statute meant all the parties on one side, and that the fourth defendant should have joined in the application. The supreme court sustained the order changing the venue, but Judge LYON, in his opinion takes occasion to say:

Digitized by Google

"Suppose one of two plaintiffs makes the required affidavit of the prejudice of the judge and applies for a change of the place of trial, and the other plaintiff does not join in the application, but prefers that the case be tried in the court in which it was commenced. In such case the rights of the plaintiff who does not join in the application are certainly equal to those of his co-plaintiff, and it seems very clear that the statute ought not to be so construed as to give the latter control of the action in this particular to the exclusion of the former." MILWAUKEE SUBSCRIBER.

Book Notice.

AMERICAN RAILWAY REPORTS: A collection of all reported decisions relating to Railways, Vols. 1, 2. New York. James Cockcroft & Co. 1873, 1874.

The purpose of this series of Reports, the first volume being edited by J. H. Truman, Esq., of Chicago, and the second volume by John A. Mallory, Esq., of New York, is to give in full all of the cases decided by the American courts, state and federal, relating to railways, since 1872. The selection of cases here reprinted is good, and the editorial work has been well done, and the volumes will be found useful to the profession.

In view of the fact, however, that we have some sixty or seventy volumes of reports published annually, which it is safe to say, will average three or four cases each relating to railways; and in view of the fact that these volumes will not average over about seventy-five cases each, we think the plan of publishing all railway cases in full not so desirable as to publish the leading and important cases in full, and to give the rest of the cases in the notes by way of abstract and reference. For example: If a decision turns on a local statute, let the editor give the statute in full, state accurately the point decided under it, and in few lines indicate the reasoning of the court. In this way the series can be kept down to one volume a year; will be more popular, and will contain all that is of general value to the profession. Under competent editorial management we feel certain that the plan we suggest is the true one, and we suggest it to the favorable consideration of the enterprising publishers.

Summary of Our Exchanges.

THE Chicago Legal News for July 25, publishes the case of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, in the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, in which Mr. District Judge LOWELL holds that it is not an act of bankruptcy for a railroad corporation to convey its property in trust to secure bonds to be issued and sold, and the proceeds to be applied to pay all its unsecured debts; the same being done bona fide with a view to enable the company to continue its legitimate business, though it may be technically insolvent, or likely soon to be so; and that such a mortgage is not made invalid by the circumstance that the unsecured creditors are offered the right to take the new bonds, or the proceeds of sale thereof, at their election. We do not know how this case got into court, unless the act of 1873, ch. 226, 17 Stat. p. 509, which provides that the bankrupt act shall not apply to the Union Pacific Railroad Company has been repealed.

The Legal News also publishes McQuiddy v. Ware, Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1873, holding that the foreclosure of a mortgage by constructive notice, while the defendant was absent in the Confederate service, was valid. (See ante pp. 66, 226.) Also, Amory v. Amory, United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Wisconsin, (DAVIS and DRUMMOND, JJ), which was a bill of Angelina Amory, claiming as widow and heir-at-law of James Amory, deceased, praying that the defendants, Samuel B. Amory and John Amory, executors, might be enjoined from pleading a decree of divorce by the Superior Court of New York city in bar of proceedings by the complainant to recover the estate of the said James Amory, and praying that the complainant might be adjudged the lawful widow and heir of said James Amory. The bill alleged fraud by the complainant's counsel in the divorce proceedings in the New York court. The court rule the following points:

1. Fraud upon a party by her counsel in a state court will not invalidate a decree where it does not satisfactorily appear that it altered the result.

2. A woman claiming an estate from a man as his widow and heir-at-law, required in this case to give satisfactory proof, independent of her own statement, that she was actually the wife of the deceased.

3. If, soon after decree, the party has knowledge of facts calculated to throw suspicion upon the conduct of her counsel, she is bound to use due diligence in enquiring and in seeking relief, and a delay of eleven years bars any relief against the decree and the consequences of the fraud alleged.

The Legal News also publishes Burr v. The City of Carbondale, in which the Supreme Court of Illinois hold (WALKER, MCALLISTER and CRAIG, JJ., dissenting) that the bonds were issued to secure the location of the university, which was a corporate purpose, under a vote of the people, are in the hands of innocent holders, and must be held valid.

The Legal News, referring to a mistake it made in crediting the opinion in the case of Raffaux to Judge LONGYEAR instead of to Judge HOPKINS—an error which we pointed out in our last issue (ante, p. 367)—adds: "We hope some of our exchanges that are in the habit of reprinting opinions from our columns without credit, will not follow this error. We shall see." We diligently read our legal exchanges, and do not think that any of them is in the habit of copying opinions from the Legal News without crediting them to that journal. Who is it?

The Irish Law Times for July 4 contains a valuable article on the Effect of the Statute of Frauds upon sales at Auction, and another, The Rights in Bankruptcy of Execution Creditor holding a Guarnishee Order. It also contains a number of valuable selections from other journals. Among its reported cases we notice nothing this week of interest to our readers, though we should judge them of much value to practitioners in Ireland.

The Albany Law Journal for July 25 contains an article on Contracts of Married Women, reviewing a number of New York decisions on the subject. It also publishes Judge LONGYEAR's opinion in re Angell, published in our last issue. It also reports Town of Danville v. Pace, Court of Appeals of Virginia, reciting the following point: "After a town had issued its bonds, an act was passed providing that no corporation should interpose the defense of usury. Held, in an action against the town on the bonds, that the act applied to contracts made before its passage, and that defendant could not allege usury." This, the Albany Law Journal thinks is destined to become a leading case on the question involved. The Albany Law Journal also publishes several notes of interesting cases; also its usual abstract of the decisions of the New York Court of Appeals, and brings down the publication of the general statutes of New York as far as the acts past by the last assembly have been signed by the governor.

The Pacific Law Reporter for July 7 publishes the opinions of Justices BRADLEY, HUNT and CLIFFORD in The Mayor, etc., of Nashville v. Ray, on the power of municipal corporations to borrow money and levy taxes. This is a very important case, and we hope to find space to publish it hereafter. It also publishes San Francisco v. Spring Valley Water Company, Supreme Court of California, April Term, 1874, holding that corporate rights or powers cannot be conferred by special grant of the legislature, but can only be derived under general laws; and that a special act of the legislature attempting to grant such powers to a private corporation is void, because in conflict with the constitution of California, section thirty-one of article four. It also reprints from the Legal Intelligencer, an opinion of Mr. Circuit Judge MCKENNAN in Baker v. The ship "Tros," holding that where salvage services are performed merely by the permission of another wrecking company, which has possession of the vessel, and which services are rendered with the understanding that the wrecking company, and not the vessel is to be responsible, the vessel is not liable for such salvage services.

The same journal for July 14 publishes Oregon Steam Navigation Company v. Winsor, which has already appeared in this journal (ante p. 350). Also Howard v. Continental Life Ins. Co., Supreme Court of California, April Term, 1874, which relates to the constructi n of a life insurance endowment policy. Also Langenberger v. Kroeger, Supreme Court of California, April Term, 1874, which relates to an authorized endorsement on a check of the words "payable in gold coin." Also Dailey v. Cox, same term of same court, which construes the California act of February 18, 1864, creating a board of water commissioners for San Bernardino county, with reference to the apportionment of water in an irrigating canal. Also Pennybecker v. McDougal, same court and term, which rules that a house set upon blocks, resting upon the surface of the ground, not attached to the soil, and removable without disturbing the land in any way, is not a part of the realty. So, also, a portable fence is not a part of the realty. And that in replevin for materials out of which improvements on realty have been constructed, only the materials or their value can be recovered and not damages to the freehold. The Law Reporter also publishes People v. Brown, same court and term, relating to challenge to panel of jurors, instructions, and possession of stolen property as evidence of guilt. Also Silvey v. Hodgden, relating to the attack of the credibility of an adverse witness by proof of hostile feeling towards the party against whom the witness is called.

The Legal Gazette (Philadelphia, King & Baird) for July 24, publishes Trask v. Maguire, Supreme Court of the United States, which appeared in this journal for April 9 (ante p. 175.) Also The Great Western Insurance Company v. Fogarty, decided at the last term of the same court. In this case insurance was effected upon machinery, consisting of the parts of a sugar packing machine, on board of the bark Ella Adele, at and from New York to Havana, free from particular average. During the voyage the vessel was driven upon rocks during a violent gale, and abandoned to the underwriters. Parts of the machinery was recovered and tendered to the owner, but refused by him on the ground that the insurance company was liable to him as for a total loss: Held, that the parts tendered not being machinery but merely pieces of iron, worthless as part of the sugar packing machine, the company was liable.

The Legal Gazette also publishes the opinion of Mr. District Judge CADWALLADER in Brady v. The American Steamship Company. This is an exceedingly interesting case, illustrating the law of salvage applied to a case where a vessel in distress is saved by one of the passengers, being himself a seaman. The circumstances were that the steamship Pennsylvania, being in great distress at sea, her captain and first and second officers having been washed overboard and lost, and her third officer failing to exercise the command which thus devolved upon him, Captain Brady, a passenger on board, who was a master navigator, assumed command of the ship and brought it safely through the storm. This was held to be a meritorious salvage service. But the next day, the storm having abated, Captain Brady improperly continued to exercise command, instead of yielding the vessel to the third officer. Because of this illegitimate exercise of authority, the learned judge holds that there must be a reduction of the salvage to which he would otherwise be entitled, and awards him $4,000, with $200 costs.

In Brown v. Commonwealth, published in the same paper, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania rule the interesting point that where two persons are murdered at the same time and place, and apparently by the same person and from the same motive, evidence of commission of the one murder may be given upon the trial of the prisoner for the other.

Legal News and Notes.

—MR. Justice MILLER has gone to Cape May.

—WILLIAM L. DENNIS, a prominent member of the Philadelphia bar, died recently in that city.

—GENERAL A. C. HARDING, a distinguished lawyer, soldier and politician, died recently at his residence at Monmouth, Illinois.

—THE federal attorney-general has decided that auditors and others who are empowered to settle accounts, have the power to administer oaths.

—THE man who attempted to bribe Chief Justice RYAN of Wisconsin, and who "vot for Mr. Taylor," has been fined $100.

—CHIEF JUSTICE GRAY of Massachusetts, having recovered from a recent injury received from the fall of his horse, has gone a fishing with the chief justice of New Brunswick.

—THE Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims met at the state department in Washington on the 24th inst., and promulgated a series of rules of procedure to be observed before them.

—MR. DISTRICT JUDGE CADWALLADER of the federal court at Philadelphia recently awarded $4,000 to Captain Brady for bringing into port the steamship Pennsylvania, after her captain and chief officers had been washed overboard.

—A new law periodical is announced in Paris. It is called the "Journal du Droit International Prive," and will be devoted to the publication of papers in different languages upon the various subjects embraced under the head of Private International Law.

—THE attorney-general of the United States has decided that under section 19 of the new bankrupt law, registers in bankruptcy and United States marshals are not required to make the returns provided for in that section until they are furnished with tabulated forms and directions from the judges of the United States Supreme Court. As the justices can scarcely leave their circuit duty until October, it seems probable that this decision will have the effect to delay proceedings under this section for some months.—Albany Law Journal.

—THE Luzerne Legal Register, in reviewing a western law periodical, says: "It is quite a mistake to suppose that we must always look to the old states for 'the gladsome lights of jurisprudence.' The diversified interests of western life give rise to a great variety of new and important questions, and the ability with which they are discussed and disposed of by the fresh and giant intellects of the West commands our highest admiration." That will do.

—NOTWITHSTANDING her repulse from the Court of Claims, Mrs. Lockwood seems to be driving a lucrative practice. The other day she entered a replevin suit for George F. Rider against the commissioners of the District of Columbia, for unjustly detaining the iron bridges built by him across the Washington canal, which have been taken down, part of them lying in the property yard, useless, being destroyed and stolen. These bridges were at Maryland avenue, Seventh, Tenth, Twelfth, and Fourteenth streets, and the plaintiff represents that having furnished the materials and erected them, and having received but one payment on the same, he has property in them, and prays that they be taken from the defendants and delivered to him. Unless we are very unsound on the law of replevin, Mrs. Lockwood has mistaken her client's remedy.

—A correspondent, writing to the Albany Law Journal, says: "In your Journal of July 4, you discuss the case of State v. Linkhorn, in the trial of which, a witness 'sang a verse,' and you say, 'we are puzzled by the admission in evidence of the imitation of the defendant's style of singing.' There is high authority for it—no less than that of Chief Justice TANEY, who, in the case of Reed v. Carusi, which involved the copyright to the song of the 'Old Arm Chair' allowed, under strenuous objection, the singing by a professional singer of the original song, and the alleged piracy, in the presence of the jury, saying that he 'would make a rule for the case, which he considered a reasonable one, however novel and peculiar it might be.' See the Life of Chief Justice TANEY, p. 312."

—THE Cour de Cassation of Paris has just given judgment in a somewhat curious case. It is customary in many Oriental courts of justice for the advocates as well as the public to take off their shoes on entering, as a sign of respect to the bench. M. Pannoutombi, a native advocate of Pondicherry, some time ago took upon himself to transgress this custom, and to keep his shoes on in the presence of the judges. For this he was suitably admonished; but M. Pannoutombi rebelled, and maintained that he had a right to appear in court with or without his shoes, according to his convenience or fancy. He was in consequence forbidden to practice. M. Pannoutombi appealed to the French minister of justice, who quashed the decision of the court of Pondicherry. The affair was carried before the Cour de Cassation, whose solemn sanction henceforth authorizes M. Pannoutombi to keep his shoes on in the discharge of his professional duties.—Irish Law Times.

—A "DISTINGUISHED practitioner at the Supreme Court bar," has discovered a mare's nest in the bankruptcy amendment. It seems that the revision of the United States Statutes and the amendments to the bankruptcy law were passed on the same day. The act adopting the Revised Statutes provides that the revision shall take effect from December 1, 1873, and repeals all prior acts any portion of which is contained in the revision. In the revision, the bankruptcy act of 1867 is considerably transposed. The amended bankruptcy act, however, amends the sections of the act of 1867—which act was repealed by the revision. It is therefore claimed that the bankruptcy amendment act amended a statute already repealed. A semi-official telegram from Washington announces that "it is all right," inasmuch "as the bill for revision contains a clause providing that it shall be considered as the first bill passed after the meeting in December last, and all other laws passed at the session to be regarded as amendments to the the revision." But we are not quite sure that this obviates the difficulty.—Albany Law Journal.

Notes of Cases.

Our notes of English cases are from the Law Times. Our notes of cases decided in the New York Court of Appeals and in the New York Commission of Appeals are from the Albany Law Journal. Those decided in the Supreme Court of Ohio are from advance sheets of the 24 Ohio State Reports, furnished by Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co., of Cincinnati, or from the American Law Record (Cincinnati). Those decided in the Kentucky Court of Appeals are from the American Law Record. Those decided in the Supreme Court of the United States are from printed opinions in our possession. Those decided by the Supreme Court of Michigan are from Chaney's Quarterly Digest. Others are from cases reported in our exchanges, unless otherwise stated.

Digitized by Google

Will—Specific and Residuary Devises and Bequests—Personalty Insufficient for Payment of Debts—Administration—Claim disallowed—Costs.—Where the personal estate is insufficient for the payment of debts, real estates comprised in a residuary devise are chargeable with the payment of debts in priority to real estates specifically devised. Hensman v. Fryer, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 394; L. Rep. 3 Ch. 420, not followed. The court refused to make any order as to the costs of an unsuccessful claim made by the plaintiff against the testator's estate. Lancefield v. Iggulden, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 156. V. C B.

———. Gift over on Bankruptcy—Personal Enjoyment—Forfeiture of Life Estate.—Testator gave specific legacies, and gave all his residuary real and personal estate to S. and C. upon trust for conversion and investment, and to pay thereout an annuity of £250 to S. and also an annuity to E., and subject thereto and to his debts, the remainder of his real and personal estate to be held in trust for C. for life, or until he should become bankrupt or insolvent, or do or suffer anything which but for that provision would deprive him of the personal enjoyment, in which case there was a gift over. S. and C. were appointed executors. Testator died in June, 1870, considerably indebted. His personal estate not specifically bequeathed was under £20. C. was adjudicated bankrupt in July, 1871. In January, 1872, a scheme for arrangement of the bankrupt's affairs, by paying 20s. in the pound was made, and the bankruptcy was annulled, and an order was made vesting his property in S. In January, 1873, the order vesting the bankrupt's property in S. was rescinded. Prior to his bankruptcy C. had received the rents of the testator's real estate, but since then S. had received them. The rents had been applied towards paying the testator's debts, and the annuities so far as they would extend, but S.'s own annuity was in arrear, as the rents were not sufficient to pay it in full. C. had received nothing for his own use. Held, that as C. had not been deprived of the personal enjoyment of the residuary estate, there had been no forfeiture of his life interest. Robins v. Rose, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 152. V. C. B.

———. Devise of all Lands and Hereditaments—Strict Settlement—Leaseholds—Contrary Intention.—The 26th section of the Wills Act throws the onus probandi upon those who assert that a devise of "lands" does not include leasehold estates in land, but that onus is satisfied by showing from the whole will sufficient grounds to satisfy a reasonable man that the testator did not intend by the word "lands" to pass leasehold estates. A testator, by his will made in 1861, devised all his messuages, lands and hereditaments in the county of Middlesex, and all other lands and hereditaments in England belonging to him, to the use of his eldest son for life, with remainder to his eldest son's issue in tail male, with an ultimate remainder to his own right heirs. He also bequeathed all his money, securities for money, goods, chattels and personal estate to trustees upon trusts corresponding with the trusts of the hereditaments thereinbefore devised in strict settlement, but so that the same should not vest absolutely in any person thereby made tenant in tail by purchase unless such person should attain twenty-one. As to the devised realty, the will contained a power of sale, empowering the trustees to invest the proceeds of any sale in the purchase of freeholds or leaseholds convenient to be held therewith. The will also contained a bequest of certain chattels and heirlooms in strict settlement, so far as the rules of law and equity would permit. The testator, both as to any leaseholds to be purchased under the power, and as to the chattels, repeated the proviso that the same should not vest absolutely in any person thereby made tenant in tail by purchase, unless such person should attain twenty-one. At the time of his death, the testator was possessed of both freehold and leasehold estates in the county of Middlesex. Held (affirming the decision of Malins, V. C.), that the leaseholds did not pass under the devise of lands and hereditaments by virtue of the 26th section of the Wills Act, inasmuch as there was sufficient indication of a contrary intention appearing on the face of the will, but that they passed under the ultimate bequest of personal estate. Prescott v. Barker, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 149. Chan.

———. Construction—Bequest of Residue to Charities—Pure and Impure Personalty—Marshalling—Mortmain Act.—J. M., who died in March, 1866, by will in July, 1855, after appointing executors and trustees, and bequeathing legacies specific and pecuniary, and giving certain annuities, said, "as to all the residue and remainder of my personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, which I may be possessed of or entitled to at the time of my decease, I give and bequeath the same as follows, namely: one equal third part or share thereof to St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington, aforesaid, one other equal third part or share thereof to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and the remaining one equal third part or share thereof to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and my will is, and I expressly direct, that the three last-mentioned legacies or bequests shall respectively be paid and satisfied out of such part of my personal estate as can lawfully be applied to the payment thereof, and which shall be reserved by my trustees, or trustee, for the time being for that purpose, and that such legacies and shares of residue shall respectively be applied to the purposes of the said hospital and societies respectively, and the receipts of the respective treasurers of said hospital and societies repectively, shall be sufficient discharges for the same respectively." The suit was one for administration, and the question raised was as to the marshalling of debts, legacies, and annuities. Held, that the direction that the charitable bequests were to be satisfied out of such part of the testator's personal estate as could lawfully be applied to the payment thereof, and which should be reserved for that purpose, was a plain direction to marshal the assests, so as to give the charities the fullest benefit they were capable of taking. Miles v. Harrison, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 152. Chan.

Practice—Money advanced by Trustee—Interest.—A trustee will be allowed interest upon money advanced by him, and applied in payment of his testator's debts, or otherwise on account of his personal estate. Finch v. Prescott, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 156. V. C. B.

Injunction—Trespass—Waste.—The defendant, to an action of ejectment to recover a piece of woodland, adduced evidence of adverse possession for more than twenty years, and the action was discontinued. Subsequently the plaintiff in the action from time to time walked in the wood, and turned his cattle into it, in order to assert his alleged right, and to bar the Statute of Limitations. At length he cut down a tree in the wood, whereupon the defendant to the action filed his bill for an injunction. Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that as the result of the action of ejectment showed the defendant to that action to be in possession of the wood, he was entitled to the injunction. Lowndes v. Bettle, 10 L. T. Rep., N. S. 55; 33 L. J. 431 Ch.; approved and followed. Stanford v. Hurlstone, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 140. Chan.

Action against a Carrier for a Homicide Committed by a Passenger—Negligence.—This is an action to recover damages for the death of A. D. Putnam, plaintiff's intestate, who was killed by William Foster. It appeared upon the trial that plaintiff's intestate, in company with two females, took passage upon defendant's car. Foster, who was intoxicated, subsequently got on the front platform of the car, and after riding there a short distance opened the door of the car and insulted and annoyed the ladies. Putnam requested the conductor to make Foster keep quiet; the conductor directed him to sit down and be quiet; he sat down near Putnam, and after the conductor returned to the rear platform, addressed to Putnam abusive and threatening language in a low tone not audible to the conductor. After remaining a short time he returned to the front platform, where he remained quietly until Putnam left the car, when he jumped therefrom with the car hook, and as Putnam was assisting his companions to alight, Foster struck him with the car hook, causing his death. Held, that the evidence did not show a neglect of duty on the part of the conductor, or want of proper care and vigilance on the part of any of defendant's servants, certainly none connected with the attack upon Putnam, or to which it could be legally or logically traced, and that defendant was not liable. Putnam, Admr'x, &c., v. Broadway & 7th Ave. R. R. Co., N. Y. Court of Appeals. Opinion by ALLEN, J.

Conveyance—Practice.—R. owned certain premises upon which was a saw-mill; he conveyed by metes and bounds that portion thereof upon which the mill was located, with appurtenances, describing it as his mill property. There was a piece of land between the premises conveyed and the highway which had been used for many years as a way to the mill, and as a mill-yard for storing logs. There was no other access to the mill from the highway, and the use of this piece of land was necessary to the mill as a mill-yard. Held, that the principal thing conveyed carried with it an easement in said land for a way and for a mill-yard.

Also held, that in determining how much passed as an incident appurtenant to the premises conveyed, the necessity of the mill for its full and free enjoyment controls.

Also held, that the fact that the owners of the land subject to such easement had exacted toll for its use as a mill-yard of the occupants of the mill, did not, as against one not showing himself prejudiced thereby, vary the rights of the parties or estop the owner of the mill property and his licensees from insisting upon his actual rights.

The opinion of the grantee in such a deed of the effect thereof, or as to what the effect should be, cannot affect the rights of a subsequent grantee who has bought with a right to rely and relying upon his grantor's title.

A party seeking to enforce the rule that facts, though proven, are not available unless pleaded, must take his ground at the trial, otherwise he cannot avail himself thereof on review. Voorhees v. Burchard, same court. Opinion by FOLGER, J.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor. }
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor. }

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 6, 1874.

{SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

FRAUD AS A GROUND OF ANNULLING MARRIAGE.—We learn from an exchange that a decision has just been made by one of the judges of the Supreme Court of New York, nullifying a marriage on the ground that the woman had been unchaste before wedlock, the fruits of guilt appearing shortly after. It appears that the husband had been deceived. He had heard reports affecting her character, but she had succeeded in convincing him that they were false. The order of the judge was to the effect that the marriage between the parties was obtained by fraud of the defendant, making the same utterly null and void, dissolving it, giving both freedom from the obligation of marriage with each other. The judge ordered the infant child of the parties to be committed to the defendant, and that the defendant pay the plaintiff $50 as the costs of the action. This decision is similar to Carris v. Carris, decided by the Court of Appeals of New Jersey (ante, pp. 235–6), and other cases therein cited.

PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.—The Washington Chronicle undertakes in its editorial columns to enlighten the public on "Why Moulton hesitates to speak," by showing that Moulton acted in the character of an attorney between Beecher and Tilton, and hence is prohibited from telling what he thus learned, his knowledge having been acquired from them under the seal of professional confidence. In support of this view the writer in the Chronicle learnedly quotes several legal authorities. The nonsense of it, however, consists in two facts: 1. That Mr. Moulton is a merchant, and not an attorney. 2. That if he had been an attorney, he was not acting as the legal adviser of either of the parties, but simply as a common friend. In order to be privileged, the communication must have been made to the counsel, attorney, or solicitor, acting, for the time being, in the character of legal adviser. 1 Greenl. Ev., §§ 239–241.

If our American dailies would follow the example of their English contemporaries and maintain a good lawyer upon their editorial staff, they would not drift into such egregious blunders when they undertake to discuss legal subjects. If the law editor of the London Times, or Pall Mall Gazette, had sent such an article to the printer, the next "privileged communication" would have come from his chief editor to him—"never more to be officer of mine."

The Salaries of Judges.

By the new constitution of Ohio the salaries of the supreme court judges are fixed at five thousand dollars per annum. In defending the action of the convention in this respect the committee appointed to prepare an address to the people say: "In learning and general ability these judges ought to occupy the first rank. It can hardly be expected, however, that men of this character will sacrifice the remunerative practice of their profession for a position on the supreme bench at a salary which scarcely pays their expenses. They must remain at the capital for nearly the entire year, where the cost of living has largely advanced. Their families must be supported and educated. When they shall have ceased to serve the state they ought not to be thrown penniless upon the world to begin professional life anew, and depend upon regaining the business they sacrificed to serve it. While in office they are forbidden to engage in any other employment; they ought, therefore to be reasonably rewarded, so that something shall remain to them when age and infirmity shall come upon them. But the whole matter is within the power of the general assembly, which may at its first session, reduce the salary if it see proper." While we are not an advocate of large salaries in a republic, we cannot forbear to express the conviction that the salary thus fixed by the convention is still much too low. To expect that men advanced in years, who have families to educate, shall be able to support the dignity and discharge the duties of that high office at a salary of five thousand dollars a year, and besides lay up something for their old age, is almost comical. For a new state like Kansas or Nebraska, such a salary would be sufficient. But for an old and wealthy state like Ohio, it is, large as it may seem to some, quite inadequate. It is about one thousand dollars less than the salary of a London police magistrate. We have heretofore expressed the opinion that the miserable salaries which most of the American states pay their judges, afford a striking illustration of the ingratitude of republics. There are at the bar of every large city, retired judges—old men who having given their best years and strength to the honorable labors of the judicial office, who are literally turned out to starve by the ingratitude of their countrymen. There are some who are literally objects of charity—who live by the contributions of their brethren of the bar, and whose presence among us is a walking monument of the meanness and parsimony of their fellow citizens. Judges ought to hold office during good behavior, or, at least, until they have attained a certain age. They ought to receive a salary adequate to support them in comfort, considering the high character of their office on the one hand, and the simplicity which becomes republican institutions on the other. And when they are retired from the bench, they ought to be retired on a pension sufficient to keep their declining years from want.

Reorganization of the Judiciary of Ohio.

The new constitution of Ohio, will, if ratified, introduce a number of important changes into the judicial system of that state. The necessity for relief of some kind is apparent, when we are told, as we are by the committee of the convention appointed to draft an address to the people of Ohio, that the accumulation of judicial business had so blockaded the courts that from one to two years was required to reach the hearing of a cause in the common pleas, and from five to seven years in the supreme ocurt. The committee say that the causes of this delay were obvious. The practice of second trials duplicated the labors of the common pleas judges. The time which ought to have been devoted to that court was diminished from one to three months in each year to review their own decisions in the district court, while the few hours allotted to this court in each county rendered its decisions a judicial farce, and caused it to fall into popular contempt. The committee also say that from a general want of confidence in this court, a large proportion of the causes have found their way to the supreme court, and thus have overwhelmed it also.

Digitized by Google

To remedy these evils a tribunal, called the circuit court, has been created intermediate between the common pleas and the supreme court. The official term of the circuit judges is eight years. This, it is thought, will give the circuit court stability, and be an inducement to legal learning to accept the office. The court sits twice in each county each year. The circuit courts have jurisdiction over the common pleas and other inferior courts.

The supreme court remains unchanged, except that the official term of the judges is extended to ten years. In electing the judges of this and the circuit court, the "minority representation" system of voting is adopted. That is to say, no elector can vote for more than three of the five judges of the supreme court, nor more than two of the three judges of the circuit court. This system is in vogue in New York, and is said to have worked well there.

"Each of the great political parties," say the committee, "is certain to elect a portion of the judges, and will therefore be responsible for their character, integrity and ability. It is supposed that a better class of nominations will thus be secured, the court divested of any appearance of political bias, and its decisions command a more general and hearty confidence."

Provision is also made for the establishment of a temporary commission to assist the supreme court in clearing its docket.

The New Constitution of Ohio.

We have received through the courtesy of Messrs. R. Clarke & Co. of Cincinnati, a copy of the new constitution of Ohio, agreed upon in convention, May 14, 1874, and which is to be submitted to the people for ratification. Among its provisions we note the following: In suits for less than one hundred dollars the jury need not consist of more than six persons. The writ of habeas corpus can be suspended only in such manner as shall be prescribed by law. Suits cannot be brought by publication, unless the court shall be satisfied that the residence and post-office address of the defendant cannot be found, so that he cannot have actual notice. This is a wise and excellent provision. The per diem of members of the legislature is abolished, and they are to be compensated by a fixed annual salary. The legislature is to sit annually, instead of biennially, as heretofore. The governor is clothed with a limited veto power.

An exceedingly wise and important provision in introduced as to the manner of voting upon appropriation bills, which we state in the language of an address to the people prepared by a committee of the convention: "Under the existing constitution, the general appropriation bill, like the general appropriation bill in Congress, has been made the vehicle for the grossest peculations in the public funds. Absenteeism often reduces the attendance to a mere quorum. A bare majority of this quorum can incorporate into the general appropriation bill, by amendment or rider, any scheme for depleting the treasury. On the final passage of the bill it must be voted on as an entirety, and unless it receive the vote of a majority of all the members elected to each house, it is lost. Appropriations necessary to carry on the government are thus coupled with, and made to abide the fate of, schemes of mere peculation and plunder. Members are compelled, against their convictions, to vote for the bill including these obnoxious items, or suffer a stoppage of the wheels of government. To prevent this is the purpose of the new provisions in sections twenty-three and twenty-five. Each item of appropriation must stand on its own merits and be voted on separately, by yeas and nays, on the demand of any member. If it fail to receive the constitutional majority it is to be stricken out. Thus each member is made personally responsible to his constituents for the vote he may cast. He can no longer have the pretence that, unless he vote for the bill, including the obnoxious item, it must fail, and the government suspend for want of funds." The governor also has a limited veto as to any separate item in an appropriation bill.

To prevent official extortion it is provided that the probate judges and common pleas clerks shall hereafter be salaried officers, and that all their fees shall be paid into the county treasury. In electing judges the principle of minority representation is adopted, so that both the great political parties shall be represented on the bench. Sweeping changes are made in the judicial system, but as these require to be noticed more in detail, we shall speak of them elsewhere. On the whole, the changes introduced by this instrument are so obviously wise and needful that there can scarcely be a doubt of its ratification by a decisive majority.

TAXATION OF PROPERTY OF RAILWAYS—POWER OF THE LEGISLATURE TO RELEASE MUNICIPAL TAXES ALREADY LEVIED AND DUE.—We publish in this number an important case on the subjects above indicated, very recently decided by the Supreme Court of Iowa. Subjects of this character have undergone frequent examination by this tribunal, and its judgments thereon are entitled to great respect and consideration. It will be observed that the court held, under the special constitutional provisions referred to (art. 8 § 2), that the legislature had no power to release railway companies from the papment of taxes fully due to a municipality at the time the releasing act was passed.

The valuable note to this case was prepared at our instance by Mr. Rodgers, one of the counsel, and in it he discusses the still open question as to the extent of legislative power over the property rights of municipal corperations. We consider the case one of unusual interest and value.

RETROACTIVE SCOPE OF NEW BANKRUPT ACT.—The extent of the retroactive effect of the late amendment to the bankrupt act, recently came before Mr. District Judge HILL of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Mississippi, in the case of Hightowner & Butler, and was argued by some of the ablest lawyers in the state (R. S. Smith, H. W. Walters and L. P. Cooper, for the creditors, and H. A. Barr and Robert Taylor, for the debtors); and on the next day the district judge, in a well-reasoned opinion, reached the following general conclusions, which seem to be correct:

1st. Amendments, to the bankrupt law, approved June 22, 1874, do not apply to involuntary proceedings in which the adjudication had passed prior thereto.

2d. These amendments do apply to all involuntary proceedings commenced after the 1st December, 1873, and in which the question of bankruptcy was pending on the 22d June, 1874.

3d. The remedial provisions of these amendments apply to all pending, or future proceedings in causes commenced since the 1st December, 1873.

Digitized by Google

See other cases to same effect, ante p. 362.

The learned Judge adopted, at the same time, the following RULES OF PRACTICE in involuntary bankrupt cases commenced since December 1st, 1873, and not adjudicated June 22, 1874.

1st. It is ordered that in all such cases the cause proceed as though the petition was amended to conform to the provisions of the amendment made to the bankrupt law, approved June 22, 1874, unless objection is made by the defendant or defendants.

2d. The objection made by such defendant or defendants, will be by affidavit filed in court, stating that the petitioning creditor or creditors do not embrace the one-fourth in number and represent the one-third in amount of the defendant's debts, provable under the bankrupt law and will be accompanied by a schedule of the creditors, their residence, and amount of their debts owing by the defendant or defendants, verified by affidavit.

3d. When such affidavit and schedules are filed, the petitioning creditors will be allowed twenty days in which to procure a sufficient number representing a sufficient amount to unite with them, so as to comply with the law as amended, which will be done by amended petition with preliminary proof of debt.

4th. In all involuntary cases commenced since the 22d of June, 1874, the petitioner must allege the requisite number of creditors and amount as required by the amendments. Ordered to apply to the Northern and Southern District, of Mississippi.

July 22, 1874. R. A. HILL, Judge.

Constitutional Law—Railway Taxation.

THE CITY OF DAVENPORT V. THE CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Supreme Court of Iowa, June Term, 1874.

1. Practice—Judgment at Once for Part of Admitted Claim.—I. When the answer admits a certain part of the amount claimed in the petition to be due, judgment, under the Iowa code, may be rendered at once for the amount admitted, on motion, leaving the action to proceed for the residue of the claim. This is warranted by section 3135 of the revision of 1860, providing that "if only part of the claim is controverted by the pleading, judgment may at any time be rendered for the part not controverted."

2. Taxation of Railway Property within City Limits.—An act requiring railroad companies to pay annually to the state treasurer a tax of one per cent. on their gross earnings "in lieu of all taxes for any and all purposes on the road-bed, right of way, track, rolling-stock and necessary buildings for operating their road," did not exempt a railroad company having such property situated within an incorporated city, authorized by its charter to levy taxes for city purposes on "all taxable property" situated within its limits, from taxation by such city on said property. Following Dunlieth & Dubuque Bridge Co. v. City of Dubuque, 32 Io. 427.

3. Adjudication in respect to other Taxes no Estoppel.—In an action by a city against a railroad corporation to recover city taxes levied on defendant's property for certain years, a decree in a former suit, between the same parties, enjoining the city from collecting taxes levied on the same property for other and previous years, on the ground that said property was not taxable, cannot be pleaded as an estoppel in bar of the action. COLE, J., dissenting.

4. Same.—In such action a decree in a former suit brought by a stockholder in the railroad company against the city, without making the railroad company a party, enjoining the collection of the tax for one of the years sued for, on the ground that the property was not taxable, cannot be pleaded as an estoppel in favor of the railroad company against the city.

5. Constitution of Iowa—Exemption of Railroad Property from Taxation Forbidden.—Art. 8, sec. 2, of the constitution of Iowa, which recites that "The property of all corporations, for pecuniary profit, shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals;" requires the legislature to provide for the taxation of the property of such corporations tot he same extent and for the same purpose as the property of individuals; and forbids the exemption of such corporate property from any kind of taxation imposed on the property of individuals. COLE, J., dissenting.

6. Power of Legislature to Release Taxes Levied by Municipal Corporations.—Sec. 9 of chap. 26 of the laws of 1872, providing that "every railroad company which shall have paid all taxes on gross earnings provided for by chapter 106 of the acts of the 13th general assembly, shall be released from the payment of all other taxes which may have been levied upon the road-bed, right of way, track, rolling-stock and necessary buildings for operating their road, and no taxes for prior years for state, county, municipal or any purpose for which any other tax can be levied under the laws of the state, up to the first day of January last, shall be collected from any such railroad company on such property," is in conflict with art. 8, sec. 2, of the constitution, and, so far as it purports to release city taxes lawfully levied on the property of a railroad corporation, is inoperative and void. COLE, J., dissenting.

7. Repealing Provision Construed.—The 13th section of said act, providing that "all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed," does not take away the power to collect taxes lawfully levied on railroad property before the passage of the act. COLE, J., dissenting.

8. Recovery of Taxes by Suit—Practice.—In an action by a city to recover taxes due to it, the objection that such taxes are not recoverable by action, does not go to the jurisdiction of the court, but to the sufficiency of the cause of action, and, unless such objection was taken in the court below, it cannot be raised on appeal to the supreme court.

Cross appeals from Scott District Court. Action by the city to recover amount of city taxes for the years 1867, 1871; levied on the depot grounds, track and buildings of the railroad company, and on the north half of the bridge across the Mississippi river, within the city limits. The tax on the bridge for 1870 being admitted by the answer to be due, on motion of plaintiff, judgment was rendered against defendant for the amount thereof, with leave to prosecute the suit for the residue of the claim. From said judgment defendant appealed. Plaintiff demurred to the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th pleas in defendant's answer. The demurrers to the 1st, 2d and 3d pleas were sustained; from which order defendant appealed. The demurrer to the 4th plea was overruled, from which plaintiff appealed. The character of the pleas sufficiently appears in the opinion.

John N. Rodgers, for plaintiff; Cook, Richmond & Bruning, Thomas E. Withrow and Edmonds & Ransom, for defendant.

MILLER, Ch. J.—This case is one of paramount importance, both in the amount of money involved and the quantity of the legal questions presented. It has been argued by learned counsel, with great and unusual ability, and we have endeavored to give the case that careful and deliberate consideration which, its magnitude demands.

I. The district court did not err in rendering judgment on plaintiff's motion for the sum confessed by the answer to be due and unpaid as taxes upon the north half of its bridge. The answer in plain and unqualified language says that the "plaintiff is entitled to the sum of $3,500;" for taxes on the north half of its railroad bridge, for the year 1870, "for which amount and costs to the date of filing this answer, defendant tenders judgment."

The statute (Rev. § 3135), provides that "if only part of the claim is controverted by the pleading, judgment may any time be rendered for the part not controverted." The petition claims to recover city taxes levied upon the depot grounds and buildings thereon upon its railway track, switches and road-bed within the city limits, and also upon the north half of its railroad bridge across the Mississippi river, also within the city limits, for the years 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870 and 1871. Now the claim for taxes on the north half of the bridge for the years 1870, the defendant does not controvert, but confesses that they are due and payable and offers judgment therefor. The case comes clearly within the section of the statute above quoted. The plaintiff claims taxes on different properties for different years. The defendant does not controvert the claim on one of the pieces of property named for one of the years. This being so, the court did not err in rendering judgment for the sum admitted. The confession in the answer is not to be governed by section 3404 of the revision. The offer to confess judgment there provided for does not contemplate admissions or confessions contained in the pleadings. Under that section the offer must be made in court in presence of the plaintiff, or after notice to him that the offer will be made.

It is collateral to the pleading, for if not accepted it "shall not be deemed an admission of the cause of action in amount to which the plaintiff is entitled, nor be given in evidence at the trial." The offer likewise must be as broad as the acceptance is required to be, and since the acceptance must be in full of all demands, it follows that the offer must be equally broad. It is quite clear that the answer in this case does not come within the provisions of this section.

Digitized by Google

II. Did the court err in sustaining the demurrer to the first division of the answer? The substance of this count in the answer is, that having, for each and every year for which plaintiff claims, fully paid to the state of Iowa, the taxes on its gross receipts according to the requirements of the statute, the defendant was not liable to pay the taxes claimed, except those on the north half of the bridge for 1870 and 1871; that the payment of taxes by the defendant on its gross receipts was in lieu of all other taxes, including taxes which might have been levied by the city.

In Dunleith & Dubuque Bridge Company v. The city of Dubuque, 32 Iowa, 427, this court held that payment by a railroad company of a tax of one per centum on the gross earnings of the road, under chapter 69 of the act of the 12th general assembly, did not relieve the railroad company from the payment of city taxes levied upon its property within the limits of the city. The act was held to be confined in its operation to state and county taxes. Under the doctrine of that case the first count of the answer presented no defense, and the demurrer thereto was properly sustained.

III. In the second count of the answer, the defendant pleads as an estoppel a judgment rendered February, 1867, in the District Court of Scott County, enjoining the city of Davenport from collecting city taxes levied by it upon the same property on which taxes are claimed in this case for the years 1863, 1864 and 1865, in a suit brought by the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company against the plaintiff herein, and alleging that the defendant in this snit is now the owner of the said property on which taxes were levied, having purchased the same in 1866, at sheriff's sale, on special execution, issued on a judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage on said property. The demurrer raises the question whether that judgment works an estoppel of the plaintiff to collect the taxes sued for in this action. We are of opinion that it does not. While this actiou may be conceded to be between parties and privies to the former decree, yet we think it is clear that the subject-matter of the two actions are not the same. The taxes enjoined in the former suit were those for 1863, 1864 and 1865. This action is to recover for subsequent taxes. Each year's taxes constitute a distinct and separate cause of action, and the determination of the matters involved in the injunction suit reached no farther than the taxes of the years then in question. The cases are unlike those where two causes of action (as two promissory notes), forming the subject-matter of successive actions between the same parties, both growing out of the same transaction, in which a defence set up in the first suit and held good will conclude the parties in the second. So, a judgment of a competent court upon the validity of coupons attached to a bond is conclusive in another action between the same parties upon other coupons attached to the same bond. Bouchaud v. Dias, 3 Denio, 238; Whitaker v. Johnson Co., 12 Iowa, 595. But the taxes of separate years do not, in any just sense, grow out of the same transaction. They are like distinct claims on two different promissory notes, made upon two distinct and separate, though similar, transactions between the same parties. A judgment on one of such notes, it is quite clear, would not be of any force as an estoppel in an action on the other note between the same parties.

In support of these views see the following cases: Arnold v. Arnold, 17 Pick. 4; Ferrers' Case, 6 Coke, 7; Cleaton v. Chambliss, 6 Rand. (Va.) 86; Clark v. Young, 1 Cranch, 181; Beere v. Fleming,* 13 Irish Ch. 506; Norton v. Huxley, 13 Gray, 285; Riker v. Hooper, 35 Vt. 457; Harding v. Hale, 2 Gray, 399; Marsh v. Pier, 4 Rawle, 273; Packet Co. v. Sickels, 5 Wall. 580, and cases cited; Myers v. Johnson Co., 14 Iowa, 47; Simmons v. Van Pelt, 12 id. 368, and cases cited.

[*I can find no such case. S. D. T.]

Again, this case does not fall within the principle involved where a particular issue of fact is tried and determined and judgment rendered upon such determination, which judgment estops both parties from afterwards denying the fact thus found and determined. See Bigelow on Estoppel, page 35.

In addition to what has been above said on this point it may be further remarked that the statute under which the former judgment was rendered was repealed by chapter 196 of the laws of 1868, which took effect April 29th, 1868, and this act was superseded by chapter 106 of the laws of 1870. Thus the taxes of 1868 and subsequent years were levied under statutes passed after the adjudication pleaded as an estoppel, and while the act of 1868 is similar in its main features to the act of 1862, which was in force when the injunction decree was rendered, yet a judgment involving the construction of a statute, and turning upon such construction, cannot be invoked after its repeal, as estoppel as to the law under a subsequent statute, though similar in its provisions, for this would deny to the court the power to determine whether the subsequent statute should receive the same in a different interpretation from that placed upon the repealed statute. It would tie the hands of the court, and prevent a construction of the subsequent statute. This cannot be allowed. The former decision may be an authority in a case arising under the subsequent statute, but it cannot be admitted as an estoppel upon the law-questions involved in the subsequent action.

Mr. Justice COLE does not concur in the holding on this point, but holds that since the prior adjudication was based upon the ground that under the state, as it then stood, the city had no power to levy any tax upon the same property, this want of power was therefore as effectually disposed of as it could be by litigating the taxes of each subsequent year. The tax for 1867 was levied under the same law as those embraced in the prior adjudication; other taxes for 1868 and 1869, under laws identical, in these respects, with it, and as to the latter he holds the adjudication conclusive.

IV. The third division of the answer sets up, by way of estoppel, a decree rendered in the Circuit Court of the United States for Iowa, November 2d, 1869, enjoining the city and its marshal from collecting the city taxes levied on the defendant's same property for the year 1868, in a suit by David Dows, of the state of New York, in which case it is alleged that he was then "a stockholder in the defendant's railroad." The tax involved in that case is one of those sued for in this case, but the parties are not the same in that case as in this. The plaintiff in the former case described himself as a stockholder in the defendant's railroad, it is true. This was necessary for the purpose of showing that he had an interest in the relief prayed, and this was the object of the averment. It does not appear to have been made with a view of prosecuting the suit for the benefit, or on behalf of the defendant, nor is it made to appear in any manner, that the railroad company claimed the benefit of the proceedings or even knew of their pendency. It is clear, therefore, that the defendant was neither party nor privy to that action. Nor would the decree in that case have bound the defendant if it had been adverse to the plaintiff therein. For this reason, also, the decree cannot be made a bar to this action. In order to constitute a bar, the former adjudication should have the effect to equally estop both parties. Myers v. Johnson Co., supra.

V. In the fourth count of the answer, the defendant claims to have been released from the payment of the taxes sued for, under and by virtue of chapter 26 of the laws of the 14th general assembly, approved April 6th, 1872.

The ninth section of this act reads as follows: "Every railroad company, which shall have paid all taxes on gross earnings provided for by chapter 106 of the acts of the 13th general assembly, shall be released from the payment of all the taxes which may have been levied upon the road-bed, right of way, track, rolling stock and necessary buildings for operating their road, and no taxes for prior years for state, county, municipal or any other purpose for which any tax can be levied under the laws of the State, up to the first day of January last, shall be collected from any such railroad company on such property."

Digitized by Google

The act embracing the above provision was passed after the taxes sued for in this action were levied, and after this action had been commenced.

It is insisted by plaintiff's counsel that this section of the act is unconstitutional, and therefore invalid.

The second section of article 8 of the state constitution is in these words: "The property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation, the same as that of individuals."

The first enquiry which presents itself in reference to this clause of the constitution is whether the language used is to be understood as merely conferring upon the general assembly the power to tax this class of property; or whether it is in the nature of a mandate, requiring that such property shall be taxed the same as the property of individuals. Taxation is an attribute of sovereignty. It is one of the powers necessary to the life and existence of the state, and unless restricted in the fundamental law the power of the state is full and ample to subject all species of property within the limits to taxation for all lawful purposes. This power is vested in the general assembly by the people, who are the source of political power, in the following broad and comprehensive language: "The legislative authority of the state shall be vested in a general assembly which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives." See state constitution, section 1 of article 3.

Taxes can be levied only in pursuance of law. The law-making authority of the state is the general assembly. This power is given in general terms and confers the authority upon that body to legislate upon all rightful subjects of legislation, unless prohibited from so doing, expressly or by clear implication. Morrison v. Springer, 15 Iowa, 342-3; Stewart v. Supervisors of Polk Co., 30 Iowa 13. The taxing power being one of the sovereign powers of the state, vested in the general assembly, and not being limited in the constitution as to kinds or classes of property subject to taxation, it follows that the general assembly possesses the power, derived from its general legislative authority, to subject all kinds and classes of property to taxation for all proper purposes, and that the clause first above quoted was not necessary to enable it to pass laws for the taxation of the property of corporations.

The power of taxation reaches all classes of property alike, independently of this provision of the constitution. We therefore conclude that since it must have been intended to give some force and effect to this section as a part of the fundamental law, it must be understood as a command to, and as enjoining it as a duty upon, the general assembly to provide by law for the taxation of the property of corporations for precuniary profit, the same as that of individuals. In other words, this clause requires the legislature to provide for the taxation of this class of property, the same as that of individuals.

In the next place, what are we to understand to be intended by the language "the same as that of individuals?"

We need not determine whether this language requires that corporate property shall be taxed in the same manner as that of natural persons.

It seems, however, quite clear that it was intended by this language to require the legislature to impose the burdens of taxation upon the property of corporations for pecuniary profit the same as, or equally with, that of individuals. That the property of this class of corporations shall bear the same burdens of taxation as are placed upon that of individuals; that each shall be taxed for the same objects and in the same degree, so that individuals shall not be required to pay any taxes on their property which are not assessed and laid upon the property of corporations of the class named, nor in any greater proportion. When the legislature provides for taxing the property of individuals, this clause of the constitution requires it to tax the property of corporations for pecuniary profit to the same extent and for the same purposes. If the property of individuals be taxed for the state, county, school and municipal purposes, the property of this class of corporations must be subjected to the same taxes and at the same rates. The one cannot be exempt and the other liable.

This state of things existed under the law at the time of the passage of the act of the general assembly under consideration. The property of railroad corporations (which are conceded to be corporations for pecuniary profit), was, like that of individuals, subject to taxation for city purposes. See Dunleith and Dubuque Bridge Co. v. City of Dubuque, 32 Iowa, 427. The laws then in force subjected the property of railroad corporations to taxation for municipal purposes, the same as that of individuals. The act of the general assembly under consideration interposes and declares that those railroad companies which shall have paid all taxes assessed against them for other purposes, shall be released from these city taxes, which have been levied upon their road-bed, right of way, track, rolling-stock, and necessary buildings for operating their road, which would be otherwise subject to such taxation under the law. It seems very clear that here is a direct and palpable conflict between this act of the legislation and the constitutional provisions requiring the property of these corporations to be taxed for the same purposes and the same extent as that of individuals. The effect of the act if held valid would be to exempt the property of railroad corporations, situated in cities and incorporated towns, from municipal taxes, while the property of individuals, similarly situated, would be subject thereto; which is the very result that was intended to be prevented by the framers of the constitution.

It is insisted by the counsel for defendant that the act operates as a release of taxes on railroad property, and not on railroad corporations, and that it makes no distinction in respect to such property between corporations and individuals. In this we cannot concur with the learned counsel. The act under consideration deals in terms, with railroad corporations only. The language is, "every railroad company which shall have paid all taxes on gross earnings, etc., shall be released from the payment of all other taxes which may have been levied on the road-bed, right of way, track, rolling-stock and necessary buildings for operating their road, and no taxes for prior years for State, county, municipal or any other purposes for which any tax can be levied under the laws of the state, etc., shall be collected from any such railroad company on such property." The act releases the railroad companies who have paid, etc., from all taxes levied for any purpose on the property named. It is not an exemption or release from taxation of a class of property, irrespective of the ownership, but a release of these corporations from taxes which had been levied alike on their property and that of individuals. The act attempts to remove the burden from the corporations and leave it remaining upon individuals having property within the incorporated cities and towns of the state. The terms, "railroad companies," are used in the act as synonymous with "railroad corporations." These terms are used indiscriminately throughout the legislation of the state, and are so used as meaning the same thing. The terms "railroad companies," are more frequently used in the legislative acts than the terms "railroad coporations." In the use of the former terms in the act under consideration, it is beyond doubt they were used as synonymous with "railroad corporations." Indeed this seems to be conceded by counsel for defendant, but they claim that this objection of class legislation applies to all the legislation of the state in reference to railroads. We are not now considering how far the general assembly may go in making laws on other subjects than taxation which apply specially and peculiarly to railroad corporations, or to what extent "class legislation," as it is called, in respect to these corporations, may be carried. On this subject of taxation the constitution has forbidden any discrimination in favor of the property of this class of corporations.

But if the kind of property mentioned in the act under examination, viz: railroad property, be of a character that it may be owned and controlled by a natural person, still it would, under the laws of the state, be subject to be taxed for municipal purposes when situated within the limits of an incorporated city or town; for the act purporting to release railroad companies from the payment of such taxes cannot be construed to release a private individual from the payment of such taxes on the same kind of property when owned by him. This results in discriminating in favor of corporations and against individuals, and is plainly violative of the constitution. Again, if railroad property be of such nature as that it may not be owned or held by an individual, but can only be owned and held by railroad corporations, the act is equally vulnerable to the constitutional objection, for it affects the property only when held by corporations. It exempts the property of railroad corporations from taxation, while that of individuals remains, under the laws of the state, subject thereto. To prevent this state of things was the purpose of the constitutional provision herein set out.

Digitized by Google

Finding, therefore, that there is this direct and palpable conflict between the enactment under consideration and the constitution, it becomes our plain duty to declare the former invalid and of no effect. Stewart v. Board of Supervisors, etc., supra.

It is urged that the 13th section of the act of 1872, which provides that "all laws and parts of laws, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed," takes away the power and right to collect the city taxes due and unpaid prior to the taking effect of that act. We think there are two satisfactory answers to this claim. First, the only laws declared repealed are those inconsistent with the provisions of that act. The only provision in that act, conflicting with the prior statutes upon this question, is the 9th section, which we have just seen is in conflict with the constitution and void. Being void, it is to be treated as if stricken out of the act, which leaves nothing therein inconsistent with the former statutes upon this subject, and hence they are not repealed.

Second, if the effect of the repealing section would be to release the railroad company from taxation upon their property for city purposes, while that of natural persons similarly situated is subjected thereto, then such repeal is in violation of the constitution, for the reason that it creates this inequality, and is invalid and inoperative.

Mr. Justice COLE dissents from the holding in the foregoing division of this opinion, on the grounds and for the reasons stated by him in his dissenting opinion in the case of the City of Dubuque v. the Ill. Cent. Railroad Co. (decided concurrently with this case).

VI. In the view we have taken of this constitutional question, it becomes unnecessary for us to examine and determine the question (very ably argued) whether the plaintiff, a municipal corporation, had such a vested right in the taxes due and delinquent upon the property of the defendant, situated within the city limits, at the time of the passage of the act releasing the same, as that the legislature could not constitutionally interpose and release them.

VII. Counsel on both sides have also very exhaustively argued the question of the right of the plaintiff to sue and maintain an ordinary action at law for taxes due and unpaid. This question is not raised in any manner by the demurrer, and is argued for the first time in this court. It is not a jurisdictional question that may be taken advantage of at any time. If there is anything in the objection, it is that delinquent taxes are not the subject of a civil action, or in other words, that the facts that taxes have been regularly levied on the defendant's property, which remain due and delinquent, do not constitute a cause of action. This objection must be raised by demurrer or otherwise in the court below, and cannot be presented for the first time in this court. We therefore refrain from intimating any opinion on this question.

On the defendant's appeal the judgment of the district court will be affirmed. But as the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the fourth count of defendant's answer, the judgment will, on plaintiff's appeal be REVERSED.

NOTE.—In the city of Dubuque v. Ill. Cent. R. R. Co., decided in the same court and at the same time with the foregoing case, BECK, J.. delivered an elaborate opinion, holding the releasing act of 1872 (in question in the foregoing case), to be unconstitutional, not only because it conflicted with art. 8 sec. 2, of the state constitution, in respect to taxation of the property of corporations for pecuniary profit, but also as being an invasion of the vested rights of property of the cities in the delinquent taxes sought to be released. The opinion maintains that, although the powers of a municipal corporation are subjects, as to their future exercise to be modified or taken away by the legislature, its property rights, acquired by the actual exercise of these powers, (including that of taxation), are as fully protected from legislative deprivation as the property rights of individuals; that the levy of a tax, under authority of law, creates a legal obligation upon the tax payer to pay, which is in the nature of a debt, and which the law implies a promise on his part to discharge. That the rights of the municipality to the taxes thus levied and due are protected against legislative deprivation by the constitutional prohibitions of laws impairing the obligation of contracts, and of the deprivation of property without due process of law. In support of these views the learned judge cites Milwaukee v. Milwaukee, 12 Wis. 93; State v. Haben, 22 Wis. 660; Trustees v. Mayor of Aberdeen, 13 Sm. & Mar. 645; Bowdoinham v. Richmond, 6 Greenl. 112; Benson v. The Mayor, 10 Barb. 223; Dillon Munic. Corp. § 39, and authorities cited. The cases mentioned in the note to the Dollar Savings Bk. v. U. S. (ante, p. 263) maintaining the right to sue for a tax, are also cited in support of the position that there is an implied contract to pay the tax.

MILLER, C. J., and DAY, J., concurred in holding the act of 1872, to be in conflict with Sec. 2 of Art. 8 of the Iowa constitution, but declined to give any opinion on the question whether it interferred with vested rights.

COLE, J., dissented, holding that a municipal coporation can have no vested right as against the state in uncollected taxes, and that Art. 8, Sec. 2, of the constitution, providing that "the property of all corporations for pecuniary profits shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals," is not mandatory, but simply authorises the legislature to provide for such taxation. The learned judge says on this point, "the manifest purpose and intent of the section is, to place the property of corporations, just like the property of individuals, completely within the legislative power for the purpose of taxation; so that the legislature could use the same authority and discretion in the enactment of laws for the taxation of the property of corporations as it could use in the enactment of laws for the taxation of the property of individuals. And the history of this section in the constitutional convention shows that the object of it was to place the property of corporations, then existing within the power of the legislature to tax, although in the flood of special legislation which had preceded the convention, and the peculiar incorporation privileges thereby conferred, many corporations had been granted exemption from taxation. The words "now existing or hereafter created," which were at one time incorporated in the section, were afterwards fully and sufficiently embraced in the phrase "all corporations" used in the section as adopted. The sole practical effect of the section is to clothe the legislature with the authority to subject to taxation the property of corporations, although by the terms of their charters previously granted they were exempted from taxation."

It may be doubted, however, whether the effect here attributed to the constitutional provision is a very "practical" one, for the following reasons:

1st. The chartering of private corporations by special act either with or without exemption from taxation, has never been possible in the state of Iowa; being expressly forbidden by Art. 8, Sec. 2, of the original constitution, as it is by Art. 8, Sec. 1, of the present constitution. All such corporations in the state had been organized under general laws, and were as fully under legislative control as to taxation, as natural persons. The supposed evil, therefore, which the learned judge regards it as the office of Art. 8, Sec. 2, of the present constitution to remedy, did not and could not exist.

2d. If it had existed, the supposed remedy would have been ineffectual, for any corporation enjoying a chartered exemption from taxation, free from legislative interference under the old constitution, would have continued to possess the same immunity under the new one, notwithstanding the section now in question. An exemption from taxation is irrepealable only when it constitutes a contract between the state and the tax-payer; and in that case the state cannot become entitled to violate the contract by a change in its constitution. This is the settled doctrine of the United States Supreme Court. Dodge v. Wolsey, 18 How. 331 (360); Mechs. and Trader's Bank v. Thomas, id. 384; see Jefferson Branch Bk. v. Skelly, 1 Black, 436; see also matter of Lee & Co.'s Bank, 19N. Y. 9 (15).

Hence the construction placed upon the constitutional provision in the dissenting opinion appears to render it nugatory, whether such special exemption of corporations from taxation did or did not exist at the time of its adoption.

In U. S. Express Co. v. Ellyson, 28 Iowa, 370, involving the validity of a statute for taxing express and telegraph companies, the same view appears to have been taken of this section of the constitution as is adopted by the court in the principal case, supra; although the point was not then expressly determined. COLE, J., delivering the opinion of the court, says (p. 374): "But if the act did prescribe a rule for the taxation of the property of corporations different from that prescribed for the taxation for the same class of property when owned by individuals, we see no escape from the conclusion that it would be in conflict with the clause of the constitution relied upon and quoted above" (viz., Art. 8, Sec. 2), "and hence inoperative and void."

Digitized by Google

It may be added that the debates of the constitutional convention throw no light whatever upon the actual intent of the framers of this section, it having passed through all the various stages of consideration and action down to final adoption, sub silentio.

On the general qeustion of the extent of the legislative power over the property rights of the municipal corporations, (which is one of no little doubt and difficulty), in addition to the authorities cited by Mr. Justice BECK, supra, the following cases may be consulted with advantage: State v. St. Louis Co. Court, 34 Mo., 570; People v. Powers, 25 Ill, 190; Richland Co. v. Lawrence Co., 12 Ill. 7; Guilford v. Board of Supervisors, 13 N. Y., 143; Darlington v. Mayor, etc., 31 N. Y., 165; Layton v. New Orleans, 12 La. Ann. 515; Hampshire Co. v. Franklin Co., 16 Mass., 76; East Hartford v. Bridge Co., 10 How, 511; Trustees v. Tatman, 13 Ill. 29; Coles v. Madison Co., 1 Ill., (Breese) 120; and the very late case of Spaulding v. Town of Andover, N. H. Supr. Ct., unreported, but stated, ante. p. 198. Most of these cases relate to such questions as the power of the legislature to control the funds or property of the municipality, so far as to change their use or application from one municipal purpose to another; to apportion such property on the division of the municipality; to subject the corporation to legal liability for claims founded in justice, which liability might be enforced against the corporate property; to take away a franchise (as of a pubilc ferry) previously granted by the state to the municipality; to release a penalty given to the municipality after judgment in its favor therefor, and the like. These powers have generally been sustained by the decisions, though the power of apportionment on division of the municipality has in some cases been denied to exist unless exercised at the time of the division, or unless made with the consent of that part of the original municipality to be prejudiced thereby. Bowdoinham v. Richmond; Hampshire Co. v. Franklin Co., supra. In the few cases that have arisen where the legislature has attempted to directly deprive a municipal corporation of specfic funds or property in its actual possession (either by appropriating it to purposes not municipal or otherwise) the power appears to have been denied. State v. Haven, 22 Wis. 660; Milwaukee v. Milwaukee, 12 id. 93; Spaulding v. Town of Andover, supra. The People v. Kerr, 27 N. Y. 188, maintaining the legislative power to authorize the construction of a railway along a city street, without the consent of, or compensation to, the city, probably does not conflict with the above cases, the city's title to the soil of the street being held in trust for the general public.

The power of the legislature to deprive the citizens of a municipality of their corporate property, acquired and held for corporate purposes, cannot, it would seem, be maintained (as is some times supposed) by a simple reference to the undoubted power to which the corporation is to take away or modify any of the corporate powers. The legislature often possesses the same power over private corporations, by virtue either of express reservations in their charter, or of a constitutional provision or general law to which the charter is subject. But no one would now contend that this would subject the property of such corporations to legislative confiscation, even in case of the absolute repeal of their charter. The corporate body may be regarded as a trustee holding the legal title in trust for the corporators. And it would seem to make no difference that the corporation is a public one, and its property public property. It is not "public in the sense of belonging to the general public, i. e., the state at large. It belongs, beneficially, to the citizens of the particular municipality, for their own particular and local "public" (in distinction from private individual) uses, and they would seem to be as much entitled to protection against deprivation at the mere pleasure of the legislature of their corporate as of their individual property.

It is suggested, with diffidence, that the true test to determine whether property-rights of a municipality are, in a given case, subject to be taken away or defeated by legislative enactment, is to ascertain whether such rights are complete and perfect, needing no further corporate action to protect them; or whether they are as yet inchoate, requiring the further exercise of the chartered powers of the municipality in order to bring them to perfection. In the former case, it is submitted, such rights, though acquired by the past exercise of powers conferred by the legislature, and liable to be taken away by it (the taxing power or any other), are to be regarded as vested rights, and covered by the shield of the constitution. In the latter case, the right must be regarded as imperfect and not vested, and liable to be defeated by the repeal of the power on the exercise of which it depends.

The result of the application of this test to the particular state of facts presented by the principal case, supra, viz: a legislative release of uncollected taxes lawfully levied by and due to a municipality, would depend on the question whether the levy of a tax creates the same relation of debtor and creditor between the tax-payer and the municipality as a contract between private parties; establishing a complete obligation on the one part to pay, and a title on the other to receive, which demand no further exercise of the taxing power to perfect them. If this be so, then the right is "vested," and the legislature cannot destroy it. If the contrary be the case, then the right of the taxes is inchoate, and must fall with the withdrawal of the power on which it depends.

J. N. R.

Davenport, Iowa.

[From our own correspondent.]

Recollections of Mr. Choate.

BOSTON, July, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—No other man, who has been dead fifteen years, is so well known in Boston as Mr. Choate. Probably no man ever more earnestly desired to be remembered—as nothing so much pleases a good mother, who, at the same time is good-looking, as to see her fac simile in the face of her daughter. No doubt what Mr. Curtis justly called the sweetness of Mr. Choate's temper and the courtesy of his manner, have contributed much to keep his memory alive, for these were indeed sweet and most courteous, and altogether worthy to be remembered. He never offended anybody—never made anybody sad; nobody ever went from his presence but to tell the next friend he met he had just seen Mr. Choate and what Mr. Choate said. But, after all, it is not his manners alone, nor chiefly, charming as they really were, nor yet the sweetness of his temper, that keeps his memory alive, but exactly this: We saw in him a supreme genius, such an one as we had not until then seen, nor have since, nor expect to see again, and as such he is remembered. Mr. Dana said he was a "unique creation;" which would be quite true and apt if men were created, which they are not, but only generated. Mr. Choate was unique; that is, he existed, so far as I know, without an equal—without another like him that I know of. We sometimes have quite pretty plants in the public garden at Boston. Mr. Everett's statue overlooks some such now; but they all need the care of the gardener with his water-pot morning and evening, else they droop and die. But the plants that grow wild in luxurious entanglement in the gorges of the Savoy Alps, where warmth and moisture are perpetual and harvest home and vintage never fail—they are seldom or never seen in New England.

When a case was presented to Mr. Choate, he saw more of it than had been seen by others. He often saw it in some new relation; just as in a case which was pending in Maine, some years ago, in which eminent counsel had been engaged, and which had been through all the courts, and up to Washington and back, with an opinion of the supreme court against the defendant, when, for the first time, the papers, with the opinion, were put into the hands of Mr. Paine, and he saw there was a defence which had not been made, but which was perfect. He tried for a week or so to make his junior, who was his senior in years, understand it; but vainly, until, when on their way to the court house, on the morning when the case was to be re-tried, and when Mr. Paine had gone slowly over the case with him, the old man, all of a sudden, saw the point, as "in a vision," and fell to beating the wind and his person and exclaiming—We've got 'em! we've got 'em! Then suddenly stopping in the road, he added, in a lower tone, and with evident sadness, to Mr. Paine: "Between you and me, in the determination of this cause I shall lose a source of income which I had hoped would last while I lived."

One of Mr. Choate's first questions on consulting him, was—Is there any infirmity in our case? Another was—What are the the salient points? He would have you go all over the case with him; then he would take the papers home; and quite likely when you saw him the next morning, you would learn he had marked out a new course. When the bar meeting was held, soon after his death, and some others who had not been too friendly in his lifetime seemed anxious to connect themselves with his fame, some said he excelled most in the argument of questions of law; others said, it was in the trial and argument of causes before a jury; one said he shone most when addressing legislative committees. The truth is, he shone everywhere, and almost with equal brilliancy wherever he was engaged. For my part, I was associated with him at the argument of the case of Cunningham against the city of Boston, before the fall court, which was one of the last cases he ever argued, in the spring of 1859; and I then thought I never heard him argue so beautifully and well.

His taste for the beautiful was exquisite, and he did not need to be told what beauty was. He knew it by sight. If Socrates had seen and heard Mr. Choate, instead of a long and vain attempt to show in what the essential quality called beauty consisted, he would, I think, have contented himself with pointing to Mr. Choate as an example. Mr. Choate thought faster than he could write, which caused him, even with his rapid manner of writing, to make some mistakes—as a swift-running horse finds difficulty when running in keeping his fore legs out of the way of the hind ones, by which he is propelled.

Digitized by Google

But his lines are straight across the paper, and his letters are all beautifully cut and turned. If wealth consists in beautiful thoughts, Mr. Choate was the richest man I ever knew. PELHAM.

[Communicated.]

Law Schools—Admissions to the Bar.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL—GENTLEMEN:—Permit me to offer a few words in reply to the severe and indiscriminate attack on law schools, contained in your articles of July 2d, on "Admissions to the Bar," and of July 9th, "Law Schools—Reform Needed." I call the attack indiscriminate, because all law schools alike are embraced in it, without reference to the great difference existing among them in the very points upon which the attack is based. It is "the beneficial effect of law schools," as a class, "upon the profession or the public," that you call in question. Had your remarks been based, as those you quote from the Albany Law Journal were, upon the circumstances of a single state, the judgment implied would not be so severe. In New York, the legislature have passed a stringent law requiring a long term of study and careful examinations, before a student's admission to the bar; and the profession there seem to be making laudable efforts to carry out these regulations in their true spirit. This being the case, the exemption of the graduates of two or three schools from these rules, is undoubtedly a mistake. It can only be defended as a temporary measure, intended to protect the schools from the injustice that would otherwise have been done them before they could adapt their own course of study to the new system. And if I remember aright, the exemption is a temporary one, which will expire in a year or two—at least, as soon as any valuable fruit can be expected from the new rule of admission. In most of the states, no such legislation has even been proposed; it is doubtful whether popular sentiment would admit of a rule requiring two or three years' study in all cases before admission. To insist under such circumstances that the law schools alone should be required to adopt a course of that length, would be simply to abolish them—a course for which I think even their severest critics are hardly prepared.

Again, it seems to be assumed in the articles referred to, that the diplomas of all law schools are awarded at the mere will of the faculty, and that the professors have no control over the accessions thus made to their number. Whether this is the case in New York, I cannot say; but as all the schools there are private foundations, which originally had no power to admit any one to the bar, it may very probably be so. But it certainly is not the case generally. I doubt if there is a single law school in the West, whose diploma is of itself an admission, that does not give the courts or the bar an opportunity to test in every possible manner the fitness of its graduates for practice, and to exercise their influence on the whole course and manner of instruction. If this opportunity is not used, the blame does not lie with the schools; and if the profession will not take the pains to maintain an easy supervision over admissions from a few schools, how can it be expected that they will, as a body, watch and guard the innumerable courts and committees of examination through which, as through so many open doors, students are constantly pouring into the bar from the offices?

I do not wish to make any invidious comparisons or praise any particular school; but as this question is simply one of fact, you will permit me to use as an illustration the school with which I am most familiar. The graduates of the law department of Iowa State University, are, by law, admitted to practice on the presentation of their diplomas after a course of a single year, and, therefore, come directly within the terms of your criticisms. But who is it that determines who shall receive the diplomas? Every year since the foundation of the school, the Supreme Court of Iowa have appointed a committee of examination from among the best members of its bar, whose decision on the subject is absolute and final. They take the candidates for graduation into their own hands—the faculty, as a rule, not even being present—and examine them in their own method until they are fully convinced of their competency or failure, as the case may be. I have heard many examinations, both in the East and West, and I can truly say that no others, in my experience, have even approached the thoroughness and severity of those usually given by these committees. But that, after all, is not the point; be the examination severe or lenient, it is the Supreme Court of the State, and a picked number of members of the bar that decide finally who shall have the diplomas. If the law schools were all out of the way, how would you guard admission to the bar if not by this very method?

I mention this, not as a credit to the particular school, but for the very reason that I do not believe it to be a singular instance; on the contrary, I think a careful enquiry would show it to be only the type of the whole class, and would prove that no class of candidates for the bar are so carefully tested in all respects, or have their entire competency, intellectual and moral, guaranteed so conclusively by the bar and bench itself, as these decried graduates of law schools "turned out as with machinery."

Let me add one more significant fact—I state it of my own knowledge, but I have no doubt it can be verified from the experience of every law school in the country. Not only do the rejected candidates, who have gone through the whole course, but failed to get a diploma, find easy admission to the bar by the ordinary method as if they had come from an office; but one of the chief difficulties that law school teachers find in maintaining a high standard in their classes, arises from the fatal facility with which any student who has been a term or two in the school, can secure admission to the bar of the district or circuit court without the labor and expense of finishing a whole year's course! Every year a considerable number of students leave the school at intervals during the course, going home to get admitted by the old-fashioned process as so much easier than that of the school. Surely this does not look as if the profession needed protection against the law schools.

But I have already claimed too much of your valuable space, which can be used to much better purpose than in discussing an issue that the sound sense of the profession is rapidly settling for itself, as the constant growth of law schools testifies. For the recent outcry against them there may be, as I have already acknowledged, local and temporary grounds. But most of it sounds to me very much like what I used to hear when a student, about the disuse of special pleading. Then, it was the code system that was ruining the character of the profession, and filling it "with mere theorists and speculators, whose blunders and mispleadings will cause great confusion and serious losses." The generation, of whose future such dark prophecies were then uttered, has now grown into the seniors of the bar, and is expressing in its own way its profound and sincere conviction that all good law will be buried in its coffin.

Do not understand me, however, as maintaining that our present law schools do not need improvement. No one can appreciate their imperfection more than I do. They are, as yet, but mere experiments, by means of which we are generally learning the true methods and processes of legal education and legal thought generally. I only deprecate attacks which seem likely to check their growth and development, and restore the wretched empiricism from which they are gradually elevating us. In another letter, if I have not already exhausted your patience, I will venture to say something upon this side of the topic. Yours respectfully, &c., &c.,

IOWA CITY, July 16th, 1874. W. G. H.

COMMENTS.—The foregoing communication is from the learned and accomplished Dr. Hammond, one of the professors in the law department of the University of Iowa. Speaking for the profession, as well as for ourselves, we shall be glad to have the writer's views concerning what law schools should be. We may then have some further remarks to make on the important subject thus brought into notice. Meantime we enter a disclaimer of any hostility to law schools, and beg to say that we are in favor of their maintenance, and when reformed so as to prevent too rapid graduation we wish them success. In our opinion, the best way to learn law is to spend a portion of the student-period in the office of an active practitioner and the rest in a school having such a corps of competent instructors as we know the gentlemen to be who fill the chairs of the law department of the Iowa University. We do know, that it is utterly impossible, under any instruction, however thorough may be the course or able the professors, for a young man without any office experience to become fitted to practice law in a single course of lectures, and we shall keep up this agitation until the law schools of the country shall adopt a two years' course or its equivalent, or until graduation under the one year system of instruction shall cease to be an equivalent to admission to the bar. We can indorse Dr. Hammond's statement of facts as to the thoroughness of the examinations at the Iowa University, but the burden of our criticism is upon the one year system and not upon the mode of instruction or its extent except in the too limited period required for graduation.

Book Notice.

THE LAW OF NEGLIGENCE. By THOMAS G. SHEARMAN and AMASA A. REDFIELD. Third Edition. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co. 1874 Sold by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth. St. Louis.

The favorable reception of this work verifies a remark we before made—that the profession are not slow to discover the merits of a good treatise, and this is particularly true where, as in the present instance, it treats of a subject with which the practising lawyer has daily to deal. Steam is the great motive agency of modern transportation, whether on land or water, and it supplies the power by which nearly all manufactories are operated. To successfully carry on the commerce, navigation, and manufactories of the present day, corporations which can collect and combine the vast capital required have been created and multiplied to an extent absolutely surprising, employing a vast army of servants of all grades, from the board of directory or president to the laborer in the most subordinate position. Steam, while it is a necessary, is at the same time a dangerous agency. The life and limb of the employee, and the safety of the public must be duly regarded. Out of these elements, in connexion with legislation touching them, as for example "Lord Campbell's Act" (9 & 10 Vict., chap. 93. 1846), and the statutes in the states of this country modeled upon it, has grown much of the litigation with which the courts have been occupied for the last twenty years. And out of these circumstances has also arisen the necessity for a specific work on Negligence. In executing it, however, the authors, for the convenience of the profession, have not confined it to negligence as a tort, but have also included a vein of the law relating to the negligent performance of contracts.

Digitized by Google

The first part of the work treats of Negligence—its degrees, and of Contributory Negligence. Then follow separate chapters on the Liabilities of Masters for Servants; of Masters to Servants; and of Servants to Third persons; Landlords and Tenants; Municipal Corporations; and Public Officers; The authors then proceed to treat of the obligations of persons in respect to particular things or kinds of employment—as in the Chapters on Animals, Attorneys, Bankers, Bridges, Canals, Carriers, Highways, Municipal Corporations, Railroads, Real Property, Physicians and Surgeons, Sheriffs, Telegraphs, Water Courses, and many other subjects collected in the chapter on Miscellaneous Cases of Negligence. The work concludes with a chapter on the Measure of Damages in Actions for Negligence.

We can speak from a practical acquaintance with the work of its construction and merits. Scarcely a term of court occurs that it is not referred to by counsel or used by the judges. It is framed upon what we consider in this day, and in the present state of the reports, the true plan: that is, the text is appropriated to the statement of general principles and general results, and the notes to such a minute view of the cases as will illustrate the subject by exhibiting the actual condition of the adjudications. The authors have done their work well, and when we find a meritorious production like the present it gives us sincere pleasure to commend it.

A leading feature of the treatise is its practical character, which is evident on an inspection of the notes and from the fact that though the work contains only about 700 pages, nearly 5,000 cases are cited.

Upon examination we find that, in general, the late important cases have been referred to in their appropriate connections, yet we also discover some omissions, as for example on the important question as to the extent of the burden of proof upon the plaintiff to entitle him to a recovery. It is well known that the decisions are conflicting upon the point whether to recover the plaintiff must not only show that the defendant was negligent, but also that he himself was free from contributory negligence. In sections 43, 44 and 412, the authors give a very full view of the state of the decisions, and in section 44 state their own opinion, which we regard as the sound one, yet they omit to cite the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the [Washington &c.] Railroad Co. v. Gladmon, 15 Wall. 401. This case holds that the burden of establishing such contributory negligence as will defeat a recovery is upon the defendant, unless, indeed, such negligence appears on the plaintiff's own proofs. In view of the rapid increase of the reports, text writers as well as courts will soon be compelled to discriminate more than at present between courts and cases and this will increase the relative weight and importance of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

We unreservedly commend this work to the profession, who will find tha the present edition is revised and much improved.

THE AMERICAN MEDICAL WEEKLY. E. S. GAILLARD, M. D., editor and proprietor, Louisville, Kentucky. Vol. 1. Terms $2.00 per year in advance.

Law and Medicine have, to some extent, a common domain with which medical jurisprudence has to deal. Dr. Gaillard is well known to his profession as an instructor in the Louisville Medical College, and as an experienced editor. He fully appreciates the advantages of a weekly publication, and has therefore established the journal whose name appears above and which we welcome to our table.

STORY ON AGENCY. Eighth edition, revised with additions. By N. ST. JOHN GREEN. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1874.

We consider it unnecessary to refer at length to the merits or character of the orignal work. The judgment of the profession is seen in the fact that since 1839 it has passed through seven editions. This is the eighth, but the additions of Judge Redfield and Mr. Hernck, the former editors, are retained and distinguished. The last edition was published in 1869, and the present editor informs the reader that the present edition contains more than 400 additional cases, most of which have been reported since the publication of the last edition.

LAW OF MECHANIC'S LIENS ON REAL AND PERSONAL PROPERTY. By SAMUEL L. PHILLIPS, Washington, D. C. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.; 1874. pp. 728. St. Louis: Sold by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth.

The common law gives to mechanics and material-men no lien upon the buildings into which the labor of the one and the materials of the other have gone, or upon the land on which the buildings are erected. The equity of these persons to such a lien is so persuasive, and the necessity and expediency of making provision for their better security have been so generally and so strongly felt, that in every American state there are enactments giving and regulating the lien of mechanics and material-men. This branch of the law is, therefore, purely statutory; but it is, nevertheless, one of no inconsiderable practical importance.

The present work, while limited in its subject to one topic, is framed, as the author states in his preface, upon the plan of incorporating into it all that can be found in the reports concerning it. We believe he has done so. The exact force and meaning of a decision arising under a special statute can only be known when the language of the statute is given, and the general scope of the enactment understood. The author often quotes briefly the text of the statute in stating the construction it has received, but whether he has done so sufficiently to prevent error in elsewhere applying his brief statement of local decisions, may admit of some question. We have no doubt of the general usefulness of this work, and it certainly has been prepared with much labor and it seems to us, also with much care. We have had no opportunity of verifying the author's citations and statements, but we have examined his book sufficiently to have formed the most favorable opinions concerning it, and we do not hesitate to recommend it to our readers.

OLIVER'S PRECEDENTS IN PERSONAL AND REAL ACTIONS, WITH ANNOTATIONS. Revised and enlarged by a member of the Cumberland bar; with references to the later statutes and decisions, and a large number of new precedents, framed by eminent pleaders; embracing also rules, forms and precedents, according to the practice acts of Massachusetts, supervised by a member of the Suffolk bar. Draper, McLellan & Co., Portland, Me. 1874. St. Louis: Soule, Thomas & Wentworth.

This work so well known in New England and by New England lawyers, has an interesting history. It had its origin many years ago in the "American Precedents of Declarations" compiled by B. Perham, Esq., assisted by Joseph Story, then a young man just commencing his professional life. These Precedents received the approval of the profession for years, and were finally added to, and newly arranged by, Benjamin L. Oliver, by whose name the work is now known. This is the fourth edition modernized. It omits nothing of the original work (and in that the present editor has done wisely), and has added 200 pages of new matter, with notes and citations of cases.

The additions record the changes in the state of society, and consequently, of the law which regulates and governs society. In former editions there was no form for actions against towns for defective ways, against railroads and telegraph companies for neglect in collisions and other things; against parties fraudulently concealing from creditors the property of their debtors; against stockholders or corporations for corporate debts; against conductors of railroads; against physicians for mal-practice; any variety of forms in actions against insurance companies; to recover subscription to railroads; to enforce mechanics' liens, etc., etc.

This has been supplied in this edition, and appropriate forms have been given, often with the names of well known lawyers affixed to them. Whoever is in want of a convenient and reliable manual in one volume of Forms of Declarations, or Petitions, or Complaints at Law, will find this to be a useful work. It does not contain forms of pleas or answers. We are tempted to add that the loose and unskillful manner of pleading which has accompanied, if not caused the code era, makes a recurrence to these forms by the younger lawyers desirable. To frame a good declaration or a good special plea, good in substance and good in form, requires a philosophic knowledge of the case or defence, and argues a good lawyer, and our experience under the code is that approved precedents are too much overlooked.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Legal Gazette, for July 31. publishes The Pacific R. R. Co. v. Maguire, published in this journal for April 30. Also Hicks v. Kelsey, Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1873, holding that the mere change in an instrument or machine of one material into another, as of wood, or of wood strengthened with iron, into iron alone, is not "invention" in the sense of the patent acts, and therefore is not the subject of a patent; the purpose and means of accomplishment, and form and mode of operation of each instrument, the new as of the old, being each and all the same; and that the mere fact that the new instrument is a better one than the old one, requiring less repair and having greater solidity than the old one, does not alter the case. It does not bring the case out of the category of more or less excellence of construction.

It also publishes Schooner Mary H. Banks v. Steamer Falcon, same court, same term, in which case a steamer collided with a schooner in Chesapeake bay, causing the sinking of the schooner. It appearing from the facts of the case that the steamer was in fault, the court held the steamer to be liable for the full value of the schooner at the time of her loss. And this notwithstanding the fact that the schooner was afterwards raised and repaired.

Digitized by Google

It also publishes Ahl's Appeal and Rice's Appeal, Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, July 2, where the court hold that jurisdiction of the court over a fund arising from the sale of the property and franchises of a corporation having attached, equity comprehends within its grasp all incidental matters necessary to enable it to make a full and final distribution, and therefore to terminate litigation, while it affords a perfect remedy; and that in this particular case the master appointed by the court below should have distributed the fund among the several claimants and not only to the parties holding the second mortgage bonds of the company.

The Chicago Legal News, for August 1, publishes Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winsor, published in this journal for July 16. Also Knowles v. Logansport Gaslight Co., Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1873, on the conclusiveness of judgments of sister states. This case was noticed in our issue for March 19 (ante, p. 135), and was also published in full by us in our number for June 25, in a note to the more important case of Thompson v. Whitman, which it follows and applies (see ante, pp. 211, 312.)

The Legal News also publishes a highly interesting and important decision by Mr. Circuit Judge Drummond, United States Circuit Court, Northern District of Illinois, in The Atlantic & Pacific Telegraph Co. v. The Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. Co., of which the following is the syllabus: "An act of Congress of July 24, 1866, provides that any telegraph company then organized, or which might thereafter be organized, etc., should have the right to construct lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, and over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States, which had been or might thereafter be declared such by acts of Congress. Other acts declare all railroads in the United States to be post roads: Held, that it was not intended by these statutes to authorize any telegraph company to work on the road way of a railroad, or upon a post road of a railroad belonging to it, and not to the public, and that the plaintiff has no right to establish a telegraph line upon defendant's right of way without making compensation therefor in accordance with law."

The Legal News also publishes a very interesting bankruptcy decision of Mr. District Judge Blodgett, of the United States District Court at Chicago, holding that creditors who, since the amendment of June 22, 1874, have joined in the petition, cannot afterwards be allowed to withdraw from the proceedings; that such a practice would lead to underhanded agreements between the debtor and a part of his creditors at the expense of the others, and cannot be allowed. But the learned judge intimates that if all desire to dismiss the proceedings it could be done.

The Legal News also publishes Main v. Second National Bank of Chicago, decided by Mr. District Judge Hopkins, and published in this journal for April 30 (ante, p. 232.) Also Vallette v. Bennett, Supreme Court of Illinois, construction of the deed of an assignee in bankruptcy. Also Freese v. Tripp, Supreme Court of Illinois, expounding the Illinois temperance law of 1872, with reference to the measure of damages which a wife is entitled to recover against a saloon keeper who sells liquor to the husband, whereby she suffers injury in consequence of his becoming intoxicated. Also Carpenter v. Sherfy, same court, sheriff's sale under a void judgment.

The Albany Law Journal, for August 1, contains an article by "D.," combatting the views contained in a previous article by J. Alexander Fulton, Esq., of Dover, Delaware, on the doctrine of ancient lights. Under the head of "Some Recent Decisions" we are made acquainted with the points ruled in a number of interesting cases in 11 American Reports. John F. Barker, Esq., of New York, discusses the interesting question, Who is the Legal Custodian of Dead Bodies? This number of the Albany Law Journal contains (as usual) much other interesting and instructive matter.

The Chicago Railway Review, for August 1, publishes Osborne v. Hartford & New Haven Railroad Co., Supreme Court of Connecticut, on railway taxation. Also a synopsis of Chief Justice Waite's opinion in Swasey v. The North Carolina Railway Co., et al., which was a suit on railway-aid bonds guaranteed by the state of North Carolina.

We do not find in our other exchanges, received this week, anything of general interest.

Notes and Queries.

ST. LOUIS, July 27, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Do you know anything of the work just published by Dunlap & Blickensderfer of Erie, Penn., entitled "Law Student's Review book?" Is it a reliable work, or is it any account at all? Answer through columns of CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, and oblige

STUDENT.

ANSWER.—We have not seen the book referred to, but will give "Student" the benefit of the opinion of two of our exchanges. The Legal Intelligencer says of it: "When a student at law has read the course usually assigned him by his preceptor, the latter calmly directs him, as examination approaches, to "review" what he has read. This practically means a re-reading of the whole, which the time will not allow. At this juncture the student will find the above work of very great value. It is a pocket edition of common and mercantile law, by which he can more readily familiarize himself with their ever-recurring principles, than by the tedious perusal of volumnious text-books. Within its 300 hundred duodecimo pages are embraced abridgments of Blackstone, Evidence, Pleading, including Parties to and Forms of Action, the Law of Contracts, and a Glossary of law terms and phrases. We are surprised and gratified to find so small a book contain so much useful matter, well digested and arranged."

The more critical editor of the Albany Law Journal notices it as follows:

"This litle book is designed, as we gather from the preface, to aid the student in a review of some of the principal topics of the law. So far it will be found convenient and useful, but we should not recommend any one to undertake to get from it a knowledge of the law, de novo. It contains a synopsis of Blackstone's Commentaries, and of the rules of evidence, pleading and contracts, and concludes with a brief tribute to Blackstone, written, we are informed, by Mr. Dunlap, while engaged in the study of Blackstone's Commentaries. Mr. Dunlap would better have stuck to the Comentaries and let verse-making alone. We quote the concluding lines of this wonderful effusion:

'Where shall we look but to the great Creator,
For one superior to our commentator?'"

Legal News and Notes.

—MAJOR ASA BIRD GARDINER, judge advocate, has been assigned to duty as professor of law at the West Point Military Academy.

—COL. THOMAS C. NESBITT, of Georgia, is dead. He was a prominent man of that state, and an able lawyer.

—JAMES M. SHERMAN, Esq., an eminent member of the New York bar, and a widely known and much esteemed citizen, died suddenly at his residence in New York city, on the 27th instant.

—EDWARD LANGE, convicted last October of stealing United States mail bags, and sentenced by Judge BENEDICT of the United States District Court at Brooklyn, to pay a fine of $200 and be imprisoned one year, was subsequently resentenced to imprisonment alone, the first sentence being contrary to the statute. The second sentence was declared invalid by the supreme court, and Lange was discharged. He now has begun suit against Judge BENNEDICT, for false imprisonment, claiming $50,000 damages and his costs.

—A JUDGE of one of the courts of Kentucky, the other day, so far forgot what was due to his high office as to challenge the editor of the Cincinnati Enquirer to mortal combat. The challenge elicited a card from the editor in which he uses the following language:

"If I acknowledged the right of ever ypublic wrong-doer, whose actsare discussed in the Enquirer, to challenge me to mortal combat, I would find my time so thoroughly taken up with affairs of honor that I would neither be able to earn a livelihood nor serve the public. I have already expressed the opinion the code is the refuge of swashbucklers."

—THE trustees of the Louisville Medical College (Louisville, Ky.), appreciating the impoverished condition of the whole country, have determined to grant a benificiary scholarship to any young man who, sufficiently educated to study medicine and of good character, is unable to pay for his education. To secure this valuable aid, application, with a full statement of the facts, should be made without delay to Dr. E. S. Gaillard, dean, Louisville, Ky. The Louisville medical college is one of the best in the country. Dr. Gillard, one of the principal instructors, is the editor of two widely circulated medical journals, and has a reputation coextensive vith the Union.

—THE business of defrauding life insurance companies is getting to be an important branch of the blackleg profession. We have recently seen Udderzook and Goss burn up a resurrected corpse in a tenement in Baltimore, for this purpose; and then we have seen Udderzook kill Goss in order to cover up of the crime. Still later, a doctor somebody is sent to the penitentiary for two years by a court in New York city for burying a coffin full of bricks, with a like thrifty end in view. And now comes a report from Ireland to the effect that some smart fellows have been detected in a conspiracy to cheat the New York Insurance Company, but unfortunately for themselves they were found out. Among the accused were two doctors, who certified as to the health of their neighbors from general knowledge, without taking the trouble of asking the interested persons whether they wanted their lives insured or not. The jury considered that this was criminal neglect, and found them guilty, as well as the agent, who seems to have been the organizer of the conspiracy to defraud. All three were sent to prison, with hard labor, the doctors for twelve months and the agent for eighteen. In the opinion of the Irish press the punishment is too light.

Digitized by Google

—HON. JAMES B. BOWLIN, formerly judge of the Criminal Court of Saint Louis, and who since filled many important public stations, died recently in Saint Louis. Hon. Lewis V. Bogy, speaking in eulogy of Judge Bowlin at the bar meeting called on the occasion of his death, used the following language expressive of the great changes which time has wrought in the ranks of the St. Louis bar: "Among the members of the bar of that day who are still living, I now at this moment remember but John F. Darby, Judge Hamilton Judge Primm, Gov. Polk, and Judge Drake, now a resident of Washington city. All the other lawyers who were here in 1835 are now dead Some of them were truly distinguished men, yet, it is painful to say, are now in a manner forgotten, even by th ir successors at the same bar, where at one time they were such leading and shining characters. Yet several of them filled the highest offices in the land—United States senator, judge of the supreme court, governor of the state, member of the lower house of Congress, and cabinet minister of the United States—Geyer, Bates, Spaulding, Gamble, Allen and Lawless were men of decided ability and learning in their profession."

—THE fable of the dog who, while crossing a brook with a piece of meat in his mouth, saw his reflection in the water beneath the narrow foot-bridge, and who dropped the substance in order to snatch at the shadow, has been recently illustrated before our courts. Mr. Blank some years ago married a lady much older than himself, who possessed a snug little property which included real estate in Kansas valued at fifty thousand dollars. Mr. Blank's wife died recently, bequeathing to her husband a life interest in the Kansas property, but her relatives contested the will on the ground that the testator had been subjected to undue influence, and they succeeded in getting the will set aside. Exceptions to this decision were promptly filed, but while Mr. Blank's counsel were waiting to argue them, one of the lawyers thought it would be well to ascertain the nature of the laws of Kansas in relation to the reversion of property by married women dying childless and intestate. He found the Kansas laws differing greatly from our own in this respect, for in that state the property of wives without issue who leave no wills, goes to their husbands. The real estate owned by the deceased wife of Mr. Blank being situated in Kansas, the laws of that state would govern its disposition; therefore the decree of the court, in setting aside Mr. Blank's will, gave her property absolutely to her consort. It is needless to add that the counsel for Mr. Blank dropped their exceptions, and that the joy of their client and the chagrin of his late wife's relatives are about equa, in degree.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Notes of Cases.

Our notes of English cases are from the Law Times. Our notes of cases decided in the New York Court of Appeals and in the New York Commission of Appeals are from the Albany Law Journal. Those decided in the Supreme Court of Ohio are from advance sheets of the 24 Ohio State Reports, furnished by Messrs. Rorer Clarke & Co , of Cincinnati, or from the American Law Record (Cincinnati). Those decided in the Kentucky Court of Appeals are from the American Law Record. Those decided in the Supreme Court of the United States are from printed opinions in our possession Those decided by the Supreme Court of Michigan are from Chaney's Quarterly Digest Others are from cases reported in our exchanges, unless otherwise stated.

Bankruptcy—Composition with Creditors.—It is well known that the feature introduced into our bankrupt law by the recent amendment which relates to compositions with creditors, is similar to the English and also to the Irish bankrupt acts. It will, therefore, be interesting to note, from time to time, the decisions of the courts of those countries with reference to this subject. In the case of J. L., an arranging debtor, determined in the Irish Court of Bankruptcy, before MILLER, J., and reported in 8 Irish Law Times Reports, 106, it was ruled that if a debtor who has carried an arrangement under the arrangement clauses of the Irish bankruptcy and insolvency act, 1857, fail to pay the instalments of the composition which his creditors have agreed to accept, the creditors are remitted to their original rights. The court of bankruptcy will not restrain such a creditor from proceeding in a court of common law to recover the entire amount of the debt for which he had agreed to take a composition in the arrangement matter. The learned judge said that "payment of the several instalments of composition in the manner as thus provided is the condition precedent upon which the entire composition hinges, and the debtor was not to be discharged from his original liability to pay the full amount of his debt, unless he paid the composition according to the manner provided in that composition arrangement; or, in other words, from the moment at which the debtor failed to pay the composition according to his arrangement, any creditor who had not compromised himself by his personal conduct, is necessarily, at his own desire, remitted, according to every principle of equity and law, to his original rights and remedies; and under any such agreement, in the terms as stated, no court of equity would interfere unless the default occurred through some accidental circumstances over which the debtor himself had not, perhaps, any control. In a case like the present, where the arrangement for composition admits of so simple a construction, there is no necessity for reviewing the authorities, which are both clear and cumulative."

Married Women — Partnership.— In Swasey v. Antram, Supreme Court of Ohio, December Term, 1873 (Am. Law Record, June, 1874), the following points are ruled:

A married woman has not the capacity to enter into a general mercantile partnership not connected with or relating to her separate property; and where she assumes to do so with the consent of her husband, and is by him assisted in managing and carrying on the business, the husband, and not the wife, is to be regarded in law as the partner.

A feme covert, having obtained a "permit" to trade within the lines of the army, with the knowledge and consent of her husband, entered into a partnership with other persons for the purpose of buying and selling goods and merchandise under "permit," and she, with the assistance of her husband, managed and conducted the business. The firm was subsequently dissolved, and its property transferred by the other partners to her, she agreeing to pay all the partnership debts. She then sold the property to S., who had notice of all the facts, and who in like manner agreed to pay the partnership debts. This was all done with the knowledge and concurrence of the husband, who joined her in executing the bill of sale to S. In an action by a creditor of the firm against the husband and the other members of the firm, not including the wife—

Held, that the goods in the hands of S., or the price agreed by him to be paid therefor, and not yet paid, are liable to attachment in the action.

Mexican Grant—Statute of Limitations.—In LeRoy v. Carroll, 7 Pacific Law Reporter, 201, Mr. Circuit Judge SAWYER, of the United States Circuit Court for the Ninth Federal Circuit, District of California, decided that the statute of limitations of California does not begin to run against a confirmed Mexican grant, formerly located under the act of Congress of 1860 (12 Stat. 34), until the patent issues. This ruling is based on Henshaw v. Bissell, Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1873, in which Mr. Justice FIELD, in delivering the opinion of the court, said that "the statute can only begin to run against the title perfected under legislation of Congress, from the date of its consummation."

Municipal Bonds—Enforcement of Payment after Judgment—Aldermen Resigning—Costs.—In United States ex rel. I. W. Pollard v. The City Council of The City of Pleasant Hill, United States Circuit Court, Western District of Missouri, April Term, July 6, 1874, an alternative writ of mandamus was, on the 19th day of May, 1874, granted upon an information showing that the relator had previously obtained a judgment against the city, upon which execution has been issued, and returned in part unsatisfied for want of property whereon to levy. The writ commanded the city council to levy a special tax to pay the balance due on the execution. Returns were made by the mayor and councilmen, who together constitute the city council, setting forth that, since the writ was served upon them, all the councilmen had resigned, leaving their offices vacant, and the mayor alone was left to administer the city government; and that the charter of the city conferred no power on him to levy the tax. There was a prayer that the writ abate as to the councilmen, and that they recover costs.

J. W. Rigdon, for respondents. T. K. Skinker, for relator, insisted that the costs should be adjudged against the councilmen.

KREKEL, J.—I have no hesitation in adjudging the costs against the councilmen, who have resigned since the writ was served on them, more especially as they make no attempt to purge themselves of their neglect to obey the writ. Having assumed the duties of public offices, they cannot be permitted thus to thwart the process of this court, deprive the relator of his remedy, and at the same time throw the costs upon him.

Marine Insurance—Stamp Act—"Slip"—"An Enormous Subtlety."—An interesting case, though perhaps of no practical importance in this country, was recently determined in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, Westminster, before Lord COLERIDGE, Baron BRAMWELL, Mr. Justice BRETT, Baron CLEASBY, Mr. Justice DENHAM, Baron POLLACK, and Baron AMPHLETT. The point was, whether the usual "slip" given by underwriters preliminary to a policy, and which had always been considered binding in honor, was in any way binding in law. The company's agent initialed, according to the usual practice, a "slip" for a policy of insurance on goods about to be shipped, and, according to the course of business observed by the company, their agent had a copy of the "slip" from the plaintiff, and sent it to the company, but the goods were lost before the policy was executed, and the company then declined to execute it. The "slip" was dated, March 16, 1871. On the 29th of Jaunary, 1872, the company being under liquidation, the liquidators wrote to enquire about the "slip" and had no answer from the agent, though the plaintiff told him to carry it out. On the 3d of February the plaintiff was debited by the broker with the premium and stamp duty, and on the 13th of March the amount was received by the company, and the plaintiff asked for the policy but the defendant declined to execute it, and the "slip" was then lost. The stamp act of 1867 declares that no contract for sea insurance shall be valid, unless it shall be expressed in a policy, and no policy shall be admitted in any court, or be good or available in law or in equity unless stamped. It was impossible, then, to sue the company on any contract of insurance as none was executed but the plaintiff brought suit on the supposed undertaking or representation that their agent was authorized to accept risks in their behalf.

The judges were agreed that the only contract which could be shown was contained in the "slip," and as that was void under the stamp act, the plaintiff could not recover. The company was censured in severe terms for attempting to evade a contract binding in honor, but the judges could see no grounds on which to sustain it; and Baron BRAMWELL said that the reasoning of the dissenting justice of the Queen's Bench, Mr. Justice BLACKBURN. who held that the plaintiff entitled to recover, involved "an enormous subtlety."

Criminal Law—Receiving Stolen Goods—Evidence—Practice.—Plaintiff in error was indicted for receiving stolen goods. Upon the trial the prosecution, for the purpose of proving the scienter, showed that the accused had received property from other persons, knowing the same to have been stolen. Held, error.

If a prisoner upon trial for one offence calls out upon cross-examination without objection, facts tending to show that he is not guilty of another offence, this does not justify evidence on the part of the prosecution to prove that he is guilty of such other offence.

Calling out evidence for one purpose apparently innocent, and using it for another purpose which is illegal and improper, if it is manifest that the avowed object is colorable merely, is error. Coleman v. The People, N. Y. Court of Appeals. Opinion by ALLEN, J.

Gift.—This was an action brought to recover the balance of a book account alleged to be due from defendant. Plaintiff, with an intent to give the account to defendant, received a dollar from him which was credited, and then the account balanced by this entry: "Gift to balance account." Plaintiff also gave to defendant a receipt, stating in substance that he had received one dollar in full to balance all accounts. Held, that this constituted a valid gift, and plaintiff could not recover. Ryan v. Wood, 48 N. Y. 204, and Bunge v. Koop, Ib. 225, distinguished. Gray v. Barton, same court. Opinion by GROVER, J.

Partnership—Action against Estate of Deceased Partner—Pleading.—Action against defendant as executrix, etc., of C. to recover an indebtedness of the firm of D & C., of which firm defendant's testator was at the time of his death a partner. Plaintiff had recovered a judgment therefor against D., the surviving partner, execution was issued thereon and returned unsatisfied. Upon the opening of plaintiff's case, defendant's counsel moved for a dismissal of the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, inasmuch as it did not allege that the surviving partner was insolvent. The motion was denied, and defendant's counsel excepted. There was evidence given tending to show that D., the surviving partner, had property liable to levy and sale on execution sufficient to satisfy the judgment. The court below ruled that even if this was proved, in the absence of any proof of collusion, the return of the sheriff was sufficient to sustain the action, and defendant's counsel excepted. Held, no error; that a partnership creditor may enforce payment against the estate of the deceased partner, without bringing an action against the survivor, when he can prove the insolvency of the latter, or he may exhaust his legal remedy against the survivor, and then proceed against the deceased partner's estate. Pope et al. v. Cole, executrix, etc., same court. Opinion by GROVER, J.

Railway Aid Bonds—Construction of Statute.—Under the provisions of the act of 1869, authorizing municipal corporations to aid in the construction of railroads (chap. 907, Laws of 1869), as amended in 1871 (chap. 925, Laws of 1871), in order to give the county judge jurisdiction, the petition must show that the petitioners are a majority of the tax-payers of the municipal corporation to which it relates, "not including those taxed for dogs or highway tax only." People ex rel. Green v. Smith, County Judge of Ontario Co., et al., same court. Opinion by ANDREWS, J.

Indictment—Larceny.—Brown and Libby were convicted of larceny. The error assigned is insufficient description of the stolen property, e. g., "fifty dollars in money of the value of fifty dollars." Held, that the indictment was good. Brown v. People, and Libby v. People, Supreme Court of Michigan, April Term, 1874.

———. ———. This general form of charging larceny of money in an indictment would not have been good at common law without alleging the grand jury's inability to describe the money more specifically (Merwin v. People, 26 Mich. 298), and then only on proof of larceny of coin or legal tender of the country. Ibid.

Statutory and Common-Law Indictments.—The constitutional requirement that in every criminal prosecution the accused shall be informed of the nature of the accusation (Const. Mich., art. VI, sec. 28), was not meant to prevent the legislature from so altering the common-law form of charging an offence as to dispense with mere formal description, and unsubstantial particularity. But they can authorize no form of indictment that shall not give the offender fair notice of the particular offence to be proved, and an opportunity to procure his testimony in defence, that he may not be taken by surprise on the trial. Ibid.

Proof of Larceny.—In prosecuting for larceny of money, proof of the larceny of any single piece or bill of any denomination alleged, and of any value whatever, will sustain the indictment. Ibid.

"Money" Subject to Larceny.—The statute (Comp. Laws, § 7930), making it a sufficient indictment to allege generally a larceny or robbery of money, applies to United States legal tender notes. It might, perhaps, be invalid as to promissory notes and bills of exchange generally, and as to the notes of private parties, but valid as to coin and those descriptions of paper usually recognized as money. Ibid.

Specific Performance.—The power vested in courts of equity to compel the specific performance of contracts does not imperatively attach wherever there is a contract relation which the complainant has respected and the defendant has not. The specific peculiarities of the case, the doctrines of equity jurisprudence, and the settled principles and maxims of the court, must in each case be considered. (McMurtrie v. Bennette, Har. Ch. 124; Smith v. Lawrence. 15 Mich. 499; Chambers v. Livermore, 15 Mich. 381; Willard v. Tayloe, 8 Wall. 557). The real equity of the proceeding means performance on both sides, and not a compulsory surrender by one party to another without a present substantial and practical equivalent susceptible of enforcement by the courts. Buck v. Smith. Supreme Court of Michigan, April Term, 1874.

———. Indefinite Partnership.—A court of equity will not undertake to compel a party to go into a partnership where the agreement therefor is silent as to its duration, and where it may therefore be dissolved at the will of either as soon as formed. Ibid.

———. Enforcement of Indefinite Duties.—A court of equity cannot enforce the performance of daily prospective duties, or supervise or direct in advance the conduct of one who is to manage in the interest of a firm in which he is to be a member, and where the agreement contemplates that his personal skill and judgment shall govern according to the shifting needs of property and business. The doctrine of specific performance will not sanction such one-sided relief as to grant one party the essence of his claim, and decree the other a mere right to exact the consideration through the future performance of duties incapable of being specifically decreed. (Blacket v. Bates, L. R., 1 Ch. Ap. 117; Stocker v. Brockelbank, 5 E. L. & Eq. 67; Johnson v. Shrewsbury & B. R'y Co., 19 E. L. & Eq. 584; Pickering v. Bishop of Ely, 2 Y. & Coll. C. C. 249; Kemble v. Kean, 6 Sim. 333; Kimberley v. Jennings, 6 Sim. 340; Baldwin v. Society, etc., 9 Sim. 393; Gervais v. Edwards, 2 Dr. & W. 80; Bozon v. Farlow, 1 Mer. 459; Flight v. Bolland, 4 Russ. 298.) Ibid.

———. Case in Judgment.—Smith was to purchase an interest in a certain lumbering firm for the joint benefit of himself and Buck, he to furnish the money, and Buck, who was to be a partner, the skill and experience. There was between the two a written agreement, with which the other members of the prospective firm had nothing to do, providing for a quit-claim from Smith to Buck, and under this the latter began payment. Smith, however, went into the partnership and Buck was excluded. Buck asks specific performance, an accounting, and such relief by injunction as will protect his interest. His bill was dismissed, and this decree was affirmed, but without prejudice. Ibid.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 13, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

LAW OF MASTER AND SERVANT.—The interesting and valuable paper on this subject which we publish in this number is from the pen of the Hon. Francis Hilliard, of Worcester, Massachusetts, the well-known law writer, and has been prepared at our instance. Upon the topics upon which the article treats he has collected and arranged the cases with care. No lawyer in this country, perhaps, is more familiar with the course of adjudication on the subject he discusses, and we are glad to have an opportunity of presenting our readers with his article.

TEXAS STATE BONDS IN AID OF RAILWAY COMPANY—MANDAMUS TO STATE COMPTROLLER.—We publish in this number the opinion of the majority of the Supreme Court of Texas, holding that the comptroller of that state could not be compelled, by mandamus, to countersign and register 500 bonds of the state, of $1,000 to the International Railroad Company. The case is one of great importance in Texas, and of considerable interest generally. The case was originally argued in May. The court composed of four justices, were divided, and, under the constitution, a special justice was appointed, whose opinion we present to our readers. Two of the justices dissented. We incline in opinion with the special justice. The case was very ably argued by the attorney general of the state, Mr. Geo. Clark, for the comptroller. We do not know who argued the case against him.

STAMP DUTY ON WRITTEN INTRUMENTS—LATE ACT OF CONGRESS.—The following is the text of an important statute on this subject passed at the recent session of Congress: "That all instruments, documents, and papers heretofore made, signed, or issued, and subject to a stamp duty or tax, under any law heretofore existing and remaining unstamped, may be stamped by any person having an interest therein, or where the original is lost a copy thereof, at any time prior to the 1st day of January, 1876; and said instruments, documents, and papers, and any record thereof, shall be as valid to all intents and purposes as if stamped when made, signed or issued; but no right acquired in good faith, shall in any manner be affected by such stamping as aforesaid: Provided, That to render such stamping invalid the person desiring to stamp the same shall appear with the instrument, document, or paper, or copy thereof, before some judge or clerk of a court of record, and before him affix the proper stamp, and the said judge or clerk shall indorse on such writing a copy or certificate, under his hand when made by said judge, and under his hand and seal when made by said clerk, setting forth the date at which and the place where the stamp was so affixed, the name of the person presenting said copy, the fact that it was thus affixed, and that the stamp was duly cancelled in his presence."

The Revised Statutes of the United States—The Printing and Distribution of the Laws of Congress.

We elsewhere print in full the text of the recent act of Congress which provides for the printing and distribution of the revised statutes of the United States, and also of the acts of future sessions of Congress, with regard to the sale of these laws to private persons. The act is not as clear as it might have been made, but it is to be inferred that both the revised statutes and the subsequent volumes of statutes at large are to be sold by the secretary of state to private individuals at the cost of paper, presswork and binding, with ten per cent. added thereto.

We have taken the following interesting items with reference to the revised statutes of the United States, from the Chicago Legal News: "Not to exceed one hundred copies of the act revising and consolidating the statutes of the United States, were printed in book form. The object in printing these was to get a perfect copy to present to the president and the proper officers of the house and senate for signature. Mr. Poland, the chairman of the committee on revision in the house, secured one copy for each member of the judiciary committee of the house. Mr. Ward, member from this city, presented his copy to the Chicago Law Institute, where it may now be examined by the members. It is a valuable gift. It makes a volume of 1,035 pages. It will save the profession an untold amount of labor in not requiring them to hunt over the acts of Congress for many years to find any general law. As important questions have already arisen as to the effect of the repealing chapter upon the bankrupt and other laws that are incorporated in the revision, but have been amended at the present session, which amendments have not been published in the revision, we publish below the two sections of the repealing chapter bearing upon these questions:

"'Sec. 5,596. All acts of Congress passed prior to the first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, any portion of which is embraced in any section of said revision, are hereby repealed, and the section applicable thereto shall be in force in lieu thereof; all parts of such acts not contained in such revision, having been repealed or superseded by subsequent acts, or not being general and permanent in their nature: Provided, that the incorporation into said revision of any general and permanent provision taken from an act making appropriations, or from an act containing other provisions of a private, local or temporary character, shall not repeal or in any way affect any appropriation, or any provision of a private, local, or temporary character contained in any of said acts, but the same shall remain in force; and all acts of Congress passed prior to said last named day, no part of which are embraced in said revision, shall not be affected or changed by its enactment.'

"'Sec. 5,601. The enactment of the said revision is not to affect or repeal any act of Congress passed since the first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, and all acts passed since that date are to have full effect as if passed after the enactment of this revision, and so far as such acts vary from, or conflict with, any provision contained in such revision, they are to have effect as subsequent statutes, and as repealing any portion of the revision inconsistent therewith.'"

Digitized by Google

"Councils of Honor."

Regulations have just been issued in Berlin, for the formation of "councils of honor" among Prussian officers. Every officer who considers his honor attacked by a comrade is required to give information to this tribunal, and no duel can come off without its approval, nor until the failure of any other solution. The president of the tribunal is to be president at the duel to see that it is properly conducted. Officers engaged in duels are not to be subject to criminal proceedings unless the occasion or issue of the encounter is a violation of the rules of honor, such as a serious, unprovoked insult. "I will no more," says the emperor, according to the London Times, "tolerate in the army an officer who wantonly attacks the honor of a comrade, than an officer who does not know how to guard his own honor."

The above, which we take from an exchange, reads more like a dream of the feudal ages than like a serious regulation published for the government of the officers of the army of a Christian nation. It seems in the highest degree grotesque that a tribunal should be established in a civilized state, whose function it is to determine whether or not a duel shall be fought, and whose president in the event the question is decided in the affirmative, is to attend upon the field of honor and see fair play. The dictatès of common sense would seem to be satisfied if the functions of such a tribunal were limited to the ascertaining of which party is in the wrong, and to the punishing of the wrong doer.

That an army to be efficient must be led by men who are so punctilious and sensitive that nothing but blood will satisfy their wounded honor, is a conclusion not justified by history. The English Court of King's Bench, has more than once punished as murderers British officers who have killed others on the so-called field of honor. This was done in the case of Captain Alexander Campbell, within the memory of men still living. And yet the soldiers of no nation have surpassed in valor those of Great Britain. Braver troops never confronted an enemy than the eighteen thousand British that defended the cheateau of Hougomont. and stood like a wall of fire on the plateau of Mont Sainte Jean, and, while their allies deserted them on every side, hurled back the legions of him whose name was an army in itself. The men who commanded the armies of Cromwell, which placed their feet upon the necks of the aristocracy of England; which conquered Ireland, and which spread dismay to the hearts of the most resolute legions of the continent, would have scorned any proposal to settle an affair of injured honor by fighting a duel. And yet the great Turenne, under whose leadership they fought on the continent, declared that he, for the first time, beheld in them his boyish ideal of the soldier. They rejoiced at the sight of the enemy, and betrayed on every field the "fierce desire of battle."

* * * "No thought of flight,
None of retreat; no unbecoming deed
That argued fear; each on himself relied,
As only in his arm the moment lay
Of victory." * * *

Fortified places which seemed impregnable could not withstand the fury of their assault; and the most tried and disciplined battalions were scattered before the terror of their onset. And yet so far were they from the spirit of chivalry which fights duels, that they sang psalms through their noses on the field of battle, attributed their astonishing victories not to their own prowess, but to the grace of God; and it was no infraction of discipline for a corporal to preach a sermon upbraiding his colonel for ungodliness.

The common law may perhaps be justly accused of paying too little regard to the honor of the citizen. It is true that a defamation of one's character is actionable, but it is only upon the theory that it has caused him pecuniary damage. The common law in such cases takes no account whatever of his injured feelings. And no matter how grievously one one man upbraids or insults another in private, so that the injury does no extend beyond mere words, the common law affords no redress. Nay, it does not even hold insulting words, in any case, a justification of an assault; although if such words lead to an assault, and the assaulted party brings suit against his assailant for the supposed injury, the opprobrious words which led to the assault will be looked to in mitigation of damages. The civil law, as administered in Germany, and perhaps elsewhere in Europe, appears to be different. It constantly punishes opprobrious language, and thereby protects its citizens against private insult, and in so doing protects the public against breaches of the peace. In this we think it proceeds upon a much more enlightened principle than the common law. We believe that the citizen has as strong a right to demand of the laws of his country protection against the pain and degredation of private insult, as against the pecuniary loss occasioned by public defamation. We place the question also upon the higher grounds of public policy; we assert our strong conviction that the state is as deeply interested in protecting and upholding the honor, as the lives and liberties of its citizens. And viewing the matter in this light, the resolution of the old emperor seems grounded upon a liberal and enlightened principle; although we confess that the establishing of a tribunal, judicial in its nature, whose function it is to determine when a duel shall be fought, and whose presiding judge is to preside at the fighting of the same, upsets all our ideas of the purposes for which judicial tribunals are instituted.

Master and Servant.

The responsibility of one man for the contracts or wrongs of another is a subject which has given rise to numerous controversies, and upon which the law in some respects is not fully settled. Master and servant is one comprehensive relation under which these questions have arisen; another, is principal and agent. Between these two connections the line is not very distinctly drawn, and to some extent, indeed, they may be considered as equivalent or synonymous. In general it may be said that the technical meaning of the word servant, substantially in correspondence with its popular meaning, is that of an employment somewhat inferior to an agency. A servant is one rather employed to perform some service, with no further trust than that necessarily involved in such service; while an agent, in addition to the work which he is to perform, is often or generally entrusted with property of the principal. The servant acts under a naked power; the agent has a power with an interest. Partly as the result of this difference, legal controversies which grow out of the relation between master and servant are more frequently cases of wrong; those which pertain to agency are actions of contract, including, however, the wrong of fraud, which may be said to constitute the connecting link between tort and contract.

Digitized by Google

Some recent cases turn upon the point, what is necessary to constitute the technical relation of master and servant. In Brady v. Giles 1 M. & Rob. 494, Lord ABINGER left it to the jury whether the person guilty of negligence was the servant of the defendant. In Lackawanna v. Chenewith, 52 Penn. St. 382, a railroad company was held liable for an injury where the plaintiff was allowed to attach a freight car to a passenger train, though contrary to the "instructions and rules" of the road, and though agreeing to "run all risks," and although he agreed to attend to the brakes on his car; the last circumstance did not make him their servant. In Flinn v. Philadelphia, 1 Hous. 469, where the defendants, a railroad, were accustomed, when live stock carried upon the road was attended by the owner, to issue a free drover's ticket, upon his paying the freight and releasing them from all liability for the transportation, also to make a discount of 25 per cent. upon the freight, and the plaintiff, a drover, was injured by a collision, he was held to be a passenger, not a servant of the road, and to have a right of action. In Williamson v. Wadsworth, 49 Barb. 294, the civil engineer and traveling agent of a manufacturing company was held to be a servant within the meaning of a statute which makes stockholders personally liable for debts due to their laborers, servants and apprentices. One who makes temporary use of the services of another's servant may be liable for the acts of such servant. Wood v. Cobb, 13 Allen, 58.

The same liability arises though a person is not the owner or manager of a steamboat, and has no authority to hire, control, or discharge its employees, if it is navigated by him or for him. And if navigated by him or for him jointly with another person, the acts and negligence of such employees are, in law, those of him and his associates, jointly, and severally. Fay v. Davidson, 13 Minn. 523.

Evidence of the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant corporation, in which the plaintiff agreed to keep defendant's horses and to furnish them with hay and other things, and to board a man in case the defendant should require a man to take care of the horses; and evidence that B was in the defendant's employ, and that he was sent to take care of the horses by another of the defendant's servants, and in accordance with the recommendation of the defendant's general superintendent, is sufficient to leave to the jury the question whether B was the defendant's agent while furnishing hay to the horses, and consequently rendered the defendant liable for B's negligence. Stone v. Western, 38 N. Y. 240.

The defendant, having hired a horse and carriage from the plaintiff, intrusted the horse to A., the servant of B., an inn-keeper, to be fed. In consequence of A's not replacing the bit, the horse became unmanageable, and the horse and carriage were damaged. Held, A. was to be considered as the defendant's servant, and the action was maintained. Hall v. Warner, 60 Barb. 198.

A gas company, having been notified that gas was escaping from pipes which it had introduced into the cellar of a house at the request of A., the occupant, sent S., one of its servants, to ascertain where the leak was. He lighted a match in the cellar, and caused an explosion, which severely injured A's child, seven years old, who was in the house. Held, an action by the child against the company should be sustained, although the pipe was put in by the plaintiff's father, as the duties of S. extended to finding the leak, and the accident originated in the improper method of examination. Lannen v. Albany, etc. Co., 46 Barb. 264.

Where money was sent by express to B., in care of K., with the consent of B., and K. delivered the money to F, who absconded with it, and the jury found that F. was not the agent of the person sending the money; held, it must be taken that B. consented that K. should act for him and that the person sending the money was not responsible if K. failed to deliver the money to the right person. Sykes v. Bates, 26 Iowa, 521.

V. was a passenger on a street horse-car, and, on its arrival at a point of intersection with a steam-railroad, the crossing was occupied by a train of steam-cars, and the horse-car stopped to wait the passage of the train. After the train had crossed the street, the flagman of the steam railroad signaled the driver of the car to go forward, and he did so, and at the same time the train backed and struck the car before it had quite crossed the track, injuring V. Held, in an action against the horse-railroad, the fact, that the driver had been directed to obey the signals of the flagman, and did so obey them, did not make the flagman an agent of the horse-railroad. Chicago v. Volk, 45 Ill. 175.

One receiving his share of the crop for work on land is not a servant. Burgess v. Carpenter, 2 S. C. 7. See further, Killion v. Power, 51 Penn. St. 429.

The distinction between servant and contractor has given rise to very numerous cases relating to the liability of an alleged master for the wrong or neglect of his employee. The decided weight of modern authority is, that a contractor is not a servant, chiefly upon the ground that he assumes an independent responsibility, and is not under the control of his employer with reference to the mode of executing his contract. It is obvious, however, that servants working for stipulated wages, are still contractors; and the numerous and conflicting cases upon the subject have turned upon the precise relative position of the parties, on terms of mutual agreement which established one or the other of these relations. That the employee follows an independent occupation in which he may be presumed skillful, is not decisive against the employer's liability. Thus, in Brackett v. Lubke, 4 Allen, 138, the employee was a carpenter, hired to repair an awning, which afterwards fell upon the head of a passenger in the street, and the defendants, the employers, were held responsible. In Sadler v. Henlock, 4 Ell. & B. 570, Lord CAMPBELL says: "What difference can it make that Pearson was an independent laborer to be paid by the job. The defendant might have said 'fill up the hole in the road, but not as you are now doing it, lest when a horse goes over the place he may be injured." Ib. 579. In the same case (Ib. 578), CROMPTON, J., says: "It is only on the ground of a contractor not being a servant that I can understand the authorities" that the work, in the prosecution of which an injury was done, was performed upon the land of the defendant, and, more especially, that it naturally or necessarily produced what the law deems a nuisance, are considerations which have sometimes had much weight in charging the owner of such property for the negligence of even a contractor. See Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black, 418; Storrs v. Utica, 17 N. Y. 104; McCamus v. Citizens, etc., 40 Barb. 380; Silvers v. Nerdlinger, 30 Ind. 53. As has been already remarked, however, the weight of authority recognizes the distinction between a contractor and a servant; and the leading case of Bush v. Steinman, 1 B. & P. 404, in which it was noticeably disregarded, may be considered as now overruled.

Digitized by Google

While the liability of the master for the mere negligence of his servant seems perfectly well settled, the cases are not entirely reconcilable with reference to his liability for wilful wrongs of the servant, though done in connection with the master's business. The strong tendency, however, of the more recent decisions is, to hold the master equally responsible for both classes of injury. The question has of late been most frequently raised in actions against railroad companies for acts of force, unjustifiable in kind or excessive in degree, committed by their conductors or other officers from violation of the rules of the company.

In Seymour v, Greenwood, 30 L. J. Ex. 378; 7 H. & N. 358, WILLIAMS, J., well expresses the principle of liability upon which the most recent cases seem to proceed. "It is argued that, though it cannot be denied that the defendant authorized his guard to superintend the conduct of the omnibus, generally, and that that authority must include an authority to turn out any passenger who misconducts himself, yet that it gives no authority to turn out an unoffending passenger. But by giving the guard authority to turn out an offending passenger, the defendant necessarily gave him also authority to judge for himself who should be considered an offending passenger." Acc. Goff v. Great, 3 El. & El. 672, where the act complained of was the arrest of the plaintiff for the benefit of the company, there being authority to arrest a passenger for traveling without payment of his fare, and the court held that the station-master and the policeman had implied authority to arrest those whom he believed to be guilty, and if there was a mistake, it was a mistake made within the scope of their authority.

But in the late case of Poulton v. The London, etc., L. R. 2 Q. B. 534, the important distinction was made that when a railroad company would itself have no right to arrest, a wrongful arrest by one of its employees would not render the company liable, as where the plaintiff was detained in custody by two policemen, under the orders of the station master, for non-payment of the freight of a horse, the company would have a right to detain the horse, but not to arrest the owner, and therefore the action for false imprisonment did not lie.

Some other leading cases will show the course of authority upon the same subject.

The general rule is laid down that a master is liable, where an act, though done without special orders, is one which the servant was justified in doing, and was unskilfully done. Gilmartin v. N. Y., 55 Barb. 239.

The plaintiff's horse, in charge of his servant, who was guilty of negligence, was killed in consequence of a span of horses, belonging to the defendant, which had run away with his coachman, it running against a feed wagon. Held, although A. was guilty of no fault or negligence, the action was maintainable if A. caused the injury by running against the wagon, though solely with a view to his personal safety, if the act was a prudent one for the purpose of stopping the horses. Wolfe v. Mersereau, 4 Duer, 473.

A master is responsible where his servant, while felling trees by his order, and in the scope of his business, either wilfully or negligently trespassed upon land of the plaintiff. Luttrell v. Haden, 3 Sneed, 20. The defendant gave a general direction to his servant to clear the snow from a roof, which was done by throwing it into the street, whereby a man was killed. Held, under a statute which authorized an action for an injury causing death, the master was responsible. Althof v. Wolf, 2 Hilt. 344.

A city railroad is liable for the forcible and malicious ejection of a passenger from the platform of a car, it being left to the driver to determine whether a passenger is unlawfully on the platform. Meyer v. Secord, 8 Brown, 305. So an action was maintained where the defendants, omnibus proprietors, directed their guards to remove disorderly passengers, and one of the guards, erroneously considering the plaintiff disorderly, ejected him carelessly and with excessive force. Seymour v. Greenwood, 7 H. & N. 356.

On the other hand it has been sometimes held, though this can hardly be considered the prevailing rule, that, if the servants of a railroad, exceeding their authority, unlawfully expel a passenger from the cars, the company is not liable; nor for any unnecessary violence in ejecting a passenger. Hibbard v. N. Y., 15 N. Y. 455.

The defendant, owner of a bridge, employed A. as toll-keeper. A vicious dog of A. bit the plaintiff, but the defendant had not personally kept or harbored the dog, nor authorized the keeping of him, nor was the dog necessary for the business in which A. was employed. Held, the defendant was not liable. Baker v. Kinsey, 38 Cal. 631.

An action was held not maintainable under the following circumstances: The infant son of the plaintiff asked leave of B., the defendant's servant, to ride on a wagon which B. was driving. B. said he might ride when he got up the hill. A. caught hold of the wagon between the front and hind wheels. B. started the horses into a trot, and A. was thrown down under a wheel and badly hurt. Wright v. Wilcox, 19 Wend. 343.

And the general rule has been laid down that a master is not responsible for the wilful or criminal wrong or trespass of his servant. Jones v. Hart, 2 Salk. 440; Coleman v. Riches, 16 Com. B. 104; Hubbersty v. Ward, 8 Exch. 330. Or that the injury must arise in the execution of some service, lawful in itself, but negligently or unskilfully performed, and not be a wanton violation of law by the servant, though occupied about the master's business. Moore v. Sanborne, 2 Mich. 519.

This was the point decided in the leading case of McManus v. Crickett, 1 E. 109, where the Court of King's Bench went into an examination of all the authorities, and after much discussion and great consideration, held that, by committing a wilful wrong the, servant virtually abandoned his master's business, who, therefore, was not liable to the party injured. And text books of authority have favored this view. See 2

Digitized by Google

Greenl. Evi. 52, 1 68; 2 Kent, 5th ed. 258; 1 Sharsw. Blackstone, 431.

The plaintiff, having purchased a railroad ticket, applied to A., the employee charged with that duty, to have his baggage checked, and by abusive language and threatening gestures provoked a quarrel, in which A. struck him with a hatchet. Judgment for the defendant. Little v. Wetmore, 19 Ohio St. 110. An incorporated district is not liable in trespass for illegal service of a horse of the plaintiff, by one of its officers, for alleged violation of an ordinance which did not actually occur. Fox v. Northern, 3 W. & S. 103.

A leading case on this subject is Coleman v. Riches, 16 Com. B. 103. That was action against a wharfiinger for the act of A., his servant. A. fraudulently and falsely signed a receipt, acknowldging the delivery of certain wheat of B. at the wharf, to be shipped to the order of the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff was led to pay the price to B. It appeared that the plaintiff was accustomed, with the knowledge of the defendant, to pay for all wheat delivered for him at the wharf, upon the seller's producing the defendant's receipt. It was held that the act of A. was not so far within the scope of his authority or course of employment as to render the defendant liable to the plaintiff for the loss sustained by the payment made to B. JERVIS, C. J., says, p. 117: "The defendant's agent had only authority to give receipts for goods which had, in fact, been delivered at the wharf. * * * Numerous actions were brought * * * against news-agents for libels contained in newspapers sold by their servants over the counter; the liability of these persons was put * * * upon the ground that the servant was acting strictly within the scope of his employment, and consequently the master was liable for his act. So, where bakers have been held to be liable criminally for the excessive and exorbitant use of alum in making bread. * * * So, also, in the various cases against brewers for the illegal use of drugs in their trade. So, in the case of a servant negligently driving his master's carriage. * * * When Board gave a receipt for wheat which had never been delivered, * * * he was not acting for his master, but contrary to his duty, and against his master's interest." (See also Grant v. Norway, 10 Com. B. 665; Hubbersty v. Ward, 8 Exch. 330.) In the same case—p. 119, CREPWELL, J., pointedly says, "He was not employed to represent that to be true which he knew to be false."

F. H.

New Bankrupt Amendment—Construction and Practice under it—Judge Blacthford's decision in re Scull.

When the amendatory bankrupt act of June 22, 1874, was passed, the number of petitions in involuntary bankruptcy filed in Judge BLATCHFORD'S court between December 1, 1873, and June 22, 1874, was 346. Of this number 98 were discontinued, and in 118 others adjudications had been entered. This left 130 in which no adjudication had been entered, and which came under the provisions of the act of 1874.

These 130 were in the same situation as the case of Isaac Scull, which has made a test case and which owing to the ability and experience in bankruptcy of the learned judge who decided it and by whom it was carefully considered, we regard of no inconsiderable value.

The facts were these:—The petition was filed on the 4th of June, 1874. The order to show cause was returnable on the 13th of June, and personally served on the alleged bankrupt on the 5th of June. On the return day proof of service was filed, but the alleged bankrupt did not appear, and at the request of the petitioning creditors the matter was adjourned from time to time until after the approval of the amendatory act of June 22, 1874, no adjudication being directed to be entered, and, of course, no adjudication being entered. The petitioning creditors now ask for an entry of an order of adjudication as on default for want of appearance. The papers are in due form under the statute as it stood prior to its amendment by the act of 1874, and but for the provisions of the latter act the right to an adjudication would be clear. The twelfth section of the act of 1874 proves that the adjudication in involuntary bankruptcy can be made only on the petition of one or more creditors of a debtor "who shall constitute one-forth at least in number, and the aggregate of whose debts, provable under this act, amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable, the provisions of the act applying to all cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy commenced since December 1, 1873."

BLATCHFORD, J., after citing the statutes bearing on the question, says that, as in the present case, the petition does not state that the petitioners constitute the requisite number and amount of creditors, it must be held that it appears that the requisite number and amount of creditors have not petitioned. As the case was commenced before June 22, 1874, an order will be entered herein by the clerk, if the petitioning creditors desire, granting twenty days upon the formal entry of such order as the time within which the petition may be amended, so as to show compliance with the requirements of the statutes to the number and amount of petitioning creditors, and providing that, at the expiration of that time, the clerk shall present to the court all papers which shall have been filed, with a view to such amendment of the petition, to the end that the matter in bankruptcy may proceed, or the proceedings may be dismissed, as the case may be. The only act of bankruptcy alleged in the petition is that the debtor, being insolvent, suffered his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference to a creditor and to defeat the operation of the act. This was an act of bankruptcy when the petition was filed. By the act of 1874 it is no longer made an act of bankruptcy. The debtor being insolvent, must procure his property to be taken on legal process, with the intent to give a preference or to delay or defeat the operations of the act, and all the provisions of the section of the act of 1874, which specifies what are acts of bankruptcy on which a person can be adjudged a voluntary bankrupt, are by it made applicable to the present case, commenced since December 18, 1873. Therefore, if the present petition is to be proceeded with at all, it must, in respect to the matter alleged in it as constituting the act of bankruptcy set forth, be amended by averring that the debtor procured his property to be taken. An amendment to that effect will be allowed to be made within the twenty days before provided for.

—WE regret to learn that Mr. District Judge McCandless, of the United States District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania, is steadily declining in health, in consequence of a paralytic stroke received about a year ago.

Digitized by Google

Negligence — Injuries to Married Women — Evidence.

HARRIMAN et al. v. STOWE.

Supreme Court of Missouri, July Term, 1874.

Hon. WASH ADAMS,
" DAVID WAGNER,
" WM. B. NAPTON, } Judges.
" H. M. VORIES,
" T. A. SHERWOOD,

1. Negligence — Action for Injuries to Wife — Wife Competent Witness.— When a suit is brought by a wife, jointly with her husband, for injuries sustained by the wife in consequence of the negligence or unskillfulness of defendant, the wife is a competent witness, she being the substantial party in interest.

2. ——. Declarations Made to Physician.—The declarations of a person suffering from injuries recently received, as to the cause of the injury, made to a physician called in to see the injured party, are admissible as a part of the res gestæ, it appearing that the physician was cautioned by the court not to reveal anything prohibited by the statute.

3. ——. Respondeat Superior—Responsibility of Agent.—While, by the maxim respondeat superior, the principal is alone responsible for the mere nonfeasance or omission of duty of an agent, the agent is also responsible for his own misfeasance, negligence or positive wrong.

Karnes and Ess, for appellant; Johnson and Botsford, for respondent.

WAGNER, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff, a married woman, in conjunction with her husband, brought this action for damages against the defendant for injuries sustained by her falling through the hatchway, which it is alleged was constructed by the defendant, and by him negligently, carelessly and wrongfully left insecure and unprotected.

The answer denied the allegation of negligence, and as a further defense, set up that the house where the hatchway was built, was the property of defendant's wife, and that defendant, in doing the work, was acting as her agent. There was a replication as to negligence and carelessness, but it was admitted that the property belonged to defendant's wife.

The verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. Upon the trial, the plaintiff, Mrs. Harriman, was offered as a witness and excluded by the court. As she was the substantial party in the case under the statute, she was a competent witness, and the ruling of the court was erroneous. Tingley v. Cowgill, 48 Mo., 291; Fugate v. Price, 49 Mo., 441. But the plaintiff is not here as a complainant, and if the judgment is affirmed the error does not injure her. On the trial, E. W. Shauffler was sworn as a witness for the plaintiff, and stated that he was a practicing physician, and as such attended on the plaintiff. The defendant objected to his giving any testimony, because, under the statute, he was incompetent. This objection was overruled,

The witness was then asked to state in what condition he found the plaintiff when he was called in. This question was objected to by the defendant, for the same reason as above given. The court sustained the objection, but permitted the witness to answer under the following restriction: " In answering the question you will not reveal any information you may have received from the plaintiff while attending her in your professional character, which information was necessary to enable you to prescribe for her, a patient, in your capacity as a physician or surgeon." The witness then gave testimony tending to show that plaintiff was injured about noon, what her injuries were, that he was her physician before that time, and that he was called to see her between one and four o'clock of that day. At the same time she stated to him that the trap door in the kitchen had been left in an insecure condition, and that she stepped on it and fell through.

The statute says that a "physician or surgeon" shall be incompetent to testify " concerning any information which he may have acquired from any patient while attending him in a professional character, and which information was necessary to enable him to prescribe for such patient as a physician, or do any act for him as a surgeon." 2 Wag. Stat., p. 1374, § 8. As the court restricted the witness from giving any information forbidden by the statute, the the only enquiry is whether the evidence was admissible on any other principle. The general rule is that evidence, in order to become a part of the res gestæ, should consist of declarations made contemporaneously, or nearly so, with the main event by which it is alleged that the principal transaction occurred. Brownell v. Pacific R. R. Co., 47 Mo. 239.

But in the Insurance Co. v. Mosley 8 Wall., 397, where the question was carefully and ably considered, it was declared that though generally the declarations must be contemporaneous with the event, yet where there are any connecting cirumstances, they may even, when made some time afterward, form a part of the whole res gesta.

So, in Commonwealth v. McPike, 3 Cush., 181, the indictment was for manslaughter — the defendant was charged with killing his wife. It appeared that the deceased ran up stairs from her own room in the night, bleeding and crying " murder." Another woman, into whose room she was admitted, went at her request for a physician. A third person, who heard her cries, went for a watchman, and on his return proceeded to the room where she was. He found her on the floor bleeding. She said the defendant had stabbed her. The defendant's counsel objected to the admission of this declaration in evidence. The objection was overruled. The court decided that the evidence was properly admitted. It was said that it was of the nature of res gestaæ. It will be observed that the declarations were not contemporaneous, but that considerable time must have elasped between the time the act was committed and the declarations were made; but the screams of the injured woman, her running into another room, her being found bleeding upon the return of the person who went for the watchman, all formed connecting links and rendered the declarations equally as satisfactory as if they had been made at the time the wounds were given. In the present case, the witness came within a short time after the plaintiff received the injuries, he found her suffering, and she told him how she was hurt, namely, by falling through the trap door.

The accident and the declarations formed connecting circumstances, and, in the ordinary affairs of life, no one would doubt the truth of these declarations or hesitate to credit them as evidence. I can perceive no valid objection to their admissibility. The instructions given by the court submitted the case with unquestionable fairness. For the defendant the court declared the law:

First. Before the jury can find for the plaintiff it devolves on the plaintiffs to prove that the defendant constructed the trap-door and hatchway mentioned in plaintiffs' petition, carelessly, negligently and unskillfully, or so left it, and that Maggie M. Harriman, the plaintiff, fell through the trap-door and hatchway, and that such falling was occasioned by the careless, negligent and unskillful construction of said trap-door and hatchway by the defendant, or in so leaving it.

Second. If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant, in the construction of said hatchway and trap-door, and in leaving it, exercised such care as an ordinary prudent man would exercise doing similar work, to prevent injuries to persons passing over the same, then they will find for the defendant, and it devolves on the plaintiffs to prove that defendant failed to exercise such care.

These instructions were sufficiently favorable to the defendant, and there is nothing in those given by the court on the part of the plaintiff which in anywise conflicts with or militates against them.

But it is urged with great pertinacity here that the defendant, in doing the work, was acting as the agent of another, and that, therefore, he is responsible to his principal only, and not to the plaintiff.

The well settled principle of law is that, where an agent is employed to perform or superintend work, the principal is responsible to third persons for injuries caused by the neglect or nonfeasance of the agent in doing the work. Morgan v. Bowman, 22 Mo. 538. And this principle obtains though the agent exceeds his powers or disobeys his instructions, provided he does the act in the course of his employment. Douglas v. Stephens, 18 Mo. 362; Minter v. Pacific Railroad, 41 Mo. 503; Garritzen v. Duenckel, 50 Mo. 104.

Digitized by Google

In such cases the doctrine of respondeat superior applies, and the liability is cast upon the master who employed the agent and caused the work to be done. Barry v. St. Louis, 17 Mo. 121; Clark v. H. & St. Jo. R. R., 36 Mo. 202.

Judge STORY says the distinction ordinarily taken is between acts of misfeasance or positive wrongs, and nonfeasance or mere omissions of duty by private agents. The law on this subjeet as to principals and agents is founded upon the same analogies as exist in the case of masters and servants. The master is always liable to third persons for the misfeasances and negligences and omissions of duty of his servant in all cases within the scope of his employment. So the principal in like manner is liable to third persons for the like misfeasances, negligences, and omissions of duty of his agents, leaving him to his remedy over against the agent in all cases where the tort is of such a nature that he is entitled to compensation. The agent is personally liable to third persons for his own misfeasances and positive wrongs, but he is not in general liable to third persons for his own nonfeasances or omissions of duty in the course of his employment. His liability in these latter cases is solely to his principal; there being no privity between him and such third persons; and the privity exists only between him and his principal. Therefore the general maxim as to all such negligences and omissions of duty is, in cases of private agency, respondeat superior (Story on Agency, §308), and such is the general doctrine. 2 Kent Com., 10 Ed. 878, note; Pars. Cuntr. 5th Ed. 66; Colvin v. Holbrook, 2 Comst. 126; Denny v. Manhattan Co., 2 Denio 118; 1 Bl. Com. 413.

The true distinction, as stated by STORY, is between acts of misfeasance or positive wrongs and nonfeasances or mere omissions of duty. In the latter case the master or principal is alone liable to third persons; whilst in the former the responsibility rests upon both the principal and agent. Thus in Wright v. Wilcox (19 Wend. 343), COWEN, J., speaking for the court, says: "In a case of strict negligence by a servant while employed in the service of his master, I see no reason why an action will not lie against both jointly. They are both guilty of the same negligence, at the same time and under the same circumstances; the servant in fact and the master constructively by the servant his agent." Lord HOLT, in his celebrated judgment in Lane v. Cotton (12 Mod. 488; S. C., Ld. Raymond, 646, 655), says that for the neglect of the servant third persons can have no remedy against him, but that the master alone is chargable. But for a misfeasance or actual tort an action will lie against the servant because he is a wrong-doer. The same views are confirmed in numerous adjudge cases. Cary v. Webster, 1 Strange, 480; Montford v. Hughes, 3 E. D. Smith, 591; Suydam v. Moore, 8 Barb. 358; Phelps v. Wait, 30 N. Y., 78.

The present case seems to be one, not of mere nonfeasance or omission, but of strict negligence or wrong. The agent undertook and proceeded to build the trap-door, but did it so negligently as to cause the injury; under such circumstances the action would be maintainable against the agent and the principal also. The answer states, and the pleadings admit, that the house upon which the work was done was the property of defendant's wife, and that he was acting as her agent. But it is not averred, nor does the case anywhere show, that it was her separate estate. If she simply owned the fee simple, as is inferred from the pleading, then the defendant, in constructing the trap-door, was acting for himself as well as for his wife, for the uses, rents, and profits of the wife's realty belong to the husband during coverture.

Under any view that we can take of the case, we think that the action was properly brought, that the judgment was right and should be affirmed. The other judges concur.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

State Aid to Railroads—Mandamus against Comptroller of State.

BLEDSOE, COMPTROLLER, v. THE INTERNATIONAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

Supreme Court of Texas, July, 1874.

1. Railway Aid Bonds—Mandamus against State Comptroller.—A mandamus will not lie in the District Court of Texas against the comptroller of the State to compel him to countersign bonds of the state which, by an act of the legislature, are authorized to be issued in aid of a railroad.

2. Nature of Comptroller's Office under Texas Constitution.—By the constitution of Texas the executive power of the state is not vested in the governor alone, but in the chief officers of the executive department of the government. These constitute the executive magistracy of the state, of whom the comptroller is one, his powers and duties being defined by the constitution. It follows that a mandamus will no more lie against him than against the governor.

J. W. FERRIS, special judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is brought here by an appeal from the judgment of the district court, awarding a peremptory mandamus against the appellant, A. Bledsoe, comptroller of the state of Texas, and commanding him to countersign and register five hundred state bonds, calling for one thousand dollars each.

The action is based upon an act of the legislature of this state, passed August 5, 1870, entitled, "An act to incorporate the International Railroad Company and to provide for the aid of the state of Texas in constructing the same," and more particularly upon the ninth section thereof, which is as follows:

"Section 9. In order to secure and promote the rapid construction of said railway, and thereby afford cheap and necessary facilities for emigration into the state, as well as speedy communication between the northeastern and southwestern boundaries, and with the Eastern and Northern states, and to meet as soon as practicable the wants of the people of this state in promoting the settlement of the vacant lands and the development of its resources, the state of Texas consents, binds and obligates itself to donate, and hereby grants to said company the bonds of the state of Texas to the extent and amount of ten thousand dollars per mile for each mile of said railroad constructed under this charter; said bonds to be of the denomination of one thousand dollars each, payable to the company, or bearer, in thirty years from the date thereof, with interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, viz., on the first day of January and the first day of July of each year; said bonds to have coupons attached for each installment of interest which may become due, which said coupons shall be made payable upon presentation at the city of New York, through such agents of the state as the governor may select and appoint to pay the same; said bonds shall be signed by the governor and treasurer of the state of Texas, and countersigned and registered by the comptroller, with the seal of the state of Texas affixed thereto, and shall be delivered by the governor to the president, or such other officer of said company as shall be specially appointed to receive and receipt for the same, on the sworn statement of the chief engineer of said company, and the written report of such officers or agents of the state as the governor may have appointed for that purpose, that ten miles of said railroad have been completed in a thorough and substantial manner; which affidavit and report, together with the receipt for said bonds, shall be filed in the office of the secretary of state; provided, that no bonds, under this act, shall be issued to said company until it shall have completed at least twenty miles of said railroad, whereupon said bonds shall be issued and delivered for that amount of said railroad, and thereafter for every ten miles, according to the terms and conditions of this charter.

"The comptroller of the state shall cause to be assessed a tax upon all taxable property, real and personal, in the state, and upon all occupations, proportioned to the taxes levied by general law on such property and occupations, a sum sufficient annually to pay the accruing semi-annual interest on said bonds, and two per cent. as a sinking fund, which said sum shall be assessed and collected and deposited in the treasury of the state, subject to the order of the governor, to meet the payment of the interest coupons and the principal of said bonds, as soon as and whenever the same shall become due; provided, that no greater tax shall be assessed and collected by authority of this section than may be needed from time to time to pay said interest and sinking fund."

Digitized by Google

In the petition of the appellee it is represented that the International Railroad Company is a body politic and corporate, created and established under said act; that there was granted to said company the right to construct and own a railroad, and to maintain the same across the state of Texas, and upon a line designated in said act; that, after being duly organized, the said company raised the necessary means and completed fifty-two miles of railroad, and fully equipped the same within the time required by said act; that the same was duly reported to the governor, who thereupon appointed two persons as agents of the state to examine and report upon the work; that it appeared, from the sworn statement of the chief engineer of said company and the report of said agents, that said fifty-two miles of railroad work was of a superior quality, and was in full compliance with the requirements of said act; that, thereupon, the said governor, under said 9th section of said act, caused five hundred bonds of the state of Texas, each for the sum of one thousand dollars, to be prepared, the same having coupons attached and to run for thirty years; that the said governor signed the said bonds and transmitted them to the treasurer, who also signed them; that when the same were transmitted by the treasurer to the comptroller, he failed and absolutely refused to countersign and register the same; that it was the duty of said officer under said 9th section, to countersign and register said bonds (a copy of one of the bonds and a coupon attached being brought into court); that said company has no other remedy but that which can be afforded by the writ of mandamus commanding the said comptroller to countersign and register said bonds; and thereupon a peremptory mandamus is prayed for at the hearing in the district court.

There were general and special demurrers to the petition and an answer to the merits by the defendant. After the several demurrers were overruled, a trial was had on the facts; and upon a jury verdict, judgment final was rendered against the defendent. There was also an intervention by the state of Texas, but as the same has been abandoned, no further notice need be taken of it.

The questions which first properly come up for consideration by the court, and which have been fully and ably discussed by the counsel, arise upon the demurrers, and are these:

1. Does the record present a proper case for a mandamus, considered on general principles?

2. Has the district court the power and authority to compel the comptroller of the state of Texas to countersign and register the state bonds?

[After quoting from the statute as to the duties of the comptroller in respect to the issue of the bonds, to show that they were not merely ministerial, and from the constitution to show the character of this officer, the conclusion is reached that the case is not, on general principles, a proper one for mandamus. On the second question we give below the opinion in full.]

Second. It is considered that the district court has not the power and authority under the constitution to compel an officer of the executive department of the government to perform an official duty. This conclusion must follow from the structure of our government, and the distribution of powers under the constitution, between the independent departments of government.

This question was first raised and elaborately discussed in the United States court, in the case of Kendall v. The United States, before referred to, and in the opinion of the court it was announced that "the theory of the constitution undoubtedly is that the great powers of the government are divided into separate departments, and, so far as these powers are derived from the constitution, the departments may be regarded as independent of each other." 12 Peters, 609. In the same case, Chief Justice TANEY, delivering a separate opinion, declined to discuss the question, saying that "the office of postmaster-general is not created by the constitution, nor are its powers or duties marked out by that instrument. The office was created by act of Congress, and it may limit its powers and regulate its proceedings." Id. 625. It is noticeable, however, that the court in its rulings in that case, and in all cases since that time touching the subject, has disclaimed any interference with the powers and official duties properly appertaining to the heads of the executive departments of the government. 14 Peters, 515; 17 How. 303; 6 Wheat. 349.

This right of interference was expressly disclaimed by the court, as before shown, in the case of the United States v. Guthrie 17 Howard 303, and it was then said, that whenever the court has assumed to exert its power against any executive officer, it was only as "to acts of a character rather extraneous and required of the individual rather than of the functionary." Id. 303. It would seem that when a want of power in the courts to enforce a mandamus against a high executive officer has not been conceded, nearly the same end has been practically reached by a liberal construction as to the judgment and discretion necessary and proper to be exercised by such officers.

The question may be said to have been authoritatively settled in this state under the constitution of 1845, in the case of The Houston Tap and Brazoria Railway Company v. Randolph, 24 Texas 335. The opinion appears to have been rendered after a contest, showing research and ability, and by a full court. The following quotation from the opinion is here made:

"The second article of the constitution provides, 'that the power of the government of the state of Texas shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them be confined to a separate body of magistracy, to-wit: those which are legislative to one; those which are executive to another, and those which are judicial to another, and no person or collection of persons, being of one of these departments, shall exercise any power properly attached to either of the others, except in instances herein expressly permitted.' Here is a direct prohibition of the blending of the departments. It contemplates that the persons employed in each department will be wise enough and honest enough to discharge the duties entrusted to them, without the aid or interference of the others; and it is a full warrant for each department to disregard and repel such interference. For, as before said, each one of these departments acts under a delegated, limited authority, and if one exceed its authority by usurping powers not belonging to it, its act is a nullity, not binding upon the other departments, and may be totally disregarded by them. If the governor were to dictate to the judges the judgments to be pronounced, and enforce obedience by his power over the militia, the usurpation would be startling indeed, and too plain for discussion, not any more so in principle, however, than for the District Court of Travis County, or the supreme court of the state to require by its mandate that the governor of the state shall sign a patent to land, or the comptroller shall audit an account, or the treasurer of the state shall pay a draft upon the treasury."

Since that ruling was made two constitutions of the state of Texas have been made (that of 1866 and that of 1869), and the same inhibition as to the exercise of power by persons of the different departments of government, is retained, and doubtless with a full knowledge of the ruling of the court on this important question; and as if it were intended by the framers of the constitution now in force, to leave no room for judicial construction, that instrument is made to expressly define the different executive officers which constitute the executive department—one of which is the comptroller of public accounts (Art. 4, Sec. 1). And with reference to the comptroller, among others, it expressly defines his powers and marks out the line of his duties (Art 4, Sec 20), which was never done before in any constitution of this state.

Digitized by Google

It is observable, also, that whereas under the old constitution the supreme executive power was vested in the chief magistrate, under the present constitution it is vested in the entire magistracy composing the executive department, with the powers of each separately defined. Are all these changes meaningless? Surely not. They must have been intended to more clearly define the boundaries of power between the three great departments of the government, and also between the different offices comprising the executive department.

These considerations furnish additional and very strong reasons why the court should adhere to the ruling made in the above case of the Houston Tap & Brazoria Railroad Company v. Randolph.

In the different states of the Union the executive power is vested in the governor, while in this state, as before stated, it is vested in the magistracy composing the executive department. Dennett, Pet'r, 32 Maine, 508; Mauran v. Smith, 8 R. I. 192; State v. The Governor, 1 Dutch'r, N. J. 331; Low v. Towns, 8 Ga. 360; Hawkins v. The Governor, 1 Ark. 570.

If there is no other remedy than by mandamus against the comptroller for the non-performance of official duties, the same could be said of the governor and of a judge of the court. It is as reasonable to suppose that one officer would act up to the performance of duty as faithfully as another. Evidently, this independence of power in the different departments was intended to act as a check and restraint against usurped authority.

The decisions of the supreme court of this State are relied on as authority in support of the jurisdictional right of the court to award a peremptory mandamus in this case. It may be well to determine the weight of such authority by examining into their origin and history.

First, it must be considered, that a petition for writ of mandamus has never been sustained in this state against the governor, secretary of state, comptroller, treasurer, or auditorial board, though many have been filed and prosecuted. They have been sustained against the commissioner of the general land office, in very few instances, perhaps three or four, out of the numerous cases wherein it has been attempted. Horton v. Brown, 2 Texas R. 78; Ward, Com., v. Townsend, 2 Texas R. 581; H. & G. N. R. R. Co. v. Kuechler, 36 Texas R. 382.

In the first case, the suit above referred to was between two claimants, and the writ was incidental. In the second, there was no statement of facts, and the rule was adopted that, "in their absence the legal intendment is in favor of the correctness of the judgment." In neither of the two first cases referred to was the question of the right to the writ argued by the counsel, or discussed by the court. The early cases afterwards determined by this court, in which the principles were enunciated as applicable to the remedy by writ of mandamus, were cases in all of which it was held that the writ could not be sustained. And the principles announced were assumed to be drawn mainly from the decisions in these two cases, and from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon that subject. Glasscock v. Com. Gen'l L. Office, 3 Tex. R. 53; Brackens v. Wells et al., 3 Tex. R. 90; Com. Gen'l L. O. v. Smith, 5 Tex. R. 477; Arberry v. Beavers, 6 Tex. R. 464, and others.

The rule announced by Justice WHEELER, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Commissioner of General Land Office v. Smith, as the conclusion thus arrived at, was: that "a mandamus may issue to compel the commissioner of the general land office to issue a patent, when it shall have been made to appear to the court that the right of the party is clear." 5 Tex. 480. Thus holding that however complete the facts or confused the law in the construction of it, when, after investigation in a court, the right is made to appear to be clear, the writ of mandamus would issue. That this was the exact position assumed may be seen by reference to his opinion in 5 Tex. 479. This, it is believed, extended the remedy far beyond the decisions quoted from the Supreme Court of the United States. Indeed, it has been held by that court that a mandamus could not issue against the commissioner of the general land office of the United States in a case where there were complex facts to be examined into requiring judgment, and which "calls for the exercise of the judicial functions of the officer."

And upon this question as to whether a mandamus can be issued in any case against the commissioner, it is said in that opinion: "We have found no case in which this power has been exercised. Patents are to be signed by the president in person, or in his name by a secretary, under his direction, and countersigned by the recorder of the general land office." United States v. the Commissioner, 5 Wall. 565. It must be recollected, that this remedy was introduced in Texas mainly as an incident to suits between private litigants in the different counties of the state, which caused a statute to be passed requiring such suits against the heads of departments or bureaux to be brought in Travis county. Act of 1846, Hart. Dig. art. 643, p. 237.

However such act may have recognized the legality of such suits, it could not be held, either in its terms or by implication, to have enlarged and extended the remedy by mandamus beyond the enforcement of a merely ministerial act by any of such officers while they were regarded as high executive officers of the state. 5 Tex. 478.

It must be considered also, that the office of commissioner of the general land office, previous to the constitution of 1869 (which made it a constituent portion of the executive department) was a mere commission to aid in perfecting and preserving land titles, and that the commissioner was regarded and treated by the courts as merely a ministerial officer whose office was created and shaped, and whose duties in said office were prescribed entirely by the acts of the legislature, and all of whose official acts and determinations, whether involving the exercise of judgment or not, were subject to be inquired into in a suit by mandamus. Norton's S. v. The Commissioner, etc., 2 Tex. R. 362; Comm'r General Land Office v. Smith, 5 Tex. R. 479, 480; Glasscock v. Comm'r General Land Office, 3 Tex. 53.

The limitations of the remedy to purely ministerial acts, as announced in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States (in 1 Cranch, 12 and 14 Peters, 6 Wheat, 6 Howard, 5 Wallace), though quoted as a basis, were never practically applied to the commissioner in any of the decisions, as it was applied to the acts of the heads of departments in the government of the United States.

It must be observed, also, that none of those decisions in reference to the commissioner consider or discuss the question of the division of the powers of government, treating the commissioner as part of, or subject to the executive department of the state, and the late decision, under the constitution of 1869, is rested upon previous decisions, and general principles. Rail Road Co. v. Com'r, 36 Tex. 382.

Under the view here presented it is not perceived that the decisions relating to the commissioner of the general land office can be of any great weight or authority in this case.

At the late session of the state legislature a compromise act, or act of adjustment, with the International Railroad Company was passed, and other questions have been presented for our consideration as if an adjudication thereon was contemplated by said act. There is a provision in the act that the same shall not be considered as in any way interfering with the litigation in this case.

Moreover, there is no expression recognizing the state of Texas as a party to the suit.

Digitized by Google

It having been already decided that the court has no jurisdiction over this case, any further opinion on the question presented would be extra-judicial and without authority.

For the reasons given, it is considered by the court that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and that the cause be dismissed.

REEVES and DEVINE, JJ., dissented.

REVERSED AND DISMISSED.

Amended Bankrupt Act—Amendments in regard to Fradulent Conveyances not Retroactive.

HAMLIN, ASSIGNEE, v. PETTIBONE et al.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Wisconsin, July Term, 1874.

Hon. JAMES C. HOPKINS, District Judge.

1. The provisions of the amendments of 1874 to §§ 35 and 39 of the bankrupt act which recite that, in order to make certain sales, conveyances, etc., void, they must have been made by the debtor, knowing that they were in fraud of the act, do not apply to proceedings commenced before the first day of December, 1873.

Jackson and Felker, for Plaintiff; L. S. Dixon, for Defendant.

HOPKINS, J.—This action was commenced before the passage of the amendments to the bankrupt law, on June 22d, 1874, and the proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted long before the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873; and the sale sought to be set aside and avoided by the assignee in his case, as fraudulent, was made long before that time.

The case was tried and submitted to the jury without objection or exception, upon the theory that the recent amendatory act did not apply; at least no pretense of that kind was made on the trial.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the property claimed, thereby finding that the sale, by the bankrupt, of the property in question to the defendants, who were his creditors, was fraudulent under the law.

In the charge to the jury, no reference to the amended act was made; but they were instructed that the sale would be void if they found from the evidence the several facts and propositions mentioned in the original act; to which charge no exceptions were taken.

On the second day after the verdict, the defendant's counsel filed a motion for a new trial, alleging that the court had charged erroneously upon the 4th proposition mentioned in section 35; that the amended act had changed that section, so that it was now necessary, in order to avoid a sale, that the jury should be instructed that they must find that the party knew that the sale was made in fraud of the provisions of the act, instead of that he must have had reason to believe so." It was claimed that, as the last section of the amended act repealed all provision of the old law inconsistent with its provisions, the old law was on that point absolutely repealed, and, it being in its nature penal, it could not be considered as existing for any purpose, and hence no sale could now be avoided unless it fell within the provisions of the amended law, irrespective of the time it was made. If this question had been raised at the trial, or there had been a request to so charge the jury, and I had so charged, the result would not, I think, have been different, for the evidence of the guilty knowledge of the defendants was overwhelming, so that, as far as the result of this case is concerned, it would have been, wholly immaterial; and as this was a proposition that might have been charged if the atttention of the court had been called to it at the proper time, and as, in my opinion, it could not have affected the result, it presents a question of a purely technical character. I do not, therefore, feel that it would be right to set aside this verdict for that reason, or to allow that exception to the charge, after verdict. When a charge is wrong in principle, and the error is of such a nature as not to have been avoided, if the attention of the court had been called to it at the time, by a proper exception or request, I allow an exception to be filed after verdict, but when it relates to a matter that might have been corrected on the spot, without overthrowing the whole theory of the case, I think it due to the court and to the adverse party, that the attention of the court should be called to it at the proper time. The rights of the successful party are involved and the court should not sacrafice them.

This is a sufficient ground for denying the motion, but, as the question is one of great importance and of general interest, I may as well state a further reason for the denial, which covers the ground upon which the motion was based. This was a case of involuntary bankruptcy, and the right of the assignee to recover back property transferred by the bankrupt, in payment of his debts, from the creditor so receiving it, is not alone conferred by the 35th section of the act, but such right was given by section 39 also. So it bebecomes necessary to ascertain what the effect of the amendments is nupo that section as well as upon section 35. Sec. 12 of the amended act, changes section 39 by inserting the word "knew" where the words "reasonable cause to believe" were understood in the original section, being like the third amendment to section 35. But section 39, as amended, provides that its provisions shall apply to cases commenced since Dec. 1, 1873, so that, as to cases like this, commenced before that time, the original act was not changed. The class of cases to which it should apply being designated, it left all others to proceed as if it had not been passed. It, in that respect, was restrictive of its operation, and section 21, the repealing section, does not change or effect the original section as to cases commenced before that time, for that only repeals such acts and parts of acts as are inconsistent with the provisions of the amended act, and as the amended act, or this section of it, by its terms, only applies to cases commenced since December 1st, 1873, it is not inconsistent with the original act except as to cases commenced since that time. Cases commenced before that time were excepted from its operation, and are not therefore, affected by it, or repealed by the repealing section. As the right to maintain this suit, upon the grounds and provisions contained in the original section 39, remains unchanged and is clear, this motion for a new trial should be denied. The charge of the court being in conformity with that section, there was no error of which defendants can complain. In this view, it might be unnecessary to consider the effect of the amendments to section 35. But as I am satisfied that the construction contended for by defendants' counsel cannot be sustained, I will briefly state my reason therefor.

Repeals by implication or by a general clause like the one inserted in the repealing section of this act, which amounts to the same thing, are not favored and are never extended beyond their necessary operation. Repealing clauses of this kind are limited in terms to such provisions as are inconsistent with the amendatory act, and are never construed to include or alter provisions not embraced in the amendments. The amended act is not inconsistent with any other parts of the original act than such as are affected by its provisions. The repealing clause is co-extensive with the amendments and only applies where they do and when they do. 1. Pick (Mass.) Spaulding v. Alford, 33. So that the effect of such a repealing clause is very different from what an absolute repeal of section 35 would have been. 3 How. 636, Daviess v. Fairbairn. Now if it should be held that the amendments to section 35 were intended to apply to cases occuring after the passage of the amended act, the repealing clause would only apply to such cases, for only as to those would there be any repugnancy. The original act as to cases occurring before its passage would remain unaffected by the repealing clause. Congress fixed the time for certain portions of the act to take effect before the passage (section 12), and for certain others (section 10) after; so, I think, the fair intendment is, that in cases where no other time was mentioned, they meant that the amendment should only apply to cases arising after its passage. This, under the circumstances, should be so considered as to such portions of it as changes the substantial rights of parties. I do not believe Congress intended to change the act so as to make good contracts that were void under the original act, or to change those provisions of the statute so as to affect contracts theretofore made. It would require a very clear expression by the legislature to give it such effect, or as being intended to vary the relations of litigant parties. 4 Denio, Palmer v. Conly, 374; 6 Adol & Ellis, Hitchcock v. Way, 943; 3 ib, Paddon v. Bartlett, 884; 9 Barn. & Cress., College of Physicians v. Harrison, 954. If they had, I think they would have expressed it, in unequivocal language, as they did in the amendment of section 39.

Digitized by Google

There are many provisions of the act of a practical character that may properly be applied in further proceedings in all cases such as those relating simply to the administration of the law, and as do not affect existing rights or the validity of contracts. Such provisions are of a remedial character, and may be presumed to have been intended to be applied to all cases, but such parts as relate to the substantial rights of parties, acquired under the original law, like the amendments to section 35, I think it must be held Congress did not intend to apply to cases occurring before the adoption of the amendments.

The question was suggested as to what extent this amendment had changed the original act in the respect heretofore noticed, and I must confess it is not without its difficulties.

But it seems to me in almost every case, where the jury would be warranted in finding that the party "had good reason to believe," under the old statute, they would be justified in finding that he "knew" under the amended law, so that practically the amendment is merely a verbal one in that respect. It is a rule of universal application, in all cases of fraud on the part of the debtor or seller of property, that notice of facts sufficient to put a paty upon enquiry, amounts, in judgments of law, to notice, and is sufficient to charge the purchaser with knowledge of the matters and things it is reasonable to suppose such inquiry or investigation would have discovered. Inquiry on the part of the purchaser having such notice, becomes a duty, and diligence an act of justice. A scienter may be shown by circumstances, and whatever fairly puts a party upon inquiry, when the means of knowlegde are supposed to be at hand, if he omits to inquire, he does so at his peril, and he is chargable with a knowledge of all facts which, by a proper inquiry, he might have ascertained. 4 vol. Kent's Com. page 179; May v. Chapman, 16 Mees & Wels. 355; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. 343; The "Lulu," 10 Wal. 202; Hill v. Simpson, 7 Vesey, 170; Smith v. Lowe, 1 Atkyns 489; Booth v. Barnum, 9 Conn. 286; Pitney v. Leonard, 1 Paige Chan. 461; Carr v. Hilton, 1 Curtis C. C. 390; Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cowen, 717; Scammon v. Cole, 5 Nat. B. R. 257.

In some of these cases "notice" is used instead of "knowledge," but as is said in Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. supra, it is usually in the same sense and that is one of its appropriate significations. So, if within meaning of the provisions of the original section a party had reasonable cause to believe that, under the foregoing rule, would be sufficient to put him upon inquiry, and, if reasonable enquiry would show that the sale was, in fact, a fraud upon the act, he would be chargeable with knowledge of that fact.

Unless this well settled is ignored, there is no escape from this conclusion.

NEW TRIAL DENIED.

The Mordaunt Case.

The London correspondent of the New York Tribune, and who is evidently accurately informed, thus gives the history and present status of this cause celebre:

There have been of late years few more pleasing illustrations of the uncertainties of English law and morals than the Mordaunt case. It was famous when first heard; it has suddenly become famous again by the decision of the House of Lords given yesterday. Lady Mordaunt, you may still remember, was a great beauty; one of several sisters, also great beauties, of good birth and better connections. When she married Sir Charles Mordaunt there were plenty of candid friends who predicted trouble, for reasons not necessary to be repeated. The trouble came soon enough, first in the shape of scandals, then of a divorce suit brought by the husband against his wife, with some well-known names figuring as correspondents—the names, that is, of those with whom Lady Mordaunt was allgeed to have committed adultery. Before the cause could be heard, a plea of insanity was filed by Lady Mordaunt's friends as a bar to the petition for divorce, and Lord PENZANCE, then judge of the divorce court, directed the question of insanity to be first tried. Upon that interim hearing the merits and demerits of the case were much gone into; there was, in fact, such a dish of scandal set before London society as quickened the appetite of the most worn-out old profligate you could meet. Royalty came in for its share, as, to do it justice, it generally does. The Prince of Wales went into the witness-box, and swore that his friendship with Lady Mordaunt was in all honor and propriety, and Mr. Seargant Ballantyne resisted the greatest temptation that ever beset a famous cross-examining counsel, when he suffered the prince to pass from the box with the single remark that he had no questions to ask his royal highness. The jury found that Lady Mordaunt was insane. The judge thereupon ordered a stay of proceedings until she had recovered her mind. Sir Charles was furious. He appealed to the full court, and the full court—that is to say, Lord PENZANCE himself, the lord chief Baron, and Mr. Justice KEATING—affirmed the decision of Lord Penzance by a majority of one. Again Sir Charles appealed, this time to the house of lords. I should be afraid to say how many times and by how many counsel the matter has been argued. There are long purses on both sides. It became certain, meantime, that Lady Mordaunt was permanently and hopelessly insane; the precise contingency upon which the lord chief baron had been of opinion the husband should be permitted to proceed with his petition. The law lords required the attendance of the judge to advise, and six of them heard the arguments, two of the six being the lord chief baron and Mr. Justice KEATING who had sat on the first appeal. Neither of them, as may be conjectured, changed his views. Three of the others sided with the chief baron, and only one with Mr. Justice KEATING. With this majority agreed the law lords, to wit: Lord CHELMFCRD and Lord HATHERLY, the wo ex-chancellors, who, for the purposes of this case, constituted the house of lords in its capacity as court of final appeal. Scotch Lord COLONSAY had sat, but died thereafter—not in consequence, let us hope. They were not obliged to agree with the majority, be it understood; might, had they so chosen, have sided with the minority and dissented from the majority—the judges being in such cases an advising, not a voting body. The two ex-chancellors accordingly gave judgment reversing the decision of the court below, and directing that court to proceed to hear and determine the suit for divorce, notwithstanding the admitted insanity of the wife, and to pronounce a decree upon the same. It is four years since the decision now overthrown was given.

So now we are to have the whole matter over again.

Right of Mortgagee to take Possession of Mortgaged Property, when Levied on Under Execution Against Mortgagor.

In Lewis v. D'Arcy, Chicago Legal News, for July 4, an action of replevin was brought by a mortgagee, to gain possession of personal property which had been mortgaged to him to secure a future indebtedness, but left in the possession of the mortgagor. The mortgage contained a clause giving the mortgagee the right, in case he should at any time, before the indebtedness secured by the mortgage became due, feel "unsafe or unsecure," to take immediate possession and sell the property. The property, by the terms of the mortgage, was to remain in the possession of the mortgagor until the indebtedness secured should become due, or unless the mortgagee should, for any reason, feel "unsafe or unsecure," and elect to take immediate possession.

The case coming before the Supreme Court of Illinois, Mr. Justice SCOTT delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

"The property having been levied upon by the officer and taken into his possession, the mortgagee, in accordance with the provision of the mortgage, elected to treat the conditions as broken, and sought to reclaim the possession. This, we think, he had a clear right to do. As we said in Bailey v. Godfrey, 54 Ills., 507, by the express terms of the mortgage, the mortgagee was invested with the power to elect, and was made the sole judge of the happening of the contingency when he would elect to take possession of the property. It had been levied upon and was about to be exposed to sale. No doubt if the sale had taken place the property would have been bought by different purchasers and scattered to different portions of the country. These facts afford the mortgagee ample reason to feel "unsafe and unsecure" in regard to his debt. The contract between the parties is recognized in the law as valid, and no reason is perceived why he could not as lawfully take possession of the property for this condition broken, as for non-payment on maturity of the indebtedness secured by the mortgage.

"It is insisted that inasmuch as the mortgagor, by the terms of the mortgage, had the possession, he had such interest in the property as was subject to levy and sale. This is no doubt true when the mortgagor has the right to retain the possession for a definite period. This is the doctrine of Beach v. Derby, 19th Ills., 617, and Spaulding v. Mozier, 57 Ills., 148. The property was conditionally conveyed to the mortgagee, and is only in the permissive possession of the mortgagor, which may be terminated at any time for condition broken, or when the mortgagee may feel "unsafe or unsecure" in regard to his debt. His right to take possession cannot be defeated by the levy of an attachment or execution, although the levy may have been rightfully made while the property was in the hands of the mortgagor. Still the mortgagee's right to make his election to reclaim it would prevail against the officer making levy, as well as the mortgagor himself.

Digitized by Google

"There is no hardship in this rule. The mortgagee, upon taking possession, would be compelled to offer the property for sale at once, and when his debt was satisfied, the remainder no doubt would be subject to the levy made by the officer, it should require the sale of all the property to make the mortgagee's debt. If the attaching creditor would not be injured, for the reason his levy was only upon the interest of the mortgagor, and the sale would show he had no interest."

Upon the right of a mortgagee of personal property to maintain trover or replevin in such cases as the above, see Spriggs v. Camp, 2 Speers, 181; Pickard v. Low, 3 Shipley, 48; 2 Hilliard on Mortgages, 451, 452.

The Publication and Distribution of the Revised Statutes of the Unted States, and of Future Statutes at Large.

[GENERAL NATURE — No. 60.]

AN ACT providing for the publication of the revised statutes and the laws of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the existing contract or contracts between the secretary of state on the part of the United States, and Charles C. Little, Augustus Flagg, Henry T. Miles, and John Bartlett, of Boston, known as the firm of Little, Brown & Company, dated the twenty-eighth day of May, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, and all the other contracts between the United States or any officer thereof with said firm of Little, Brown and Company, respecting the printing or publication of the laws of the United States, are hereby declared to be determined, pursuant to the powers therein reserved.

SEC. 2. That the secretary of state is hereby charged with the duty of causing to be prepared for printing, publication, and distribution the revised statutes of the United States enacted at this present session of congress; that he shall cause to be completed the head notes of the several titles and chapters and marginal notes referring to the statutes, from which each section was compiled and repealed by said revision; and references to the decisions of the courts of the United States, explaining or expounding the same, and such decisions of the state courts as he may deem expedient, with a full and complete index of the same. And when the same shall be completed, the said secretary shall duly certify the same under the seal of the United States, and when printed and promulgated as hereinafter provided, the printed volumes shall be legal evidence of the laws and treaties therein contained, in all the courts of the United States, and of the several states and territories.

SEC. 3. That the revision of the statutes of a general and permanent nature, with the index thereto, shall be printed in one volume, and shall be entitled and labled "Revised Statutes of the United States," and the revision of the statutes relating to the District of Columbia, to post-roads, and the public treaties in force on the first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, with a suitable index to each, shall be published in a separate volume, and entitled and labeled "Revised Statutes relating to District of Columbia and Post-Roads [and] Public Treaties."

SEC. 4. The secretary of state shall cause the two volumes to be stereotyped, and such number of each volume to be printed and substantially bound at the government printing office, as he may deem needful for public distribution, as hereinafter provided, and for sale by his office.

SEC. 5. That he shall, in like manner, cause to be edited, printed, published, and distributed pamphlet copies of the statutes of the present and each future session of congress, to the officers and persons hereinafter provided, and bound copies of the laws of each congress to the number of two thousand copies, to be distributed in the manner now provided by law, and uniform with the said edition of the revised statutes.

SEC. 6. That at the close of every session of Congress, the secretary of state shall cause to be distributed pamphlet copies of the acts and resolves of Congress for that session, edited and printed in the manner aforesaid, as follows: To the president and vice-president of the United States, two copies each; to each senator, representative and delegate in congress, one copy; to the librarian of the senate, for the use of senators, one hundred and twenty-six copies; to the librarian of the house, two hundred and fifty copies, for the use of the representatives and delegates; to the library of Congress, fourteen copies; to the Department of state, including those for the use of legation and consulates, six hundred copies; to the treasury department, two hundred copies; to the war department, including those for the use of officers of the army, two hundred copies; to the navy department, including those for the use of officers of the navy, one hundred copies; to the department of the interior, including those for the use of the surveyors-general and registers and receivers of public land offices, two hundred and fifty copies; to the post office department, fifty copies; to the department of justice, including those for the use of the chief and associate justices, the judges and the officers of the United States and territorial courts, four hundred and twenty-five copies; to the department of agriculture, ten copies; to the Smithsonian Institution, five copies; to the government printing office, two copies; to the governors and secretaries of territories, one copy each; to be retained in the custody of the secretary of state, one thousand copies; and ten thousand copies shall be distributed to the states and territories in proportion to the number of senators, representatives and delegates in Congress, to which they are at the time entitled.

SEC. 7. That after the close of each Congress, the secretary of state shall have edited, printed, and bound a sufficient number of the volumes, containing the statutes at large enacted by that Congress, to enable him to distribute copies, or as many thereof as may be needed, as follows: To the president of the United States, four copies; one of which shall be for the library of the executive mansion, and one copy shall be for the use of the commissioner of public buildings; to the vice-president of the United states, one copy; to each senator, representative and delegate in Congress, one copy; to the librarian of the senate, for the use of the senators, one hundred and fourteen copies; to the librarian of the house, for the use of representatives and delegates, four hundred and ten copies; to the library of Congress, fourteen copies, including four copies for the law library; to the department of state, including those for the use of legations and consulates, three hundred and eighty copies; to the treasury department, including those for the use of officers of customs, two hundred and sixty copies; to the war department, including a copy for the military academy at West Point, fifty copies; to the navy department, including a copy for the library at the naval academy at Annapolis, a copy for the library of each navy yard in the United States; a copy for the library of the Brooklyn Navl Lyceum, and a copy for the library of the naval institute of Charlestown, Massachusetts, sixty-five copies; to the department of the interior, including those for the use of the surveyors-general and registers and receivers of public land offices, two hundred and fifty copies; to the post office department, fifty copies; to the department of justice, including those for the use of the chief and associate justices, the judges and officers of the United States and territorial courts, four hundred and twenty-five copies; to the department of agriculture, five copies; to the Smishsonian institution, two copies; to the government printing office, one copy; and the secretary of state shall supply deficiencies and offices newly created.

SEC. 8. That the said printed copies of the said acts of each session, and of the said bound copies of the acts of Congress, shall be legal evidence of the laws and treaties therein contained, in all the courts of the United States and of the several states therein.

SEC. 9. That the said laws of each session of Congress shall also be stereotyped, and printed for sale as provided in respect to the said revised statutes. And the copies of the said revised statutes, and of the said laws of each session of Congress, as issued from time to time, shall be respectively sold at the cost of the paper, press work, and binding, with ten per cent. thereof added thereto, to any person applying for the same. And the proceeds of all sales shall be paid into the treasury.

SEC. 10. That the secretary of state shall cause all the copies of the revision of Indian treaties, made by Thomas J. Durant, now printed, to be bound, and the same shall be deposited with the secretary of the interior, for the use of the departments and officers of the government.

Approved, June 20, 1874.

Book Notices.

THE BANKRUPT LAW, WITH ITS AMENDMENTS, INCLUDING THAT OF 1874. "The Lawyers' Edition." New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co., 1874. Price, 75 cents.

This is the bankrupt law of 1867, conveniently arranged with its subsequent amendments. It is printed without side-notes, but each section is prefixed with a title indicating in general terms its substance. It has a good index.

THE BANKRUPT ACT OF 1867, CONSOLIDATED WITH ITS AMENDMENTS, INCLUDING THE AMENDATORY AND SUPPLEMENTAL ACT OF 1874. Compiled, with an index, by SEYMOUR D. THOMPSON. St. Louis: Soule, Thomas & Wentworth. pp. 74. Price 75 cents.

This is a useful compilation, and embraces all portions of the original act, and the several amendments of 1868, 1870, 1872, 1873, which are in force, and the late important amendment and supplement of June 22, 1874. It has been arranged so as to exhibit the law as it now stands. It gives accurately the text, pure and simple, well arranged, with an excellent index. It is often convenient and desirable to have the text of existing enactments without the repealed portions, and without an overwhelming mass of glosses, comments and syllabi, and this supplies that desideratum. D.

Digitized by Google

ABRIDGMENT OF IOWA DECISIONS, INCLUDING PRACTICE AND PLEADINGS, WITH PRACTICAL FORMS. By J. D. TEMPLIN, of the Iowa City Bar. Vol. 1. Des Moines. 1874.

This work, to be completed in three volumes, is intended to afford an increased facility for ascertaining the decisions of Iowa upon all the topics which have been brought into the field of the law by the adjudications of its courts since 1839, embraced in 40 volumes of reports. The author is one of the most industrious and painstaking of lawyers, and has occupied several years, since his practical retirement from the bar, in the preparation of this work. The other two volumes will shortly follow. The author has departed from the ordinary alphabetical arrangement (but with questionable advantage) and has classified the topics with reference to their nature.

To those who have the Iowa Reports, this work will be convenient to enable them readily to ascertain the course and present state of decisions on any subject; and to those who have not these Reports it will be found to be a useful substitute—as good as abridgments in their nature can be.

PUTERBAUGH'S CHANCERY PLEADING AND PRACTICE. A Practical Treatise on the Forms of Chancery Suits, Pleading and Practice, now in use in the State of Illinois, and wherever the same System prevails. With Forms of Bills, Answers, Pleas, Demurrers, Exceptions, Petitions, Orders, Decrees, etc. By SABIN D. PUTERBAUGH, late one of the Judges of the Circuit Court. Chicago: Leslie Puterbaugh, Agent. St. Louis: Sold by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth.

Several years ago Judge Puterbaugh published a work on Common Law Pleading and Practice, adapted to the courts of Illinois. The bar of Illinois were not slow to discover its merits, and it has gone rapidly through three editions. In his preface to the work now before us, the author takes occasion to tender his grateful acknowledgments for the favor with which that work has been received by the profession. In doing so, he has been led by his diffidence and goodness of heart into the mistake of many authors, that of supposing that he is under obligations to the public, while it is they who are under obligations to him. We have had frequent occasion to consult Judge Puterbaugh's work on Common Law Pleading and Practice, and always to our satisfaction; and we have never heard it spoken of except in praise. In that work he did for his state, and for those states having the same system of procedure at law, what Chitty did for England.

The work before us bears marks in its general arrangement, and in all its details of being prepared with the same skill and care which mark the later editions of the author's work on practice at law.

In the first fourteen chapters we are conducted by successive steps through the suit in chancery, from the filing of the original bill to the preparation of the final decree. The next five chapters treat of bills not original in their nature, such as supplemental bills, bills of review, etc. The next four chapters are devoted to bills of discovery, of interpleader, for perpetuating testimony, and cross bills. Then follow chapters relating to proceedings in special cases, such as bills for specific performance, to redeem, to foreclose mortgages, creditors' bills, partition suits, proceedings for dower, for separate maintenance; bills to quiet titles, to set aside wills, of ne exeat, and to restrain waste; also bills relating to trusts and proceedings to enforce mechanics' liens.

It must not be supposed that this work is drawn entirely from local sources. On the contrary, while Judge Puterbaugh has, perhaps, quoted the reports of Illinois more frequently than those of any other single state, yet he has drawn largely from the decisions of other American courts, and from the English cases, as well as from the leading works on equity pleading and practice.

Although the merits or demerits of a book of practice can only be established by the tests of time and use, we do not hesitate to recommend this work, without qualification, to the profession in Illinois, and in those states which have a similar system of equity procedure.

A THIRD CHAPTER ON THE RULE IN MINOT'S CASE. By a Layman. pp. 48. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Association Building, Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street. 1874.

Lawyers frequently make use of the expression "legal reason," in such a manner as to convey the idea that there must be some difference between reason when applied by cultivated lawyers to legal questions, and reason when applied by other persons to other subjects. If we except the fact that a cultivated legal mind, when reasoning on legal subjects, has in his possession a greater number of facts—a greater aggregate of knowledge from which to deduce his conclusions, there is no difference between legal reason and any other reason. Legal reason consists simply in common sense—the sense which people generally possess, guided by an enlarged degree of knowledge as to legal matters, and applied to legal subjects. There is no reason why intelligent persons, who are not learned in the law, should not reason sensibly and even cogently upon many legal questions. And it may sometimes happen that such persons will arrive at more just and enlightened conclusions than trained lawyers, from the very fact that they approach the examination of the question with their minds free and untrammeled by that educated and habitual deference to precedents—that almost childlike acquiescence in the law as it has been decided—which is at once the best and the worst trait of our profession. Unless we are mistaken, the pamphlet before us affords a happy demonstration of this fact.

In the case of Minot v. Paine, 99 Mass. 101, determined in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in 1868, a testatrix devised her estate to a trustee to hold and manage as to him might seem prudent and judicious, "with full powers of sale and conveyance, and change of investment in the management thereof, and directed him to pay the net income as often as convenient to her grand-daughter during her lifetime, remainder to other persons, etc. Now a part of this estate consisted of shares in a certain railway company, and another part the trustee invested in shares in another railway company. These companies declared dividends known as cash dividends, and also dividends known as stock dividends, or increase dividends. Of course there was no question that the cash dividends were "net income," and should be paid over to the life tenant; but whether the stock or increase dividends belonged to the life-tenant or were to be held for the remainder-man, the trustee was in doubt, and asked the direction of the court. There was no dispute upon the pleadings as to the facts; and Chief Justice CHAPMAN reserved the case for a full bench, and it was unanimously held that while the cash dividends were income to be paid to the legatee for life, the new shares were capital to be held for the legatee in remainder. This case thus established the principle that in Massachusetts stock dividends are to be regarded as principal, and cash dividends as income; and in the subsequent case of Leland v. Hayden, 102 Mass. 542, this principle is said to be settled.

As nearly as we can understand Layman's argument, he objects to this rule on two grounds, which, if they are "well taken," have, it must be admitted, considerable force: 1. That there is no justice in it. 2. That there is no sense in it.

He urges that there is no justice in it, because it takes one man's property away from him, arbitrarily and capriciously, and gives it to another; and that there is no sense in it, because it makes a flimsy distinction between earnings—surplus accretions, which are divided in money, and those which are divided in stock.

Whether such accumulations are to be considered as capital going to the remainder-man, or as income, going to the life-tenant, is not left to depend on the intrinsic nature of the thing itself, but upon the manner in which the directors of the corporation see fit to divide it. If they see fit to divide it in money, it goes to the life-tenant; if they see fit to divide it in additional stock, it goes to the remainder-man. Now, in reason and sense, it cannot make any substantial difference to the life-tenant whether it comes in money or in stock, so that he gets it; for if it comes in money he can convert it into stock, and if it comes in certificates of stock he can convert them into money. In either case he gets his bread and butter, the income which the testator intended he should have, and the remainder-man gets the principal, undiminished and unimpaired, which the testator intended he should get.

This appears to be the third pamphlet which Layman has written on the "Rule in Minot's Case." We have not had the pleasure of seeing the other two. The first was entitled "Common Sense versus Judicial Legislation," and was noticed in 5 American Law Review, 540. The second was entitled "Stock Dividends; The Rule in Minot's Case Restated with Variations by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts," and was noticed in 5 American Law Review, 720. This last notice combated at length the position taken by Layman, or rather apologized for the decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, which he criticised. As an illustration of the happy manner in which Layman disposes of the arguments of the writer in the Law Review, we may quote the following paragraph from that journal, with the reply which is now made to it in the pamphlet before us:

"A well managed corporation," says the Review, "is not unlike a vineyard in which the vines are each year growing larger and stronger, and more capable of producing fruit, while the annual crop is removed for consumption. And if a vineyard were devised to a tenant for life, and at his death to a remainder-man, the tenant for life would only be entitled to the fruit of each year; while the increase of the vines, the new stalks with the old, would benefit the life-beneficiary only as they became capable of producing, but would finally come with their increase to the remainder-man. And in the management of such a trust, the careful and just steward would not fail to set out new scions as well as obtain an increase of the original stalks, which new scions would pass to the remainder-man, as well as the original vines, increased by their natural growth." This position Layman overwhelms with ridicule in the following passages:

Digitized by Google

"But suppose the steward (being a remainder-man, possibly) should withhold the fruit of one year from the tenant for life and should expend its produce in buying a few contiguous acres, with the view of enlarging and improving the vineyard. And suppose that he should withhold the fruit a second year and invest its proceeds in plowing and planting the newly acquired acres. His vineyard is now, say twenty per cent. larger, and twenty per cent. more valuable than when it came into his hands. But the tenant for life, not fancying this loss of income for a couple of years, calls upon Mr. Steward and reminds him that it is time to account for two crops.

"'Really, Mr. Cestui,' the steward observes: 'I have invested the proceeds in permanent improvements, to perpetuate the vineyard. Observe the enlargement of the plant—it must be gratifying to you to know that your remainderman will be very much benefited by it.'

'"But my dear Mr. Steward," Mr. Cestui instantly replies, "I should like to have my moneys.'

"'Sir, look around. Si nummos requiris circumspice—there's your money—won't that satisfy you? It's in the plant—there it is in terra firma—all safe—read Minot's Case, sir; it is capital now, it's principal.'

"'But the crop is mine, and the money you received for it is mine,' argues the poor tenant for life.

"'Was yours, my dear sir—was yours—but the moment I expend it, it is yours no longer. But it's all there, every dollar of it.'

"'Then make me a deed of the new property that you have paid for with my money.'

"'That's impossible, sir. That's the vineyard. Why, sir, if I were to give you a deed for that part, the remainder-man would only get four-fifths of the vineyard, instead of the whole."

"'But its my money.'

"'But the proportion, my dear sir, consider the proportion; the remainderman is entitled to five-fifths of the vineyard, and would you give him only four? And your money, sir, is no longer money, it's vineyard, it's plant. Zounds, sir, you are not so unreasonable as to call for your income when I've made capital of it!'

"I think this disposes of the vineyard illustration."

Words could not be devised which could convey to the ordinary mind a clearer view of the workings of the "Rule in Minot's case." If this rule be sound law, a corporation may do business year after year, during the whole lifetime of the life-tenant, turning its income into capital stock, and issuing none but stock dividends, all of which will go to the remainder-man (perhaps a person unborn), and the life-tenant will be left to starve. If, instead of this, the simple principle which we understand to have been decided in Earp's Appeal, 28 Penn. State, 368, the leading American case against Minot v. Paine, is applied, both the life-tenant and the remainder-man get precisely what they would get if the dividend had been declared in cash, and common sense is not dethroned, nor justice violated.

For a full collection of authorities on this interesting question, see chapter 18 of Perry on Trusts.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The American Law Record (Cincinnati, Bloch & Co.), for August, publishes the Amendatory Bankrupt Act. It also contains the final installment of what we should take to be a very learned and interesting article, by A. T. Whatley, B. A., entitled "Historical Sketch of the Law of Piracy." It also reports de novo three interesting cases, as to which see our notes of cases.

The Irish Law Times, for July 25, contains the first installment of an article on Life Insurance Frauds, which includes an account of the man who buried the same woman three times, and also an exceedingly graphic description of Udderzook s case, which has already become celebrated in this country. It also contains a number of other readable and instructive papers on various subjects, mostly selected.

The Daily Register, for August 6, publishes Casserly v. Manners, Supreme Court of New York, Special Term, Van Brunt, J., holding that the authority granted by law to an insurance company to re-insure, is granted for the benefit of the company, and not of individual policy holders. See our Notes of Cases for a more extended notice of this decision. The other numbers of the Daily Register contain nothing of interest, except selected matter which we have already noticed.

The Washington Law Reporter, for August 4, reports the case of Hill v. Shoemaker, Supreme Court of District of Columbia, holding that the sale of real estate under a deed of trust, as a whole, when it is capable of being divided, and when serious injury has been occasioned by that way of selling, furnishes just ground for relief in a court of equity; and that if the property has been consolidated and improved into a paper mill (after the deed was made), with fixed machinery and water power to operate the same, the sale will be set aside, if it is made without reference to this altered condition of the property.

Its other cases are selected and have already been noticed by us.

The Pacific Law Reporter, for July 21, publishes Knowles v. Logansport. Gaslight Co., published in our issue for June 25 (ante, p 311). Also Lewis v. D'Arcy, selected from the Chicago Legal News, which we notice elsewhere in this number. Also a decision of the secretary of the interior in Born v B. & M. R. R. Co., holding that a settler who in good faith is residing on a tract of land covered by a homestead entry at the date of the cancellation of said entry, has a superior right to said tract, if he file, under the pre-emption law, in time, to a person who merely makes a homestead entry on the land the day the prior entry is cancelled. This decision is to be commended for its good sense and equity. The Reporter also reprints from the Chicago Legal News the case of Chicago & R. I. R. R. Co. v. Town of Lake, on the subject of laying out streets in a town through railway property. See our notes of cases.

The same journal, for July 28, publishes an oral decision of Mr. Circuit Judge Sawyer, in Fisher v. Craig, which was a bill in equity to restrain the infringement of a patent. It also publishes Thompson v. Whitman, published in this journal for June 25 (ante, p. 308). It also reprints from the Western Land Owner a decision of the secretary of the interior ruling the following point: "The general route of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company became fixed at the date of filing the map in the office of the secretary of the interior, August 13, 1870. The interior department afterwards recognized the changed line, filed Oct. 12, 1870. Parties who settled on lands outside of the limits of the first fixed line, but within the limits of the changed line, prior to notice of such change, are entitled to protection, and the company will be allowed indemnity under their grant for land so settled upon.

The American Law Register, for August, contains an article on the maxim "nullum tempus accurrit regi." It also publishes the following interesting American decisions, the first three accompanied with notes by Judge Redfield.

Kirschner v. Conklin, Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut—commercial paper—relative rights and duties of endorsers of accommodation paper, he same as regular business paper—subsequent accommodation endorser may, recover the whole amount of note from prior accommodation endorser, unless there is an actual agreement to share the liability. Opinion by Parke, J.

Boardman's Appeal, same court—Ante-nuptial contract—provision for wife in lieu of dower—funds held by trustee under such contract, and payment of the income from time to time to husband with wife's knowledge—husband's estate held liable for all such income, though received more than the statutory period of limitation before his death. Opinion by Foster J.

Territory of Montana v. Lee, Supreme Court of Montana—Territories are not only not sovereign states, but have none of the attributes of sovereignty, even after they are organized by Congress—cannot pass laws for the forfeiture of the title of aliens to land within their boundaries; nature of such governments discussed. Opinion by Wade, C. J.

Rheem v. Carlisle Bank, Supreme Court of Pennsylvania—Sunday—notice of protest of commercial paper delivered on Sunday is a nullity—receipt of such notice in a sealed envelope, without reply when told what it is, does not amount to a waiver nor does it make a valid notice on Monday, though a new notice would then be in time. Opinion by Sharswood, J.

Taylor v. Steamboat Commonwealth, United States District Court, Eastern District of Missouri—Maratime lien does not depend on character of the port where the repairs are made—in foreign port there is a presumption in favor of a lien, but in the home port otherwise, and it must affirmatively appear that repairs were made on the credit of the vessel—lien created by master in foreign port is limited to repairs necessary to enable the vessel to pursue her voyage, but there is no such restriction on the owners at the home port. Opinion by Treat, J.

Hovey v. Home Insurance Company, United States Circuit Court, Southern District of Ohio—Set-off in bankruptcy—insurance company having failed, another company, which had reinsured certain policies was entitled to buy them in and set them off against the claim for reinsurance—such set off is not against public policy, nor against the law if made before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy against the original insurer. Opinion by Swing, J.

The Abstracts of Recent American Decisions, contained in the American Law Register, for August, embrace only the Supreme Courts of Michigan and Pennsylvania, but include the following subjects: Action, Amendment, Bills and Notes, Check, Constitutional Law, Criminal Law, Damages, Ejectment, Husband and Wife, Mortgage, Municipal Corporations, Navigable Waters, Negligence, Railroad, Riparian Rights, Slander, Specific Performance, Statute, Street, Taxation, Vendor and Purchaser,

Digitized by Google

Notes and Queries.

HERMAN, Mo., July 24th, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A., being a widow, has a right of dower in a valuable tract of land, which dower has never been admeasured or assigned to her. A. conveys her dower-right by deed, for valuable consideration, to B. Can B., by proceeding in equity against C., the present owner and possessor of the land, have the dower, bought from A., admeasured to himself? H.

ANSWER.—In 1 Scribner on Dower, the author, after citing the cases, of which there are many, and among which are Potter v. Everitt, 7 Ired. Eq. 152; Wilson v. McLenaghan, 1 McMillan (Son. Car.), Eq. 35; McCubben v. Cromwell, 2 Har. & Gill. (Md.), 443; Strong v. Clem, 12 Ind. 37; thus states what seems to be the true deduction from them: "The doctrine of these cases, recognizing the power of a court of equity to enforce the contract of a widow for the sale of her dower interest, when fairly made, and to protect the assignee in his rights, seems both reasonable and just, and is undoubtedly supported by the weight of authority." Such would seem to be the law, unless there is something in the legislation or adjudications in Missouri, to the contrary.

CHILLICOTHE, Mo., August 10, 1874.

Mrs Mary Eden has $3,000 cash, inherited, but not settled upon her by any separate instrument. With the verbal consent of her husband, she enters into copartnership, without written articles, with Henry Summers, in the live stock business, and embarks all her capital therein. By mutual consent, Mr. Eden acts as agent for, and on behalf of his wife, in the management of copartnership affairs.

The firm failed in a year's time, but not until Mr. Eden succeeds in withdrawing all his wife's capital, leaving Summers to pay the debts, some $2,500, which he does in a year's time, but not until Mrs. Eden has deceased, making her husband, by will, her sole legatee and executor. Summers brings suit in equity against Eden, as executor (alleging also his being sole legatee) to settle up the partnership and make Mrs. Eden's estate pay her share of the losses, and alleging all the facts herein stated.

To this petition a demurrer is filed, the vital point of which is that Mrs. Eden, being a married woman, could not enter into copartnership.

Query. Is the suit well brought, or not? C.

ANSWER.— Unless the common law has been changed, relaxed or modified in the state where the transaction took place, our impression would be that it would be difficult to make the wife or her estate personally liable for losses.

Legal News and Notes.

— LORD O'HAGAN is to preside over the section for Economic Science at the meeting to be held at Belfast on the 19th of August.

— TOWNSEND SCUDDER, Esq., an esteemed member of the bar of New York city, died recently.

— THE attorney general has received and accepted the resignations of J. Newton Temple, district attorney for the western district of Arkansas, and John A. Minnis, for the northern district of Alabama.

— HON. DAVID A. SMALLEY, judge of the United States court for the district of Vermont, recently suffered from a slight stroke of paralysis so that he is partially disabled. His case, however, is hopeful.

EFFORTS are being made before the Pennsylvania Board of Pardons to secure the pardon of Udderzook, the life insurance swindler and murderer. The case has been set for hearing October 8th.

— THE Irish Law Times, of July 25, says that the Right Hon. A. Brewster, ex-Lord Chancellor of Ireland, is still seriously ill at his country residence, Roebuck Grove, Clonskeagh, and that there is hardly any hope of his recovery.

— MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL WILLIAMS decides that a United States marshal, having an attachment against goods for salvage, is entitled to take the property attached into his custody and hold it until disposed of by the court issuing the attachment.

— AT the Warwickshire (English) assizes, recently, Mr. Justice Denman, in charging the grand jury, referring to drink as a prolific source of crime, mentioned, as an illustration of this, that there were thirty-nine prisoners for trial at the last Liverpool assizes, one-third being cases of murder, manslaughter, and unlawful wounding, every one of which was directly attributable to drink.

—IT is stated that the Benchers of Gray's Inn have held anotherconference to consider the case of Dr. Kenealy upon the issues arising out of the Tichborne trial, and for the articles published in the Englishman. It was decided to deprive Dr. Kenealy of his benchership, and to hereafter consider the question of expelling him from the bar if publications in the Englishman are continued.

—THE San Francisco Bar Association is a live institution, embracing over 150 prominent members of the Bar, who occupy a fine suite of rooms, extending 120 feet from Commercial to Sacramento streets, embracing dining rooms, billiard rooms, smoking rooms, reading rooms, etc., and is really a social club, where most of its members daily lunch together at the usual recess of the courts, from 12½ M. to 2 P. M.

—IT is said that the estate of the late Chief Justice Chase, settlement of which has been slow, owing to a disinclination of the executor to sell his stocks and other personal property during the period of depression, will amount, when all his debts are paid, to about one hundred and five thousand dollars. Some of the securities, including one hundred shares in the Pennsylvania avenue street railway, have just been sold to pay small creditors, who were pressing. The estate owes Jay Cooke & Co., $121,000, mostly advanced on stocks, and Mrs. Hoyt (Judge Chase's daughter), $5,000.

—THE new constitution of Michigan, which is to be submitted to the people of that state for ratification or rejection on the first of October, confers suffrage upon women; prohibits special legislation on a variety of subjects named; gives the governor power to veto a part of any bill while approving the remainder; extends to ten years the term of the supreme court judges; raises the salaries of the leading state officers, which are now even meagre; prohibits stock "watering;" limits the amount of real estate to be held by corporations within the state; prohibits competing railroads from combining under one management or from "pooling" their earnings, and also forbids any railroad officer or employe, from engaging otherwise in the business of transportation.

—SOME of the opponents of the proposed reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada, question the constitutional right of the president and senate to regulate duties on imports by treaty, claiming that since the constitution confers upon the house of representatives power to originate all bills for the raising of revenue, and gives to congress power to "lay and collect taxes, duties, imports and excises," this necessarily excludes the regulation of duties and imports from the treaty-making power. Our able contemporary, the Financier, takes the opposite view, and quotes from the Federalist, and from Story on the constitution, to show that the view above indicated is not the correct one.

—MRS. BELVA A. LOCKWOOD, the lady lawyer of Washington City, is still pushing business. She has recently entered suit for Mrs. C. Susan Raugh, against Thomas Leake, for $630, borrowed money. It is said that Leake engaged to marry Mrs. Raugh, and she loaned him the money, and also gave her note to enable him to set up in business preparatory to the consummation of the marriage; but that he left and went to another city, and refuses now to fulfill his part of the contract by marrying her. We cheerfully give Mrs. Lockwood the benefit of this gratuitous notice, as, with the exception of Mrs. Bradwell and Miss Huett, she seems to be the only lady lawyer that has done anything, except to swing around the circle and deliver lectures.

—THE San Francisco Bar Association embraced the opportunity of the presence of the distinguished jurist, David Dudley Field, in this city, for forty-eight hours last week, en route from Australia to New York, to give him an improvised reception at their club rooms, 634 Sacramento street. On the mere rumor that Mr. Field might visit their rooms on Monday, they were more than usually filled, and the members of the Bar had the pleasure of a brief interview with a gentleman whose connection with the revision of the law has already secured to him a permanent place among historic legislators. The old lawyers, whose labors had been increased by the result of his works, and the younger ones, whose studies had been shortened by them, were equally glad to take by the hand one whom all must recognize as facile princeps in his art. If the occasion was as pleasant to Mr. Field as it was to those who met him — and it seemed to be — it was a great success. Mr. Field appeared to be in excellent health and spirits.—Pacific Law Reporter.

— ARTIST OR TRADER? — A curious case was recently before the Court of Appeal at Paris. The question arose whether a chef de claque was a trader, so as to be liable to the bankruptcy law. It appeared that M. Goudchon was a contractor for dramatic success, and was attached in that capacity to several theatres. It was his duty to form, instruct, and direct a band of men, who every night ensured vigorous applause for the actors and plays. Having been adjudicated bankrupt in his absence by the tribunal of commerce, he now applied to the court to annul the adjudication on the ground that he was not a trader. His counsel entered into a learned discussion of the origin of the claque, and its history in ancient and modern times. He contended that the chef could not in any proper sense be considered a trader. His payment from the managers of the theatres was only in free admissions, which he sold at a low rate to the claquers. His gains consisted chiefly in gratuities from actors and actresses who desired specially rapturous applause. Under these circumstances it was contended he was an artist, and not a trader. The court, however, declined to take this view, and confirmed the order of the tribunal of commerce.—Irish Law Times.

Digitized by Google

Notes of Cases.

Our notes of English cases are from the Law Times. Our notes of cases decided in the New York Court of Appeals and in the New York Commission of Appeals are from the Albany Law Journal. Those decided in the Supreme Court of Ohio are from advance sheets of the 24 Ohio State Reports, furnished by Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co., of Cincinnati, or from the American Law Record (Cincinnati). Those decided in the Kentucky Court of Appeals are from the American Law Record. Those decided in the Supreme Court of the United States are from printed opinions in our possession. Those decided by the Supreme Court of Michigan are from Chaney's Quarterly Digest. Others are from cases reported in our exchanges, unless otherwise stated.

Slander—Imputation of Want of Chastity.—Imputation of want of chastity in a female is actionable per se (Comp. Laws, § 6176), and no averment of special damages to show a cause of action thereon is needed. The plaintiff may, without claiming special damages, show that in consequence of the slander she had been excluded from the society in which she had moved, and was affected in mind and health. (Phillips v. Hoyle, 4 Gray, 568; Swift v. Dickerman 31 Conn. 285.) Burts v. McBain. Supreme Court of Michigan, April Term, 1874.

———. Evidence as to Origin of Slander.—If a witness for the defense in slander testifies to having heard the story before the defendant told it, it is competent on re-examination for the plaintiff to ask from whom the witness had heard it. The plaintiff should be allowed to show whence the story came, and what there was to it. If the object was to mitigate damages by showing that the defendant had only repeated a common rumor, its prevalence becomes a proper subject of enquiry, and the plaintiff may trace it back to the defendant, if possible. Ibid.

———. Admissions—Evidence of Supposition.—It was held competent for a witness to testify that one on trial for slander had admitted that she "supposed" she had repeated the slanderous statement. Ibid.

———. Careless Slanders.—It was held right to refuse to charge that if the jury believed that a person charged with slandering a woman's chastity, had made the statement as something she (the accused) had heard, adding that she did not believe it to be true, and did not intend to impute a want of chastity, and was not understood to impute it by those who heard her, and if in this way her statement, taken together, was a denial of the imputation, there was no ground for action, and the defendant ought to be acquitted. It was correct to inform the jury that there can be no excuse in law for the circulation of vile, defamatory or slanderous language against another which the utterer does not believe to be true. Ibid.

Rescinding Grants to Railroads.—The Supreme Court of Maine has made an interesting decision, recently, in the suit of the town of Unity against the Belfast and Moosehead Railroad, to recover $30,000 alleged to have been subscribed to the stock of the company. The town had, by the required two-thirds vote, agreed to take this amount of stock, but before the road had accepted the vote, and before the line was located, the town, by a majority vote, rescinded its previous action. The court decided that a majority can reverse action taken by a two-thirds vote.

Right of Church Committee to Refuse to Continue Lease of Pew.—In Johnston v. Minister and Trustees of St. Andrew's Church, in the Superior Court at Montreal, before JOHNSON, J., the following points were ruled:

1. That the minister and trustees of a voluntary organization such as the St. Andrew's Church, Montreal, exercising corporate powers under certain regulations, have a right to refuse to renew the lease of a pew in the church, on the expiration of the term for which it was leased; and such refusal, unless it appear to be a mere cloak for malice, gives the dispossessed tenant no claim for damages.

2. That where the receipt given for the pew-rent clearly defines the term of the lease, Art. 1658 of the Civil Code applies, and no notice is necessary to terminate the lease at the expiration of the term.

3. That the civil courts, as a general rule, will not interfere with the determination of the majority of such voluntary organization, where no civil rights as to property are involved.

The case is reported in the Lower Canada Jurist for July.

Infringement of Patent—Injunction—Damages.—A patentee brought an action for an injunction to restrain the sale of imitations of his patented article, and also for damages. It appeared that his patented articles were put on the market without being stamped as required by § 38 of the law of 1871 (16 Stat. 203), and that, although it would have been expensive, yet it was not impracticable for them to be so stamped. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to perpetual injunction, and also to damages; but that the measure of his damages would be the difference between the prices paid by the defendants for the spurious articles, and those at which the plaintiff sold the genuine ones. Putnam v. Ludhoff, U. S. District Court, Eastern District, Mo., TREAT, J.

Eminent Domain—Power of Incorporated Town to open Street through Railway Property.— In the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co., v. Town of Lake, Chicago legal News, July 4; S. C., 8 Pacific Law Reporter, 22, the following question was ruled in the Supreme Court of Illinois: The town of Lake was incorporated under a general law of Illinois, with power to condemn land for the purpose of opening streets within its corporate limits. The Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co. owned a block of ground in said town, which they purchased in 1853 for railroad purposes. They had erected freight houses, depots and laid railroad-tracks, side tracks, and switches in different directions, on and across the same, for the convenient handling of cars and freight, and for making connections with each other, and they alleged that the necessities of their increasing business will require more tracks, side tracks, and more rooom for standing cars, etc., on this land. The town of Lake, by and through its board of trustees, passed an ordinance to lay and open a public street through a portion of block. The town, by its supervisor, filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Cook county, in and by which it invoked the law of eminent domain of the state, to compel and enforce the opening of the street, in which it asked that just compensation be made to the railroad company for private property taken or damaged by the opening of the street, and that the damages be ascertained by a jury in the manner required by law. To enjoin this proceeding, the railroad company filed the present bill. They also allege that the opening of the street through block B., would destroy in a great degree, the value of the premises for railroad purposes for which the land was purchased, and the injury to complainants would be irreparable; that the public good and convenience, does not require that the street should be extended through this block; that it will not shorten the distance to parties going either north or south; that even if it should appear that the opening of the street would be a convenience to a few, still the greater good and convenience require that the same should not be opened, and in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, the greater public good must prevail in a court of epuity; that if the street should be opened, it would be practically useless to the public, by reason of the many railroad tracks in and across the same; and that the lives and property of persons attempting to pass over the street would be constantly in peril.

The court apply the principle that, where the use for which the property is sought to be taken is clearly a public use, the judiciary is without power to enquire into and determine the necessity and propriety of taking it, and therefore affirm the decree of the circuit court in dismissing the bill.

Mr. Justice CRAIG, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "As we understand the argument of appellants, they claim that they are a corporation, having under the law of eminent domain taken and hold this property for public uses and purposes, and when the appellees undertake to invoke the same law, and take the property for public purposes, they, appellants, have superior equity, and hence the courts ought and should interfere in their behalf. We do not regard the position taken by appellants as sound and tenable. We cannot believe the right of property more sacred in a chartered corporation than the same right in the hands of the private citizen; both must stand upon the same footing. It is impossible, upon principle, to make a distinction between rights acquired to land by a corporation, and the title held by letters patent by the citizens from the government. Over such the same sovereign power exists. The same great law of public necessity, requiring that the private right should yield to public exigency, must be applied to both. The citizen and the corporation alike accept a grant of land, with the reserved right resting over and upon it of the state, to retake it at such time as the public necessity may require, upon just compensation being made. The exercise of this right of eminent domain over franchises and property held by corporations under a charter, is of frequent occurrence; bridges or institutes, free ferries, turnpikes, giv way to railroads and canals. In fact, the whole policy of the country in relation to public roads, railroads, canals, under which lands have been condemned, rests upon this power. The principle contended for by the appellants in this case, once established, one railroad could not be constructed across another, a highway could not be built across a railroad, nor a railroad across a canal, or a stream of water at a ferry; in fact the doctrine contended for would have a tendency to stop the improvement and development of the country."

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor. } ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 20, 1874. { SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor. }

CONGRESSIONAL LAND GRANTS—CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT.—A press dispatch from Washington of a recent date, makes the announcement that Mr. Attorney-General WILLIAMS has decided:

1st. That the operations of the conditions subsequent to the congressional grants of public lands does not depend upon the rules of common law applicable to such conditions, but upon the intention of Congress as gathered from the language employed in the grant itself.

2d. That the grant of lands made by Congress to Wisconsin by the act of Congress, June 10, 1856, to aid in the construction of railroads in the state of Wisconsin, in which it was provided that, if the said roads are not completed within ten years no further sales shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States, is determined as to lands unsold at the time on account of the failure to complete the roads at the time specified in this act, no congressional action or judicial proceedings are necessary, but that such unsold lands shall be remitted to the public domain by the publication of an order by the secretary of the interior, restoring them to settlement and market.

The reverse of the proposition, above stated, was decided by the United States Circuit Court for the District of Minnesota, in 1872, in the case of Schulenburg v. Harriman, 2 Dillon, C. C. R. 398. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court, in which it was held that the lands granted did not, ipso facto, revert to the United States by mere failure to build the road within the time prescribed by the act of Congress, and that to affect the forfeiture, some act on the part of the general government (what, was not determined), evincing an intention to take advantage of the forfeiture, was essential. This case is before the Supreme Court of the United States, by which the question will receive an authoriative settlement, probably at the coming session.

THE MODEL LAW SCHOOL.—The following extract embodies President Woolsey's notions of what a law school should be. Who can say that his ideal is to high? He says:

"Let the school, then, be regarded no longer as simply the place for training men to plead causes, to give advice to clients, to defend criminals, but let it be regarded as a place of instruction in all sound learning relating to the foundations of justice, the history of law, the doctrine of government, to all those branches of knowledge which the most finished statesman and legislator ought to know. First of all, I would have the training essential to the lawyer by profession as complete and thorough as possible. Let that be still the main thing, and let the examinations, together with the appropriate theses, be a proof that every graduate has fairly earned his degree. But with this let there be ample opportunity for those who wish the aid of teachers in studying the constitution and political history of our country, to pursue their studies in a special course by the side of, or after the preparation for the bar. Let law of nations, the doctrine of finance and taxation, the general doctrine of rights and state, the relation of politics and morals, be within the reach of such as wish to prepare themselves for public life, and of those young men of wealth, of whom there is an increasing number who wish to cultivate themselves and take their appropriate place of influence in society. Let there be the amplest opportunity for the study of English institutions, even far back into the middle ages, for that of Roman history and Roman law, for that of comparative legislation, and even for less immediately practical subjects, such as feudal and canon law. Let the plan of the library be expanded so that it shall furnish the best books on all branches and topics connected with law, legislation, and government. Can it be doubted that such an institution, of which I have sketched a faint outline, would be of vast service; that its influence would reach into the halls of Congress, into the departments of government, that it might become a fountain of light through the whole land?"

The Pomeroy Bribery Case.

We publish elsewhere the opinion of Hon. J. T. MORTON, Judge of the Third Judicial District of Kansas, in the celebrated case of the State v. Pomeroy. We do not, as a rule, design to publish decisions of the state courts at nisi prius, but the exceptional character of this case, as well as the widespread popular and legal interest which attaches to it, induces us to do so in this instance. It is perhaps the first case in the history of our country where a distinguished citizen, who had sat for several years in the Senate of the United States, has been indicted for an attempt to accomplish, by the bribery of a member of the legislature of his state, his re-election to that high office.

At the conclusion of the reading of this opinion the counsel for the defendant moved for a change of venue, and supported their motion by the following affidavits:

The State of Kansas v. S. C. Pomeroy—Affidavit.

James Rogers, being first duly sworn, deposed, and says that, on the 29th day of January, 1873, he was in Topeka, Kansas, and after Senator A. M. York had made his statement in the joint convention of the legislature of the state of Kansas, in reference to Mr. S. C. Pomeroy paying him $7,000 at a private room in the Teft house, in said city, there being present John Fletcher, John T. Morton, John J. Ingalls, myself and others, the Hon John T. Morton, now judge of the third judicial district of Kansas, in conversation with me relative to the defeat of said S. C. Pomeroy as United States senator, then and there, grasping me firmly by the hand, said, "Rogers, we have got the God damned old scoundrel just where we want him—a poor man will hereafter stand some show for an election to the United States senate;" and said affiant says he never told the said S. C. Pomeroy or any of his attorneys of the said conversation until on Tuesday, July 28, 1874, although affiant did make mention of such conversation to other parties at the time of such conversation, or soon after; and said affiant says that the said conversation of the said Hon. J. T. Morton referred to the said S. C. Pomeroy, and further deponent saith not.

(Signed.) JAMES ROGERS.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 29th day of July, 1874.

(Signed.) J. P. ENNIS, Notary Public.

State of Kansas v. S. C. Pomeroy—Affidavit.

S. C. Pomeroy, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that Hon. J. J. Morton, judge of the district court above named, is prejudiced against this defendant, and that this defendant cannot have a fair and impartial trial in the third judicial district, on account of the prejudice of the said judge; and affiant says that he is informed and believes that the said judge on or about the 29th day of February, 1873, and after the pretended criminal charge had been made against him, and in reference to the said charge and this defendant, said of, and as to, this defendant, the following words and language, viz.: "We have got the God damned old scoundrel just where we want him—a poor man ill hereafter stand some show for an election to the United States senate;" and that this conversation and expression of hatred, ill will and prejudice towards and against this defendant was made to one James Rogers, in Topeka, Kansas, and the said affiant never knew of said conversation and statement until Tuesday, July 28, 1874, and on said July 28, 1874, the said James Rogers informed this affiant of such statement of said judge, and all this information only came to the knowledge of this affiant this week, and further he saith not.

Digitized by Google

(Signed.) S. C. POMEROY.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 29th day of July, 1874.

(Signed.) J. P. ENNIS, Notary Public.

At the conclusion of the reading of these affidavits, Judge MORTON is reported to have said: "In view of the affidavits which have been read upon this motion—in view of the importance and notoriety of the case, there is but one course that I should take in the matter. Those who preside over courts of justice should not only be careful in their decisions, but should so conduct their proceedings that their courts should have the confidence of the public for independence, integrity and fairness. In view of the course which has been taken in this case upon the application and the affidavits presented, I would deem it indelicate for me to retain the case for trial. The cause will be sent to Osage county for further proceedings.

"Having thus diposed of the motion, I have a right to say in reference to the affidavit of Mr. Rogers, that he is grossly mistaken. It so happened that I was in the room of Senator Ingalls, at the Tefft house, when the information of the alleged expose of Senator York was brought to the room. I at first discredited it, but upon being assured that such proceedings as are now matters of history had occurred at the capitol, I instantly left the room and went to my home, with the feeling—perhaps with the remark that some case founded on these proceedings might come before me as judge, and that my place was not there. I may add, too, that I am not in the habit of using such profane language as that stated in Mr. Rogers' affidavit, and that my feelings at that time and since toward Mr. Pomeroy were, and have been, of the most friendly character. I remember distinctly that, on my way home, I met more than one acquaintance who addressed inquiries to me upon the subject that had suddenly awakened so much interest and excitement. My answer in each instance was, that if there was any one man who should not speak upon the matter, I was that man. I closed my mouth at once, and have kept it closed. I trust, in common fairness and in common charity, that Mr. Rogers has, in the intense excitement of that occasion, mistaken some other man for me."

The defendant's counsel then asked that the bond be reduced to $10,000, but Mr. Ryon objected to this, and the court refused to reduce the bail from the original amount, which was $20,000.

The case of ex-Senator Pomeroy will probably come before Judge PEYTON, at Burlingame, in November next.

For the opinion, which we elsewhere publish, and the above facts, we are indebted to Messrs. Guthrie and Brown, counsellors at law, Topeka, Kansas.

Enjoining Collection of Railroad Taxes in Missouri—When Equity will Interfere—How far Action of Board of Equalization is Subject to Judicial Control.

Recently several suits were brought in the federal courts in Missouri by non-resident stockholders in the Iron Mountain, Pacific, Mo. Kansas & Texas, and other railroad companies, against the directors of those companies, and against the state auditor, and the officers of the several counties and municipalities through which the respective roads run, to restrain the collection of taxes levied under the legislation of the state for the year 1873. The bills, in their frame and theory, were like that which was considered and supported by the supreme Court of the United States in Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 Howard, 331.

The cases came before the circuit judge at his chambers, August 5, 1874, upon motions by the respective plaintiffs for the allowance of temporary injunctions. No answers were filed, and the question argued was whether the bills, upon their face, and supposing these allegations to be true, made out a prima facie case for a preliminary injunction.

In all the bills there was a common ground of complaint in respect to the action of the state board of equalization in fixing the valuation of the property of the respective companies for taxation.

By the legislation of Missouri it appears that the valuation of railroad property, upon which all taxes, state and local, are levied, is determined by the state board of equalization. The bills charged misconduct and illegal action on the part of the state board of equalization in many particulars, and among others with intentionally, through passion and prejudice, assessing railroad property not only beyond its real value, but at more than one-third higher than other property of equal value against evidence and without evidence. In awarding a preliminary injunction, the circuit judge, after stating the causes of the complaint, concluded his opinion as follows:

Such are the grievances complained of; and the question now is whether, if the allegations of the bills are substantially true, they give a right in equity to relief, and to what extent.

The cases are now before me, after notice to the defendants for an allowance of a temporary injunction. No answers have been filed, and hence the material allegations of the bill, which are sworn to, are, on this hearing, and for the present purpose, to be considered as true, and the enquiry is, supposing the bills to be true, can a court of equity interfere, either preliminarily by an injunction, or finally by a decree?

The decisions as to what will give an equity to enjoin the collection of taxes, are conflicting, and, to my mind, not very satisfactory.

Since all regular governments subsist by means of taxes, which are assessed, levied and collected under laws necessarily stringent and summary, in order to insure prompt payment, it is obvious that the courts should not interfere by injunction with the regular working of these laws, unless an injury to the citizen is thereby inflicted, for which he has no other adequate remedy. When this is the case, however, the courts should not hesitate to interfere to protect the citizen against the action of the state, for the state, acting for all, is under the highest obligations to deal justly with each.

I confess to some doubts as to what will warrant the judicial tribunals in interfering with the results of the actions of such a body as the state board of equalization. It is clear that such interference cannot be justified for reasons merely formal or technical, or for acts which do no substantial injury, or where the wrong could have been avoided or prevented by measures or steps open to the party at the time. Mistakes of judgment on the part of such body in honestly over-valuing property, cannot, ordinarily, if ever, be corrected by a bill in equity.

On the other hand, I am unwilling, without further reflection, to say that in no possible case will a court of equity interfere with the result of the action of an assessing, equalizing body. Suppose local assessors purposely value the property of non-residents two or three times as high as the property of their neighbors, and that this action is confirmed by the local board of equalization, which refuses to interfere because in sympathy with the feelings which actuated the assessors, is there no remedy?

Now, if the charges in the present bill be true, the state board, actuated by passion and prejudice, and with a design to discriminate against railroads, and without evidence, have assessed the property not only higher than it was valued by the companies, on oath, but higher than it was valued by the county courts, and much higher than it was valued upon evidence by committees of their own body, the result of which is, as alleged, an excessive valuation of at least one-third more than other property of equal value, thereby compelling the railroads to bear more than their share of the public burdens; if all this can be established, my impression is that equity ought to intervene; not, however, to annul the whole assessment, but only to reduce the inequality.

Internet Archive

In stating that such is my impression, I wish to add, that it is not a firm conviction, and that, on a question of so much difficulty and importance, it is but just to both sides that my final views should be reserved until it can be brought up on full argument before the whole court.

It is a fortunate circumstance that the court meets next month, and that these cases can be brought before all the judges, and perhaps a decision then had, or at all events the principles of a decision, so as to involve no great delay the collection of these taxes to the extent of the actual value of the property. Except those roads, if there are any, which have a still subsiding legislative contract of exemption from taxation, the plaintiffs have no equity for an injunction.

In order to bring this matter before a full court, and to give the defendants an opportunity to answer the charges in the bills, if they desire, I have thought it best to allow a temporary injunction to issue, unless the defendants are willing to let the collection of the taxes rest until the views of the court can be had. We will give every facility for bringing the question to a speedy hearing, and the counties, etc., can at any time, if this is deemed desirable by them, have the injunction modified so as to allow them to collect taxes so far as the admitted value of the property shows a liabity, so far, or as we see it to be equitable; or we can refuse to continue the injunction except on condition that such a portion of the taxes be paid into the court for the use of the state, counties and towns entitled thereto. At present, and until the views of the court are settled concerning the right to maintain these bills, it is perhaps best not to complicate the cases by granting only a partial injunction, or by requiring payment of one-third of the assessed taxes as a condition of the injunction. Inasmuch as there exists doubts as to the right to maintain these bills, and in view of the fact that the time is only a few weeks distant, it would seem better on all sides to let the matter rest until the court meets, without requiring injunctions to be formally issued, which will be attended with costs. But if the defendants are unwilling to allow this to be done, a temporary injunction may issue in each case, reserving the right of the defendants to move at the next term to dissolve it, with or without answer, as they may be divided. If answers are to be filed to resist the injunctions, let them be filed by the September rules, and any affidavits in support thereof by September 15, and counter affidavits by September 25. Motions to dissolve or modify the injunction may be set down for the second Tuesday of the term. It is so ordered.

Constitutionality of State Laws Levying Quarantine Fees upon Foreign Vessels.

We have received, through the courtesy of Hon. William Archer Cocke, attorney-general of Florida, an opinion of his, holding that a law of Florida which requires the master or owner of any ship, boat or vessel under quarantine to pay to the legally appointed inspectors under the quarantine laws the fees of such inspectors, is not unconstitutional. We regret that, owing to our limited space, we can do no more than briefly notice the points made. The attorney-general quotes the provisions of the federal constitution which prohibits the states, without the consent of Congress, from laying "any duty of tonnage;" also the act of February 25, 1799, which authorizes the states to pass quarantine laws, with two restrictions: 1. That they shall not, without consent of Congress, collect any duty of tonnage; 2. That no part of the cargo of any vessel shall in any case be taken out, or unladen therefrom, otherwise than as allowed by law. He then quotes several authorities, among them Cool. Const. Lim. 584; Steamship Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450; Steamship Co. v. Portwardens, 6 Wall. 31; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419; Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cowen, 49; New York v. Miln, 11 Peters, 102, and Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. 299, and concludes as follows: "The conclusion to which I come is that the quarantine laws of Florida, being neither unconstitutional nor in antagonism to the laws of Congress, should have full force and effect. The fee imposed being no tax on tonnage, no duty on imports nor exports, nor a duty on the ship, but simply a charge against the master or owner of the vessel to sustain a police regulation, it is as constitutional and as legal as the pilot laws, existing in nearly every state in the Union, the requirements of which laws have been always sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in forcing masters or owners of boats to pay pilot fees. I can see no reason why the law of Florida requiring the master or owner of any ship, boat, or vessel to pay the fees of the port inspectors, should not be enforced, it being but the means of executing the quarantine laws of the state; and the payment of the officers being essential in the enforcement of the police regulations of quarantine, the master or owner of the boat must either conform to the law or remain outside quarantine limits. Any vessel violating quarantine regulations can be attached, and the clerk of the circuit court has no alternative, upon application of the mayor of an incorporated city, or the health officers of any port, but to issue the writ of attachment according to law. Act of June 6, 1870, Sections 1, 2, 3, p. 15."

In the recent case of Peete v. Morgan, determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, and not yet reported, the precise question is considered. Morgan, a citizen of New York, and the owner of two lines of steamers registered and enrolled in New York, running from ports in Louisiana to ports in Texas, and back to the ports in Louisiana, brought his bill in equity in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas, to restrain Peete, the health officer at Galveston, from the future collection of quarantine fees which had been exacted from all his vessels coming to the quarantine ground under claim of authority by virtue of the legislation of Texas. This legislation, which had the approval of the governor, on the 13th of August, 1870, declared that every vessel arriving at the quarantine station should pay the sum of five dollars for the first hundred tons, and one and a half cents for each additional ton. The case was heard on bill and answer, and a decree rendered granting the injunction prayed for and making it perpetual, and this decree the supreme court affirm.

Mr. Justice Davis, in delivering the opinion of the court, holds the following language:

"That the power to establish quarantine laws rests with the states, and has not been surrendered to the general government, is settled in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 203. The source of this power in the acknowledged right of a state to provide for the health of its people, and although this power when set in motion may, in a greater or less degree, affect commerce, yet the laws passed in the exercise of this power are not enacted for such an object. They are enacted for the sole purpose of preserving the public health, and if they injuriously affect commerce, Congress, under the power to regulate it, may control them. Of necessity they operate on vessels engaged in commerce, and may produce delay or inconvenience, but they are still lawful when not opposed to any constitutional provision, or any act of Congress on the subject.

"It is evident that the power to establish quarantine regulations cannot be executed without the state possessed the means to raise a revenue for their enforcement, but it is equally evident that the means used for this purpose must be of such a character as the restrictions imposed by the federal constitution upon the taxing power of the states authorize. We are not called upon in this case to go into the general subject of the limitations imposed by these restrictions, because the tax in question is manifestly outside the jurisdiction of the state to impose; and it is a "duty of tonnage" within the meaning of the constitution.

Digitized by Google

"This duty was doubtless imposed to raise revenue, but Chief Justice MARSHALL, in commenting on this subject in Gibbons v. Ogden, supra, says: 'It is true that duties may often be, and in fact often are, imposed on tonnage with a view to the regulation of commerce; but they may be imposed with a view to revenue; and it was, therefore, a prudent precaution to prohibit the states from exercising this power.' This power cannot be exercised without the permission of Congress, and Congress has never consented that the states should lay any duty on tonnage. On the contrary, so apprehensive was Congress that its legislation in 1799 (1 Stat. p. 619), directing the collectors of customs and officers commanding forts and revenue cutters to aid in the execution of the quarantine and health laws of the states, rendered necessary on account of the prevalence of yellow fever in New York, might be construed into an admission of the right of the states to lay this duty, that it used the following words of exclusion: 'That nothing herein shall enable any state to collect a duty of tonnage or impost, without the consent of the Congress of the United States thereto.'"

"It is, however, not necessary to discuss this subject, as it has been recently fully considered by this court in the state tonnage tax cases, reported in 12 Wallace, 204. In these cases the law of Alabama levied a tax at so much per ton upon all steamboats. The boats on which the tax was levied were owned by citizens of the state, and were employed exclusively in the internal commerce of the state, over which Congress has no control. The court, while conceding the full power of the state to tax the property of its citizens, held that the inhibition in the federal constitution prevented the state from taxing in this mode. Much more does this inhibition apply when the vessels are owned by citizens of another state, and are engaged in commerce between the states over which Congress has control.'"

In the tonnage tax cases, 12 Wallace, 204, it is ruled that, while a state may unquestionably lay a tax as property upon a vessel owned by its citizens, based on the value thereof, yet it cannot impose a tax on such a vessel at so much per ton of the registered tonnage.

The proper conclusion, then, would seem to be that while the state possesses the general power to collect fees from vessels in quarantine, yet if these fees are admeasured or apportioned according to the tonnage of the vessel, they will fall within the constitutional prohibition against laying a duty of tonnage—a conclusion which, it must be admitted, savors of technicality and refinement. For it would seem that the power to exact such fees in any case, would necessarily carry with it the power to make an equitable apportionment of them according to the size of the vessel; and the most obvious way of attaining such just apportionment would be to impose a tax at so much per ton of the ship's register.

But it seems that a tax which is measured, not according to the tonnage of the vessel, but which is levied directly as a uniform fee upon every vessel arriving at port, may be a "duty of tonnage" within the prohibition of the constitution. Thus, a statute of Louisiana, which authorized the master and wardens of the port of New Orleans to demand and receive, in addition to their fees, the sum of five dollars, whether called on to perform any service or not, for every vessel arriving in that port, was held to lay a duty of tonnage. Steamship Co. v. Portwardens, 6 Wallace, 31. Mr. Chief Justice CHASE, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "In the most obvious and general sense it is true these words [duty of tonnage] describe a duty proportioned to the tonnage of the vessel; a certain rate on each ton. But it seems plain that, taken in this restricted sense, the constitutional provision would not fully accomplish its intent. The general prohibition upon the states against levying duties on imports or exports would have been ineffectual if it had not been extended to duties on ships which serve as the vehicles of conveyance. This extension was doubtless intended as the prohibition of any duty of tonnage. It was not only a pro rata tax which was prohibited, but any duty on the ship, whether a fixed sum upon the whole tonnage, or a sum to be ascertained by comparing the amount of tonnage with the rate of duty. In this view of the case, the levy of the tax is expressly prohibited."

Bribery of Member of Legislature to Vote for United States Senator.

THE STATE OF KANSAS v. SAMUEL C. POMEROY.

District Court of Kansas, Third Judicial District.

Hon. J. T. MORTON, District Judge.

1. Bribery of State Senator to Vote for Senator in Congress—Sufficiency of Information for.—A criminal information alleged that Samuel C. Pomeroy did, on the 28th day of January, 1873, directly give to one Alexander M. York, seven thousand dollars, with intent to influence said York to vote for him for United States senator, in an election then pending before the legislature of the state of Kansas, "then and there about to be brought before him, the said York, in his official capacity as senator of the state of Kansas, at which said election it was the duty of said York, as said senator, to vote for a person for United States senator from the state of Kansas;" and that said York was, then and there, "an officer of the state of Kansas, to-wit: a senator of the state of Kansas." Held, on motion to quash, that this information is good; that the person to whom it is alleged the bribe was offered, is properly described as "an officer of the state of Kansas," and as "a senator of the state of Kansas."

2. State Senator—Officer of State—Bribery.—A senator in the state legislature is "an officer of the state," within the meaning of § 193 of the Kansas crimes act, which defines and punishes bribery.

3. Election of United States Senator—Kansas Crimes Act—Bribery.—The election of an United States senator, about to be held by the legislature, is a "question, matter, cause of proceeding," which could properly be charged as "pending," within the meaning of the said statute.

4. ———. ———. ———. Such question, matter, or cause of proceeding may properly be charged as having been brought before one of the members of the legislature.

5. Construction of Criminal Statutes.—Rules for the construction of criminal statutes discussed.

MORTON, J.—The information in this case alleges that the defendant, Samuel C. Pomeroy, did on the 28th day of January, 1873, directly give to Alexander M. York seven thousand dollars, with intent to influence York to vote for him for United States senator in an election then pending before the legislature of the state of Kansas, "then and there by law about to be brought before him, the said York, in his official capacity as senator of the state of Kansas, at which said election it was the duty of said York, as such senator, to vote for a person for United States senator from the state of Kansas; that said York was then and there an officer of the state of Kansas, to-wit: a senator of the state of Kansas."

This is a plain and concise statement of the allegations of the information, omitting what may be properly called the "verbiage" of pleading.

This information is founded upon section 193, chapter 31, of the general statutes of the state of Kansas, which is as follows:

Digitized by Google

"Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, give any money, goods, rights in action, or any other valuable consideration, gratuity or reward, or any promise, undertaking or security therefor, to any officer of this state, or of any county; first, with intent to influence his vote, opinion, judgment or decision, on any question, matter, cause or proceeding which may be then pending, or may by law be brought before him in his official character, or to induce him to neglect or omit the performance of any official duty, or to perform such duty with partiality or favor, otherwise than is required by law; or, second, in consideration that such officer hath given any vote, opinion, judgment or decision, in any particular manner, upon any particular side, or more favorable to one side than the other, in any matter, question, cause or proceeding, or hath omitted to perform any official act or duty, or hath performed such act or duty with partiality or favor, or otherwise, contrary to law, shall, on conviction, be adjudged guilty of bribery, and be punished by imprisonment and hard labor for a term not exceeding seven years."

The information is evidently based upon the first clause of this section above quoted. To this information the defendant interposes a motion to quash. While there are nine reasons assigned as grounds for this motion, I may say that, with the same brevity which I have used in stating the allegation of the information, I may state the reasons to be these:

1. That the facts stated in the information do not constitute a public offence.

2. That there is no such officer known to the constitution or laws of this state, "as senator of the state of Kansas."

3. That York was not at any time shown by the information to be "an officer of the state of Kansas," or shown to be a member of the legislature of the state.

4. That the information ought to state with certainty that an election was held and that at such election York's vote was given.

On both sides the argument has been able and exhaustive, and the court has listened with an attention, interest and patience by no means assumed. The importance of the case and the fact that this is the first prosecution brought under the statute, have rendered the questions raised by the motion of great interest.

To dispose, first, of what must be regarded as the least important points presented by the motion; it is urged that the election of an United States senator is not a "question, matter, cause or proceeding" which could be "pending" either before the legislature or before one of its members, as what might, by law, be brought before one of its members, in his official capacity; that there is no such officer as senator of the state of Kansas, and that the information ought to state with certainty that an election was held, at which York's vote was given.

Words and phrases in a statute are to be construed "according to their context and the approved usage of the language." General Statutes, p. 999. The election of a United States senator is regulated by law. It is prescribed what body shall elect, when the vote shall be taken, and the manner of proceeding. If it is not a "proceeding," "matter," or "question," it is difficult to say what other term would be more commonly or properly applied to it in that popular and plain way of speaking which seems to constitute the "approved usage of language."

Whether such proceeding, matter or question may be considered as "pending" may be determined by the same rule. And it would seem to be as appropriate to speak of the election of a United States senator, just before its actual occurrence, as "pending," as to speak of a state or county election as "pending" just before the day upon which it is appointed by law.

Would such proceeding, matter or question, be properly said to be brought before one of the members of the legislature? It is urged that it is brought before the entire body of which he is only an unit, and that it cannot be said to be brought before one of its members alone. But it is admitted that this section clearly applies to the bribery of a judge of a supreme court, the executive officers of the state, and county commissioners. The judges of the supreme court, a part of the executive officers, when sitting as a board of election canvassers, and the county commissioners, respectively, act as organized bodies. Before each of these bodies, respectively, questions, matters, causes and proceedings, are "brought" and "pending." Is it possible that bribery of any one of these would escape trial because the matter or cause could not be said to be pending or brought before the individual accused, but before him and two or three others? Does not the greater include the less? With such a construction as that claimed, the statute would be clearly inoperative in such a case.

Whether a state senator is a "senator of the state of Kansas," may, it seems, be determined upon about the same principal upon which both parties in arguing this motion have properly agreed, that the terms "state officers" and "officers of the state" mean precisely the same thing, and are convertible terms.

The objection that the information should show that an election was held, and that York voted thereat, does not seem to have been very strongly urged. It is disposed of by the plain statement that the offence is made complete by the statute as soon as the bribery is committed, even if the officer bribed absented himself from the election, or if an adjournment of the legislature prevented such election.

The gravest and most important question raised by the motion remains to be considered. If, under a proper construction of the statute, the term "any officer of this state" does not apply to a state senator, the statute does not apply to the information, and no public offence is charged under section 193 of the "crimes act," above quoted. Under that statute, is a state senator an "officer of the state?" The mere fact that senators are elected by only a portion of the voters of the state, that they are elected in districts, does not, it is conceived, prevent them from being considered state officers. If the constitution permitted the districting of the state for the election of supreme judges, one to be elected in each division, they would be still "state officers" of the judicial department. County commissioners are elected by districts. Yet they are county officers. This was decided by the supreme court of this state, when, under the then existing law, only one couniy in the state (Leavenworth) was districted, and the number of commissioners in that county increased by giving one to each township and to each ward in the city of Leavenworth. See Commissioners Leavenworth County v. The State, ex rel. Latta; same v. same ex rel. Miller, 1 Kansas, 688.

I cannot avoid the conclusion that members of the legislature are, in the fair and reasonable acceptation of the term, "officers of the state;" that the three co-ordinate departments of the government—the executive, legislative and judicial, who transact business for the whole state, are "officers of the state." This includes all the members of the first two departments named and the supreme judges. Whether the term is so elastic as to include district judges, as is claimed in the argument, it is unnecessary to enquire.

In the case of the state of Kansas ex rel. Hunt v. Meadows (1 Kansas, 90), our supreme court has expressed its opinion to this effect. It may, perhaps, be claimed that this is a mere dictum—that the question before it did not require it to meet this point, and that it gave other and broader reasons for its decision. Even if this were not so, the opinion is entitled to consideration.

In that case, where the sole questions were whether the territorial legislature was superseded before the proclamation of the governor convening the state legislature was issued, and whether its acts passed after the admission of the state were valid laws, the court, after alluding to the fact that section three of the schedule of the constitution provided that the governor, secretary and judges, and all the other officers, both civil and military, under the territorial government, should continue to perform the duties of their respective departments until superseded under the authority of the state constitution, says:

Digitized by Google

"It was, without doubt, competent for the constitution to provide against an interregnum by adopting the territorial officers and machinery, and by making the existing functionaries of the territory the officers of the state for the time being. * * * Members of the legislature, not only in the common use and acceptation, but in the technical and legal sense of the term, are officers of the government."

But if there were a serious doubt whether, with strict propriety and legality, members of the legislature are to be classed as state officers, I think it can be safely assumed that, under reasonable, true and strictly legal construction of the statute under which this information is drawn, the term "officers of the state" must be held to include members of the legislature. I have already quoted from page 999, Gen. Stat., the provision that, in construing statutes, "words and phrases shall be construed according to their context and the approved use of the language." It of course follows from this that the same word or phrase may be used in different statutes, or in the constitution and in the stautues, with different meanings for the "context," may differ. The intention of the legislature may be thus arrived at, and this seems to dispose of the objection that, in other statutes, the legislature seemed to understand differently the term "state officers."

"The clear intention of the legislature, as apparent on inspection of the statute itself, will prevail, though in opposition to the strict letter." Bishop on Statutory Crimes, p. 82; 30 Miss. 410.

"And in a statute the meaning of a word may be this or that, according to the subject-context, and other particular circumstances." 94 Bush. Ibid.

"We should, if possible, so construe a statute that its several provisions will harmonize with the general intent; that every word will have a meaning, leaving no useless words. * * * * That it be not eluded or its purpose defeated." P. 82, Ibid.

Applying these plain rules to the section in question, there seems to be little difficulty in determining the meaning of the statute, and the intention of the legislature.

The offence described in the section is the giving money, goods, etc., to the state officer to influence his vote, opinion, judgment or decision. Now, it is claimed, in support or the motion, that none but the members of the executive department, and the supreme judges are state officers. The term "vote" has a legal meaning. It is plainly and clearly defined. [See Bouvier's Law Dictionary, 14th edition, vol. 2, page 646.] And no one of these officers is entitled to a vote in his official capacity, with the exception of the lieutenant governor, who, as president of the senate, has a casting vote in case of a tie. It would seem strange that the legislature would take such a precaution to prevent him from being bribed, and overlook entirely that large body of officers whose daily duties, during the entire session, are to vote on questions of the highest importance to the people of the state, and to individuals. Whether or not there may be ambiguity or doubt as to the meaning of the phrase, or whatever may be its meaning in other places, I am compelled to conclude that in this section the legislature must be held to have used it in the sense which would include their own members, and did not, in using the first word which occurred to them in describing the action, and in using that as the first word, in regard to which an officer could be bribed, select one that could only apply to the president of the senate.

The motion to quash must be

OVERRULED.

Liability of Trustees for Receiving Payments in Confederate Money.

LUCY M. FERGUSON v. SQUIRE LOWRY et al.

Supreme Court of Alabama, June Term, 1874.

1. Investments by Trustees—Confederate Money—Release—Undue Influence.—The guardian of a female infant, in Alabama, loaned out his ward's estate, and, during the late war, received payment in confederate money, which, becoming worthless, the estate was lost. After the close of the war, his ward, having arrived at the age of twenty-two, was induced, under a strong influence from surrounding friends and from public sentiment, to execute a release discharging the guardian from liability to her on account of his management of the estate. Under the circumstances of the case, a bill to set aside the release and to compel the guardian to account, is sustained; but in the accounting, it is directed that the guardian be charged only with such portion of the estate as could have been saved by due dilligence had he refused to receive payment in confederate money.

——. ——. Duress.—A trustee who has loaned out a trust fund on security, and received payment thereof in confederate money, is liable to account for the loss so happening to the fund, although he was compelled to receive such money under pain of being laid under the suspicion of disloyalty to the confederacy, and under the pressure of an overwhelming public sentiment—a mob spirit—which would have made it dangerous to life and liberty to refuse to receive such money.

Appeal from the Chancery Court of Perry County.

B. F. SAFFOLD, J.—The purpose of the suit is to set aside a release given by a ward to her guardian, and to annul the final settlement of his accounts, and his discharge in the probate courts, based upon the result; and also to settle the guardianship.

The appellee was the guardian of the appellant from 1857, and received about $10,000 of her property, which he loaned to others on security. During the late war he suffered the borrowers to pay the amout due from them respectively, in confederate money, whereby the whole property, with the exception of a doubtful note for about $1,000, was lost. In 1867, his accounts being on file in the probate court for settlement, in obedience to a citation issued at the instance of the ward, he procured from her the release mentioned. On his presentation of it to the court his accounts were entered as settled, and an order was made discharging him from further responsibility. The grounds of relief alleged in the bill of the ward are, gross wrong in the settlement made, want of consideration for the release, and fraud and undue influence in its procurement.

The release is elaborately drawn, and is executed with the solemnity of a deed. If it had been thus prepared by the ward herself, or at her instance, additional potency should perhaps be given to it on that account. But it was written and decided on by the guardian's attorneys in council, and signed by the ward without conference with her attorneys, and with no more consideration than if it had been a simple acquittance. She understood it as a bar to her further demands, and signed it for that purpose. She was twenty-two years old, and was possessed of as much ability, independence and culture, as other young ladies of her age. Her principal relatives near her were her maternal grandmother and aunts. Two of the latter were the wives of her guardian and his surety, Dr. Bates, and the other two were single ladies residing with Dr. Bates. She lived with her step-mother, who had several children, her half brothers and sisters, younger than herself. Her deceased father's relatives resided in Virginia.

When she caused the citation to her guardian to be issued, an estrangement from her mother's kindred ensued. It was caused, no doubt, in some measure by her consciousness that she had done what would be displeasing to them, and in part by the displeasure which it did create. They were opposed to her acting, and some of them characterized it as wrong, and highly injurious to her guardian and his family.

Fully a year intervened between the citation and the release. The issue between her and her guardian, which should suffer the loss of the property, was positive, and was protracted throughout this time. She yielded unconditionally,

The relative situation of the two parties may be thus described. The guardian was a man, capable, shrewd and experienced in business. He was exceedingly loth to have the loss fall upon him. He saw in it the probable destitution of his own family, His wife and her sisters, the aunts of the ward, and their mother, all believed that he was not morally responsible, and should not be held so legally. They were disposed to censure the ward, and did so in manner and bearing, if not in words. A public sentiment sufficiently powerful to be incorporated in the legislation of the state after the war (R. C. §§ 11, 4432), declared in favor of the immunity of all fiduciaries who had in good faith so invested trust funds.

Digitized by Google

The ward was a young lady without experience, ignorant of business beyond shopping expenditures, isolated from her relatives, upon whom she had been accustomed to rely as her trusted friends, and possessed of the sensitiveness to censure and proscription characteristic of woman; she had nothing to sustain her in the assertion of her right but her interest and her opinion. Under these circumstances, she reluctantly made up her mind to abandon her demand for a settlement, and to comply with such terms as her guardian required.

The law, in cases of this sort, is more easily expressed than applied. A guardian, when his trust has expired, must render an account to his ward. If this is done in the court, the judgment is conclusive of the rights of the parties. When done between themselves, the expression of satisfaction given by the ward, whether in the form of a receipt in full, or a release of further demands, is considered to have very much the same effect. Both are impeachable for fraud. The judgment is subject to review for errors of law or fact occurring without fault or neglect on the part of the complainant. The release may be set aside if the mind of the releasor did not assent to its terms without like fault or neglect. The other party may have remedy against it on similar grounds.

The consideration of a release, such as the complainant gave to the defendant is a just and fair accounting for the matters of which he had charge. The best evidence of its validity is its reasonableness. The conscionableness in a contract may be so great as to demonstrate gross imposition or undue influence. When it shocks the conscience, it amounts in itself to conclusive and decisive evidence of fraud. Accompanied with ingredients of a suspicious nature, or peculiar relations between the parties, it furnishes the most vehement presumption of fraud. 1 Story's Eq. Jur., § 246. Great inequality of consideration, attended with influence or management to mislead, such as the strong persuasions of those in whom confidence is placed, authorizes the interposition of equity. Ib. § 251. There is no law contrary to these propositions.

In application of them: The guardian admits that he received the ward's property, and that it has been entirely lost through his acceptance of payment in the confederate currency. He testifies that he was very unwilling to receive such currency, but it was generally taken, and could not be refused without suspicion of disloyalty to the confederacy.

The refusal would have subjected the person making it to the censure and condemnation of the public, and to the risk of personal harm. He is corroborated in this respect by several witnesses, who say that such refusal would have been attended with danger to life, liberty and property. His excuse, then, is that the mob spirit in the country was too dangerous to be resisted. Repeated decisions of this court hold such defence insufficient. Houston v. Deloach, 43 Ala. 364; Powell v. Knighton, Ib. 626; Hall v. Hall, Ib. 488.

The ward having released him, without any consideration whatever, from his total indebtedness to her, pleads that she was unduly influenced to do so. The gross inadequacy or unconscionableness of the bargain is shown. She, since the war, has been subjected to influences exactly similar to those set up by the guardian. That fierce and intolerant public spirit which he could not withstand, was operating to continue in force the law under which he acted when she signed the release. It is idle to say that it did not influence her. Added to this was proscription by her nearest relatives, producing a sense of abandonment. Strong and brave men have not been able to bear these combined influences. How could a sensitive woman do so, no matter what was her age? Whatever her convictions of her right was, it could not stand unsupported and condemned, and charged to her greed or avarice. She was right in her demand. She yielded it for nothing. Her estate was the price she paid for the love of her kindred and the respect of the community. Her guardian pleads social ostracism and personal danger in defence of his waste of her property. She alleges like ground of relief against her release in support of right, and without injury to him. Why should not the release be taken away and his plea be heard before the proper tribunal? She must submit her cause. He might have escaped from his peril by resigning his trust; or, submiting, have sued the debtors after the war, and replied duress to their defence of payment. The government of the United States treats the late war as a rebellion on the part of the seceding states, and the present government of Alabama can do no less. Compliance with insurrectionary laws, or obedience to the mob spirit which sustained such a cause, cannot be admitted as a defence against violated constitutional rights.

The chancellor, in dismissing the bill, was governed much, if not wholly, by the case of Kirby v. Taylor, 6 Johns. ch. 242. There, the guardian delivered to the ward a bundle of papers purporting to contain accounts of his guardianship, and certain deeds, papers and securities for money; and also a release to him individually, which he requested her to sign, alleging that he had faithfully discharged his trust. She, having the fullest confidence in him, without opening the bundle of papers, executed the release, without counsel. The court held the release valid because there was no allegation or proof of fraud, threat, persuasion, concealment or misrepresentation. The answer denied any such procurement, and affirmed that it was given voluntarily and of free will. There were three guardians, and another of them was the acting guardian. It did not appear that this gurdian had had a great deal to do with the property, and consequently that the consideration was inconceiveable. The court seized hold of a reservation in the release to preserve the ward's right against the acting guardian, which would not have been just if the liability of the latter had been in any degree on account of the acts of the released parties. Besides this, it was the surety of the released guardian who was claiming the benefit of the release.

In Evans v. Llewellin, 1 Cox, ch. 332, a deed was set aside as improvidently obtained, because the consideration was inadequate and the grantor was in indigent circumstances, and not apprised of his rights until the time of the transaction. No misrepresentation or actual fraud whatever appeared to have been used. The court said the opposite parties ought not to have permitted the man to make the bargain without going to consult his friends.

In Johnson v. Johnson, 5 Ala. 90, a purchase of a distributee's share of an estate made by the administrator at a grossly inadequate price, when he had rendered no inventory and stated no account, was considered fraudulent. The distributee was considered by the court to have had a sufficient general acquaintance with his father's estate to have put him on enquiry and induced caution, but he was denied relief because he had delayed eleven years.

In the case at bar, the guardian testifies that the account, which he filed in obedience to the citation, does not show when he received the different sums of money, or what amount he received at different times, nor what amount he loaned out, to whom, or where, or what amounts were paid to him in confederate money. If the ward be charged with her attorney's knowledge of this account, it amounts to no more than the general idea of her property, and the manner of its loss, which she had without it.

The chancellor thought that outside influences, operating on the ward, ought not to affect the guardian. This depends on circumstances. But the guardian was a part of all the influences in this case. He had not shown what his liability would have been without credit for the confederate money, nor with it. He claimed that it was nothing. If he did not frown upon his ward, his bearing towards her was reproachful. Her kindred were his also, and it was on this account that they were estranged. This is putting the case more mildly for him perhaps than the evidence justifies. We think the complainant is entitled to the relief prayed for.

In taking the account, consideration ought to be given to the disposition of the valuable funds made by the guardian before he received the confederate money. If this was on sufficient security, and was proper in other respects, what would have been the result if the borrowers had retained them until the close of the war? If due diligence would have availed nothing against them during the war and afterwards, he should be allowed credit for such as were unavoidably lost. He was not an insurer of the property, nor is his liabilities dependent on the simple fact of his receiving confederate money: Houston v. Deloach, 43 Ala. 364.

Digitized by Google

A lapse of time, not sufficient to bar remedy against the sureties for the default of their principal, cannot be deemed a defence to this action. The same influence continued to operate on the ward, at least until her marriage, in December, 1870. The bill was filed in May, 1871.

The decree is reversed and the cause remanded.

REVERSED AND REMANDED.

Railway Taxation.

OZIAS BAILEY v. ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY, et al.

United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Missouri.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge.

1. Under the circumstances, a temporary injunction against the collection of taxes by and under state authority, was granted.

2. Whether the exemption from taxation granted to the Southwest Branch of the Pacific Railroad by section 12 of the act of December 25, 1852, continues in favor of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, quære.

This is a bill by certain stockholders of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company against that company, its directors, and the officers of the counties through which the road runs, to restrain the collection of taxes levied by state authority on the property of the company for the year 1873. The bill, in theory, is like that in Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 331.

The main ground on which an injunction is asked is that the property of the company is, by legislative contract, exempt from taxation for the year 1873.

Baker & Litton, for plaintiff; H. Clay Ewing, attorney-general, and Mr. Clover, for the counties.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—The special ground of relief in this case turns upon the 12th section of the act of the legislature of the state, approved December 25, 1852, by which the Pacific Railroad, and the Southwest branch Railroad, were, for a certain period, exempt from taxation, and upon the question whether the present company, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, is entitled to the benefit of that exemption, as the successor of the Southwest Branch Railroad. The 12th section, above mentioned, provides that "the said southwest branch railroad shall be exempt from taxation until the same shall be completed and in operation, and shall declare a dividend. * * * Provided that if said company shall fail, for a period of two years after said road shall be completed and put in operation, to declare a dividend, then said company shall be no longer exempt from payment of said tax,"

The undenied allegation of the bill is that the company has never declared a dividend, and that the road was not completed until the month of May, 1871.

The exemption, if it exists in favor of the A. and P. Company, would continue until May, 1873. The taxes now in question are taxes for 1873, and the learned counsel for the state have conceded in argument that, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Pacific R. R. Co. v. Maguire (ante, p. 228), holding that this 12th section did constitute an irrepealable legislative contract for the temporary exemption from taxation therein provided for; that the property of the A. and P. R. R. was not taxable for 1873, provided that company is entitled to the benefits of provisions of aforementioned 12th section of the act of December 25, 1852. But the counsel for the state denies that the original exemption remains in force, or that it was granted, or after July 1, 1865, could be granted to the present company, or to the South Pacific Company, its vendor or predecessor, and claims that in this respect the case is like that of Trask v. Maguire (the Iron Mountain case, ante, p. 175), in which the court held, and whose holding was affirmed by the supreme Court, that the original exemption in that case did not survive or continue in favor of the present company, Judge TREAT has written an opinion in which he distinguishes the two cases, and seems to think that the A. and P. R. R. Co. is entitled to the legislative exemption from taxation granted by section 12, before mentioned. A. and P. R. R. Co. v. Cleino, 2 Dillon, C, C. R. 175. As the report of that case shows, I formed and expressed no opinion on this point, and placed my judgment distinctly upon another ground.

On the present argument, three recent opinions of the supreme court were produced—Ex parte South Pacific Railroad Company, in re Laclede County Taxes for 1871; Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company v. Lawrence County, and the same Company v. Barry County—in which that court, in favor of the company above named, set aside the taxes levied by the counties, on the ground that the company was entitled to the legislative exemption in said section twelve. The opinions were brief, but this was the very point involved, and, although it is not discussed, it is, perhaps, fair to presume it was not overlooked.

I have purposely refrained from examining, at this time, the question, whether, in view of the provision of the constitution of 1865 (art, 11, sec. 16), by which the state was prohibited from thereafter exempting private property from taxation, this case can be distinguished from the Iron Mountain case, because I think the question ought to be brought before a full bench and decided upon a more careful consideration than I am at present able to give to it. In view, however, of the judicial decisions mentioned, particularly those of the state supreme courts in favor of the company on the very point here involved, it would seem the wiser course to grant a temporary injunction against the collection of the tax. This is done, however, with the reservation of a right to the defendants to move to dissolve it on the first day of the next term, or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard. It is

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

Party Wall—Use of Common Flue.

PETER DALY v. WM. H. GRIMLEY.

New York Common Pleas, Equity Term, August, 1874.

1. Party Wall—What is.—A wall constructed partly on each adjoining lot, for the common support of the two buildings erected thereon, and so used for over twenty years, is a party wall in the legal sense of the term.

2. ——. Right to Use.—Each adjacent owner has the right to use the wall in the improvement of his own property, but at his own peril so far as injury might resul therefrom.

3. ——. Use of Common Flues.—A flue built in a party wall so as to extend beyond the centre line, is subject to the rightful and proper use of the adjacent owner in the improvement of his own property.

LARREMORE, J.—The wall between the houses, Nos. 326 and 328 Henry street, was constructed partly on each adjoining lot, in the year 1821, for the common support of both buildings, and has been so used for over twenty years. Halsey's testimony. It thus became a party wall in the legal sense of the term. Webster v. Stevens, 5 Duer, 553; Eno v. Del Vecchio, 6 Duer, 17. Each adjacent owner, therefore, had the right to use said wall in the improvement of his own property, but at his own peril, so far as injury might result therefrom to his neighbor. Brooks v. Curtis, 50 N. Y. 644-5. The actual damage sustained by the plaintiff was of so temporary and slight a character that no pecuniary compensation therefore was attempted to be proved on the trial.

The only question to be decided is that which relates to defendant's right to use said party wall for the purpose of making a connection with the flue of the adjoining house. If said flue had been built entirely on plaintiff's own premises (as the witness Baker testified), there could be little doubt as to his right of recovery therein. But the weight of evidence is in favor of the fact that said flue extends beyond the centre line of the party wall, and its back is formed by a single brick on the side towards the defendant's house. See testimony of Palmer, Dickson and Deeves. We have the testimony, then, of three witnesses on the part of the defendant to one on the part of the plaintiff to establish the fact that, by the removal of a single brick on defendant's side of the wall, access to the flue was had. A flue thus consturcted partly through a party wall, is (under the rule laid down in Brooks v. Curtis) subject to the rightful and proper use of an adjacent owner in the improvement of his own property. This right being established, the remedy for its misuses is by an action at law for the damages sustained.

Digitized by Google

Nor can I infer from the evidence that the present use of the wall is dangerous. All the testimony upon this point is based upon a supposition and not a fact. Over twenty years' use of the flue for the purpose above stated raises a strong presumption of its safety. For any apprehended danger therefrom the plaintiff has an adequate and summary remedy by an application to the public authorities.

The learned counsel for the plaintiff asks in this case for the application of the rule, "Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas." The best answer that can be made to such a request is contained in the admirable and elaborate opinion delivered by Chief Justice BRONSON in Radcliff's Executors v. the Mayor, etc., of Brooklyn (4 Comst. 195), as to what a man may do on his own premises.

After a review of the evidence, and the law applicable to the case, I am of the opinion that the defendant is entitled to judgment. —Daily Register.

[From our own correspondent.]

Recollections of Mr. Choate.

BOSTON, August, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I said in a former letter that Mr. Choate was exceedingly fond of the beautiful—that symmetry or adaptation and proportion of parts which please the eye. He retained this fondness to the end. In his last illness he occupied a room from the window of which he could overlook the sea. As he was about to lay down to sleep, he said to his attendant: "If a sloop goes by, let me sleep, but if you see a square-rigged vessel, wake me."

He was a true friend. When the nomination of Mr. David Henshaw was before the senate for confirmation as secretary of the navy, Mr. Choate, who was then a senator, a whig, and a friend of Mr. Henshaw, said to him: "There is nothing against you but the original sin of being a democrat. I think they will reject you; but they will all concede, if not now, yet soon, that you understand your business and have the courage to do it."

Mr. Choate was seldom or never disturbed. He had some female clients who occupied a good deal of time and paid little or nothing. As is not unusual with such, they wanted to talk their case all over and be told about their rights and the chances of their recovery, and especially that he should tell them, candidly, what he thought the prospect was, and when their case would be tried, every time they came, no matter how frequently. These clients annoyed Mr. Bell, the partner of Mr. Choate. He had no patience with such nonsense. He called these clients ghosts. One day, finding Mr. Choate occupied with such as these, after waiting until the last one had gone, I said to him: "Ghosts, I believe, are pretty much alike," "O, no," said he, "they differ in excellence. Some are more holy than others."

He was happy in turning a point that apparently made against him. As the sailors say of a good sailing vessel, he tacked handily. In the year 1848, the case of Wyeth v. Wyeth was tried before the supreme court at Cambridge. Wyeth had brought a libel against his wife for divorce, for adultery with one Hastings, as he alleged, in Philadelphia, and at sundry other times in Cambridge. Mr. Choate was for Mrs. Wyeth. The libellant, also, had able counsel; and the case was stoutly contested. The libellant took the deposition of one Keay, who, among other questions, more or less pertinent, was asked if he saw any, and what acts of intimacy between Hastings and Mrs. Wyeth; and whether Hastings took any, and what liberties with her person? In reply to which, the witness said: Hastings and Mrs. W. seemed mutually fond of each other, but he did not think he could say he ever saw Hastings take any improper liberties with her person. The witness was then asked, if he saw them together in the mowing-field, over the hill toward Fresh Pond, and if so, what was their conduct there? To which the witness answered; "I saw them with other persons; Hastings was at work with us in the field. Mrs. Wyeth lost her garter. Hastings said he would put it on. I saw them down together in the hay, scuffling. Enoch Lewis was there. I saw nothing more at that time. They were eight or ten rods from me." The defendant took the deposition of Hastings, who denied the story so far as respected the garter, but admitted "fooling." Mr. Choate, in summing up, among other things, which he did admirably, ridiculed the suggestion that this story was to be taken as evidence of criminality. "All that is true in or about it," said he, "I conceive to be true. And what does it amount to? Just this, a harmless pastime in the general austerity of hay-making." The libellant failed to prove the charge and the libel was dismissed, with costs for the libelee.

He was a ready discoverer of fallacy, and at the same time had a wonderfully quiet and altogether comical way of exposing it. In speaking to him one day, in the presence of a by-stander, who did not know him so well as I did, about a matter in which we were mutually interested, and which had been presented to the governor for his action, and upon which he had acted favorably and with less than the ordinary delay, I said: I suppose our thanks were due to his excellency for what he had done. Mr. Choate looked at me in his significant way, and asked: "Could he have done less and been honest, or acted less promptly and performed his duty?" This for me. Then, apparently to give the impression that he feared what he had said might impair my veneration, he added "But, then, we must not forget that he is governor for two years." This for the by-stander.

I shall be pardoned if I mention his fondness for tea. Sam Johnson was also fond of it, and drank great quantities of it. He liked it for its stimulating properties. Mr. Choate was fond of it because it produced a pleasant distention of the stomach.

He was familiar with coloquial expressions, and the words and phrases exclusively used in a particular art, handicraft or profession, or used in a particular sense in any such art or profession; and he delighted in tracing such words and phrases through their several histories to the source in which they respectively originated. He was especially familiar with sea phrases; employed them oftenest; and, perhaps, his most common, if not best, illustrations, were from the sea and from ships. Getting "under-weigh," "setting courses and topsails," "manning the yards," "turning out the reefs," "going off free, with studding sails set," "struck by a squall," "parting the main brace," "on her beam ends," "rudder carried away," "topmast sprung," "foremast clear gone," "topsail yard away," "cutting away the masts," "rigging jury masts," "gammoning the bowsprit," "weaving," "heaving sails," "lying off and on," "rounding to," "veering and hauling," "standing and running rigging" "ground tackle," "life-boats" and "yawls," "mast head," "try-sail" and "spanker," "hawse-holes" and "dead-eyes," "lee shore" and "breaker under the lee," "awnings," "binnacles," "compasses" and "calls," "dividers" and "drills," "elbows," "buttocks" and "fenders," "gauges" and "grapnels," "hammocks" and "hydrometers," "palm-irons" and "caulking-irons," "jackscrews" and "jewsharps," "ketches and pitch-kettles," "lanterns" and "log-lines," "marline" and "mallets," "needles" and "oakum," "plugs" and "palins," "rivets" and "log-reels," "gunters-scales" and "holy-stones," "trucks" and tarpaulins," "vices," "windlasses," and "wrenches," "packing-yards" and "pig-zinc,"—all these and hundreds of others, like and unlike, were familiar to him as "household words." But the most remarkable part of it was not that Mr. Choate was familiar with these words and phrases, but that he also knew the exact significance, office and use of that which each such word and phrase denoted, so that if any opponent, to whom he had the reply, made use of one such phrase or expression, and in so doing, made a mistake, Mr. Choate was sure to detect the mistake and make the most of it—always, however, acting upon the rule of the great Montesqueieu, never to render his adversary odious, but only what he said ridiculous; and, therefore, unlike the case of a child handling edge-tools, where blood flows, and pain succeeds and lingers, but rather like the partially-skilled and inconsiderate pyrotechnist, who has neglected the second caution of Cromwell, namely, to keep his powder dry, and exposes himself and his fire-works to a summer shower, and so finds himself drenched, and his display ends in a fizzle, but always with the encouraging assurance that over and beyond the cloud out of which the rain proceeds, the sun ever rolls in his circuit, and on the morrow will shine and glow on the victor and the discomfited, and with equal tenderness.

PELHAM.

[Communicated.]

Law Schools.

DENVER, COLORADO, Aug. 10, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—

In coming in from the mountains, the first St. Louis paper I enquired for was the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, and I find that you have been discussing, of late, the influence of Western law schools in multiplying incompetent lawyers. There are but two in Missouri, one in St. Louis, and one in Columbia. Of the first I cannot speak, although I have a high opinion of its professors and lecturers. But in regard to the law department of the State University, its objects, its aims and its tendency, I feel well advised. It was established for the purpose of elevating, rather than depressing the standard of legal education; to that end the professors work, and they believe their work will not be fruitless.

Digitized by Google

I fully appreciate the evil of admitting every one to the bar without regard to qualification. The consequent tax upon the people is grievous, perhaps the heaviest they have to bear. We see creditors swindled, estates ruined, and crimes go unpunished through the blundering ignorance of judges and legal practitioners. To permit one to make a stove, or build a house, who had not learned the trade, would be a folly patent to all, but almost every one may engage in a business which requires more knowledge, more patient labor, stronger intellectual perceptions and a keener moral sense than any other.

The circuit courts of Missouri are greatly to blame in this regard. I do not believe that, in general, young applicants are subjected to any examination worthy to be called such. I know that some who have been so admitted, have entered our school and find it impossible to master the ordinary studies of the course, and others, who have only passed their junior year, leaving many of the most important subjects untouched, find the door of every court-house open to them. The favor — I should rather say the unkindness thus shown by the circuit courts — renders it more difficult for us to impress upon the student the necessity of full preparation. If every applicant was subjected to an examination as thorough as that given the graduates of our school, the courts would do their whole duty. No one can receive a degree who does not answer correctly the usual proportion of the questions submitted, and they cover the whole curriculum of law-study. And these questions are in writing, to which written answers on the spot are required, and they are not to be drawn or submitted by the faculty, but, so far as we can secure their attendance, by the best representatives of the bar. I presume the examinations at St. Louis are equally thorough.

I do not see how law schools like these can be subject to your criticism. I know that in some of the older and more popular Eastern schools, the instruction is by lectures merely, and the examinations are nominal. If the student has attended the required lecture courses, he receives his degree almost of course. A statute admitting to practice all whose degree is thus acquired, must, necessarily, however learned and able the lecturers, cover many who understand or remember but little of what they have had an opportunity to hear. But it is different, where the student is compelled to master the best text books, and where he is subjected to a daily, and to a final and thorough examination upon their contents. If only those were admitted who have carefully passed such a similar examination, the evil would be at least greatly lessened.

P. B.

REMARKS.—The above is from the pen of Hon. PHILEMON BLISS, dean of the law faculty of the University of Missouri, and formerly one of the justices of the supreme court of this state. In most of his views we cordially concur. We fully believe that the law school with which he is connected, notwithstanding the shortness of its course of instruction, which in the aggregate equals but one year, is exerting a healthy and favorable influence upon the bar of Missouri. We know this to be the fact with reference to the law school at St. Louis. As we have said before, the burden of our criticism is not upon law schools as such, but upon what we consider a fault in many of them, a period of instruction too short to acquaint the average student even with the essential rudiments of the law. So far as our local interests in the bar of Missouri prompts us to speak, we should be glad to see the course of instruction in its two law schools extended to three years, or else their annual terms lengthened to nine months. We are utterly unable to understand how it can he expected that a young man can become fitted, by a course of study whose aggregate duration is but one year, either to advise clients on questions of legal right, or to pursue for them in the courts, with safety and good judgment, their appropriate remedies. In this connection we are glad to note that the Boston University School of Law, lately established, has wisely followed the example of Cambridge, and fixed its course of graduation at three years.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Daily Register, for August 11, contains an article by William Struss, of the New York bar, on the "Potter" Wisconsin railroad law.

The Daily Register frequently publishes good cases, decisions of the Supreme Court of New York, in General Term, and of the local courts of New York city, but it generally publishes them without a syllabus. This detracts greatly from their usefulness.

The Albany Law Journal, for August 15, has a leader on Insanity; reprints with comments, Dr. Hammond's communication in this journal (ante. p. 390); reprints from the New York Tribune an extremely interesting article on the Revised United States Code; contains a digest of recent English decisions, and also a digest of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, from the advanced sheets of 18 Wallace; prints a short article by C. H. T., on Fraudulent Statements as to Value, and reprints, from the Legal Intelligencer, the case of Glendon Iron Co. v. Uhler, holding and applying the doctrine that the name of a town or city cannot be used as a trade-mark.

The Albany Law Journal, for August 8 (received too late to notice last week) contains an interesting paper by John Proffatt, Esq., on The Liability of a Married Woman on Contract; another by the editor, on "Secundum Allegata et Probata;" another by John F. Baker, on The Province of Oratory, who lays it down as almost certain that a speaker, whether he be before a popular audience or before a jury, who begets a "smoothness" in his plea or speech, will the more thoroughly and completely sway and carry his hearers with him, and thereby achieve conviction and success. It also reprints from this journal of July 30, the case of Jacobs v. Chicago and St. Paul Railway Company, and besides contains its usual amount of interesting and instructive matter, consisting of notes and abstracts of recent decisions, etc.

The Legal Gazette, for August 7 (received too late to notice last week), publishes the following decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, at its last term. 1. Westray v. United States, holding that notice of a government collector's liquidation of duties upon imported goods at the time of the withdrawal entry, need not be given to the importer; and that the obligor of a warehouse bond can only be relieved from the forfeiture thereof by the payment of all the duties, to secure which he gave the bond. 2. Nunz v. Dautel, holding that, where a due-bill stipulated that it was to be paid "as soon as the crop can be sold, or the money raised from any other source," the reasonable time to be allowed for its payment was to be determined by the court.

It also publishes The People v. Chicago and Alton R. R. Co., published in this journal for July 9 (ante, p. 340). Also the case of The Bondholders v. The Railroad Commissioners, "Potter" Wisconsin railroad law, published in this journal for July 16 (ante, p. 348), also Udderzook's case, published in this journal, same number (ante, p. 352), also notes of cases, statutes, etc.

The Chicago Legal News, for August 15, publishes Simpson v. Greeley, in which the Supreme Court of the United States discuss the question of the joiner of parties in suing out writs of error. The following points are ruled:

1. Where the interest is joint, and no severance has been effected in the judgment, either by subsequent summons and severance, or by some proceedings of an equivalent character, all the parties united in interest must join in suing out the writ.

2. That, where some of the parties in interest refuse to join in the writ of error or appeal, the others are entitled to resort to the process and proceeding of summons and severance, to enable them effectually to remove the case from the subordinate into the appellate court.

3. In cases where only one of several defendants are affected by the judgment or decree, the party whose interest only is affected may carry up the case without joining the others in the appeal or writ of error.

It also publishes Garratt v. Seibert, in which the same court held that if the subject of a patent is a combination of several processes, parts or devices, the use of any portion of the combination less than the whole cannot be an infringement.

It also publishes Mayor, etc., of Monroe v. Hoffman, in which the Supreme Court of Louisiana held that, where the right to establish fire-limits is among the municipal powers granted to corporations, the right to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings carries with it, necessarily, the right to remove them when constructed in violation of the prohibition.

It also publishes Toledo, Wabash & Western R. R. Co. v. Frederick, in which the Supreme Court of Illinois consider and apply the familiar doctrine of the liability of railroad companies for injuries to their employees, caused by defective machinery and cars used in operating their roads, and also the question of the measure of damages in such a case—the case being that of an injury to a switchman, through a defective appliance for coupling cars.

It also reprints from the Law Times (London) ex parte Jolliffe, holding that county judge, under the British statute, has no power to punish for a contempt in publishing in a nswspaper an article reflecting upon the judge's conduct.

It also publishes the case of Taylor v. Kearn, assignment of dower under the Illinois statute, and a variety of other interesting matter.

The Forum, for July (Baltimore, Henry Taylor & Co.), contains papers on the following subjects: The Forum and its Chances; The Nature and Effect of a Seal upon a Written Instrument; Foreign Divorces; Colorable Domicile; The Civil Law, Its Consummation and Decline under the Roman Empire; Charles O'Conor. It also contains a portrait of Mr. O'Conor—a lithograph, rather badly executed. We think Mr. O'Conor was deserving of a steel engraving—that or nothing.

Digitized by Google

The Forum also reports the case of Lewis v. Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, Court of Appeals of Maryland, in which it is ruled that, where the plaintiff has been guilty of a plain act of carelessness, which has contributed to an accident, it is the duty of a court, as a matter of law, to say that he cannot recover. The plaintiff in that case, desiring to cross a street in Baltimore, after dark, the street-lamps being lighted, found a train of railroad cars blockading the crossing, a crowd had collected, waiting for an opportunity to cross, and, while plaintiff was waiting two women had been prevented by the police from creeping under the couplings, but several persons had climbed up the platforms and thus crossed. After waiting about five minutes, plaintiff started to get on the platform, with the intention of crossing in the same manner, when the train started and his leg was crushed between two cars. Held, that such an act was contributory negligence, and he could not recover. The fact that the railroad company was negligent in thus blockading a street crossing, contrary to the city ordinances, did not relieve plaintiff from the duty to use ordinary care to avoid danger.

The remaining matters in this number of the Forum consists of Decisions in the United States in May, June and July, 1874; Abstracts of the English Reports for April and May, 1874; Red Tape; Book Notices, and The Green Bag. If the editor of the Forum would arrange his digest of recent decisions by topics instead of by states, and prefix each subdivision with the appropriate title, it would facilitate reference and add greatly to its value. We recognize many of these abstracts of decisions as being taken from current legal periodicals, where they are published in full. The editor of the Forum would greatly enhance the value of such by quoting the periodical from which they are taken, since, in many instances, his readers will want to see the case in full. Besides, this would enable him to give the credit usual among journals in such cases.

The Legal Intelligencer, for August 7, contains nothing but reports of cases. We note the following:

In Cochran v. Gowan, the Supreme Court at nisi prius, held that an attachment will not be issued against a plaintiff in equity, who has failed in his suit, for his neglect to pay the costs of the suit.

In Glendon Iron Co. v. Uhlen, the same court affirm the familiar doctrine that the name of an incorporated town cannot be appropriated as a trade mark by one or two persons, who are engaged in carrying on the same business therein. See the following authorities:

High on Injunctions, sec. 673; Bispham's Eq. 411; Woolf v. Goulard, 18 Howard's Prac. Rep. 64; Brooklyn White Lead Co. v. Massey, 25 Barb. 416; Newman v. Alvord, 49 Barb. 588; Candel v. Deere, Supreme Court of Illinois, 10 Am. Law Reg., 3 N. S. 694; Del. and Hudson Canal Co. v. Clark, 13 Wallace, 311. And the court hold that this is so although the person claiming the trade-mark made use of it before the incorporation of the town.

In Northampton County v. Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad Company, the same court hold that the Pennsylvania act of 1873, repealing all laws exempting real estate from taxation, does not apply to land necessary to the franchise of a railroad corporation; that the object of the statute was simply to repeal the numerous special laws which had been enacted, exempting particular parcels of real estate from taxation.

In Foster's appeal, the same court hold that where a deceased partner's interest in land is bought by the surviving partner, and conveyed to him by decree of court under the act of 1853, the proceeds are to be distributed as real estate and not as personality. The widow takes the income only.

The other decisions, except such as will be found in our notes of cases, are only of local intesest.

The Chicago Legal News, for August 8 (received too late to notice last week), reprints from the Albany Law Journal, Heine v. Levee Commissioners, Supreme Court of the United States—subject, Louisiana Levee Bonds.

It also publishes Dubuque & Sioux City R. R. Co. v. Richmond. where the same court hold that, a contract with a railroad company to erect an elevator, and receive and discharge at certain prices all grain brought by the company's cars, is not repugnant to the commercial power of Congress, and will be enforced by the courts; and that the power to regulate commerce among the several states was vested in Congress in order to secure equality and freedom in commercial intercourse, against the discriminating state legislation; that it was never intended the power should be so excercised as to interfere with private contracts, not designed at the time they were made to create impediments to such intercourse.

It also publishes re Burnett, in which Mr. District Judge Blodgett holds, that a chattle mortgage, made by a resident of Chicago, may be acknowledgd before any justice of the peace of that city—a position in which the editor of the Legal News does not concur. Also Hopkins v. Snedacker, in which the Supreme Court of Illinois affim a decree refusing to rescind a contract for the exchange of lands, the ground on which relief was prayed being fraudulent representations. Also Friebroth v. Mann, same court—a case under the mechanic's lien law of Illinois.

The Legal News also prints the case of the Northwestern Distilling Co. v. Brant, where the same court discusses the interesting question, under what circumstances an instrument executed by the president of a corporation will bind. The corporation, the action was covenant brought by Brant against the N. W. Distilling Co. to recover for not restoring premises, etc., according to the terms of a written lease. In the lease, Edward F. Lawrence, president of the Northwestern Distilling Company, is stated to be "party of the second part," and the pronouns he his or him are everywhere used in referring to the party of the second part. The covenant to restore the premises in good condition, for the breach of which the action is brought, is: "And the said party of the second part further covenants with the said party of the first part, that at the expiration of the term he will yield up, etc., in as good condition as when the same were entered upon by the said party of the second part." It is signed "Northwestern Distilling Co. [SEAL.] By EDWARD LAWRENCE, President:" Held, that it might be shown by the declaration and proof that the company intended to make the covenant, and that the action was well brought against the Northwestern Distilling Company.

The Legal News also publishes The People ex rel. Graff v. The Institution of Protestant Deaconesses, a case of some interest to religious and charitable societies. The title of the act incorporating the society, was "An act to incorporate the Institution of Protestant Deaconesses, and to provide for the management and control of an hospital in Chicago." Held, that the corporation has no right to maintain, as a corporation, an orphan asylum at Jacksonville, and that the exercises of the right and franchises of a corporation at Jacksonville is an usurpation.

It also publishes Strasburger v. Burk, City Court of Baltimore, of which the syllabus is as follows: "That, under the Maryland statute, a person could not recover for beer or refreshments furnished to voters at a regular election, under contract with a candidate. Held, That the same principles of public policy which apply to elections ordained by law, must, for the same reasons, be applicable to the primary elections, and that a person who, under a contract with a candidate, furnishes liquors and cigars to voters at a primary election, in order to influence them in favor of such candidate, cannot recover on such contract to furnish such refreshments, as the contract is against public policy and void."

It also publishes notes of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Illinois, and of the Supreme Court of the United States, and other interesting matter.

Notes and Queries.

OTTUMWA, IOWA, August 7, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—The liquor law of this state provides that no person shall sell, without license, any intoxicating liquors in the sate, and should he do so, he is guilty of a misdemeanor, and is liable to be fined and imprisoned. The same law further provides that no action shall be maintained for the recovery or possession of any intoxicating liquors, or the value thereof, except in cases where persons owning or possessing such liquors, with lawful intent, may be illegally deprived of them.

A., who held intoxicating liquors in this state, with intent to sell the same in violation of the law, makes a sale of such liquors to B., without license. This sale is made on credit to B., who knows A. is not authorized to sell.

Within less than four months of this sale, A. is declared a bankrupt, and an assignee is appointed.

What interest has the assignee in these liquors, thus illegally sold?

If B. has disposed of the liquors, can the assignee recover the value from B.? As between the assignee representing creditors of A. and B., what interest has the latter in the liquors, growing out of the illegal sale, from A. to him?

Is is not claimed the sale was made in violation, especially, of any section of the bankrupt law.

Your opinion on the questions here suggested, together with a reference to any authorities you may be able to cite, will oblige a subscriber. IOWA.

ANSWER.—The assignee in bankruptcy represents the interest both of the bankrupt and his general creditors. So far as he represents the bankrupt, he has no more interest in the liquors than the bankrupt had, or could have had, if the bankruptcy had not taken place, and as the representative of creditors, who had no specific lien, or indeed, any lien at all upon the liquors, it would seem that the rights of the assignee in bankruptcy, in the case supposed, were the same, p ecisely as the rights of the bankrupt would have been if bankruptcy had not supervened. It results that if the bankrupt had no interest in the liquors which he had illegally sold, which could be asserted by an action of law, his assignee in bankruptcy would be in the like predicament. And so if the bankrupt could not have received the value of liquors illegally sold by him, his assignee would be in like manner disentitled to do so. If these views are correct, they dispose of the questions propounded by our respected corresspondent, so far as they arise out of, or are complicated by the bankruptcy proceedings.

Digitized by Google

We are not aware of any adjudications on the exact point. Some light is thrown upon the general subject by the discussions in Davis v. State, 17 Iowa, 250; State v. May, 20 Iowa, 305; Sommer v. Cate, 22 Iowa, 385; Carlin v. Heller, 34 Iowa, 256; Cooley v. Davis, lb. with which our correspondent is familiar.

Our impression, formed, however, without much reflection or examintion, is that, upon the case as stated, the legal rights of the assignee are not such as would enable this officer to promise more than the usual dividends.

ST. LOUIS, MO., July 29, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—"A subpœna, issued by a justice of the peace, shall be valid to compel the attendance, in a justice's court, of a witness being in the same county where the cause is to be tried; or, being in an adjoining county, and within twenty miles of the place of trial." Wag. St. p. 827, § 1.

Depositions, it would seem, can be used as evidence, on the ground of distance of witness from place of trial, only "if he reside at a greater distance than forty miles from the place of trial." Wag. St., p. 528, § 28.

Suppose plaintiff's witness to live in an adjoining county, more than twenty, but less than forty miles from the place of trial, must plaintiff institute suit in the circuit court? Suppose such witnesses are defendants; can judgment go against him, in their absence before the justice, and his only remedy an appeal?

F. W.

ANSWER:—The man who drew the statute certainly deserves a leather medal. If the plaintiff's witnesses live in an adjoining county, more than twenty miles from the place of trial, the plaintiff should cast about and see if there is not some justice in the county within twenty miles of the witnesses, or forty miles away from them, before whom he can bring his suit. If he can find uo such justice, then, if his demand is large enough, he should sue in the circuit court. If his demand is not large enough to bring it within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, he should sue before some justice, suffer judgment to go against him and appeal to the circuit court. If the witnesses are those of the defendant, he should obtain a change of venue to some other justice of the county, whose office is within less than twenty or more than forty miles from the witnesses. If this could not be done, he likewise should suffer judgment to go against him and appeal to the circuit court. In either case, the plaintiff or defendant could make the statutory affidavit required in order to take an appeal, namely, that the appeal is not for vexation or delay, but for justice.

In answer to several letters of enquiry, we will state that the Vanderbilt University is located at Nashville, Tennessee.

TO W.—We do not publish and answer your enquiry as to liability for "seed corn," because, 1st: We cannot give attention to anonymous communications, and 2d., while as stated, we think there is a liability, this might be affected by the exact character of the letter and what your servant said, neither of which are stated.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE publishers of Wallace's Reports announce that volume 18 will appear by the end of August.

—LORD JERVISWOODE has resigned his position as judge of the Scotch Court of Session, and Mr. Miller, the solicitor-general, has been appointed to the vacancy.

—MR. WILLIAM H. CLIFFORD of the Portland bar, son of Mr. Justice Clifford of the supreme court of the United States, has declined the nomination of the democrats for Congress, in the first Maine district, on account of professional duties.

—THE acting attorney-general of the United States has decided that personal property of individuals, situated in national cemeteries, cannot be levied on by attachment from the state courts, unless the state, in ceding to the United States the land used for the national cemetery, reserved to itself such jurisdiction. The property in question belonged to a government contractor.

—APROPO of the question of admissions to the bar and elevating the standard of the legal profession, we see that the board of health of New York propose taking steps for the suppression of irregular practitioners and quncks, under a recent statute of that state. It is a good move.

—THE last time I met Joaquin Miller, the American poet, says the London correspondent of a contemporary, he spoke of himself as "judge" Miller. I expressed my delight and surprise. I had been unaware of his judicial dignities. Indeeed, I did not even suspect that he knew any law. Upon my expressing my surprise, he replied camly—"Yes, sir, for four years I administered law in Oregon—with the help of one law book and two six-shooters."

—THE discussion in the great Wisconsin railroad case was continued last week, the principal difficulty in the minds of the court being as to their jurisdiction—whether they had power to issue the injunction prayed for. The judges evidently inclined to the opinion that they had no such jurisdiction. Their decision will be given on Wednesday next.

—AT Maidstone (English Assizes July 22) in Tredwall v. Flack, an action for breach of promise of marriage, Bramwell B., in summing up to the jury said: He thought this was a class of actions really almost in one sense dishonest, for if the parties were asked, when the engagement began, whether they intended that it should be enforced by law, they would say "Oh, dear, no, certainly not;" and yet, when it was broken, the wounded party went to law for damages. Moreover, he thought they were a very mischievous class of actions, and that he was very much against large damages in such cases, unless there were some very peculiar circumstances in the case, for surely if either of the parties found that there was not so much affection as was supposed, it was better that the eugagement should be put a stop to.

—THE great Wisconsin railroad case, being an application for an injunction on the information of the attorney-general of Wisconsin to compel the Chicago and North Western Railroad to conform to the Potter law, has been argued at length, and by eminent counsel on both sides, before the supreme court of that state. The singular spectacle was presented of two distinguished jurists, lately retired from the bench, arguing this cause against each other; on the one side, for the state of Wisconsin, ex-chief justice Dixon, lately of the supreme bench of that state; and on the other side, for the railroad company, ex-chief justice Lawrence, who, but a little more than a year ago, delivered the judgment of the supreme court of Illinois in the celebrated Chicago and Alton Railroad case. We can well believe that these distinguished jurists find such great contests as this more lucrative and more engaging than the hard work, poor pay and no thanks of their late judicial positions.

—IT appears from the Charleston News and Courier that during the month ending July 22 last, Governor Moses of South Carolina granted 421 pardons, without counting some twenty five or thirty criminals turned loose one day in a abtch. The News and Courier particularize by giving the following statement of the 421 pardons, which it says was obtained from the secretary of state: Murder, 21; Manslaughter, 25; Rape, 16; Infanticide, 5; Burglary, 33; Forgery, 4; Arson, 24; Highway robbery, 3; Perjury, 4; Larceny, 110; Bigamy, 6; Assault and battery, 107; Horse and mule stealing, 6; Libel, 1; Kidnapping, 1; Abduction, 1; Trespass, 4; Miscellaneous, 38; Official misconduct and malfeasance in office, 12; Total 421. The twelve persons convicted of official misconduct are described by name and offense. Eight of them are county treasurers or county commissioners, and sentenced for three to thirteen months in the penitentiary; one however, was sentenced to nine years, and one to ten. This presents a record of corruption and infamy unprecedented in the annals of our country.

—RIGHT Honorable Abraham Brewster, ex-Lord Chancellor of Ireland, died on the 26th of July, at his residence in Dublin. He was born in 1796, and was consequently 78 years old at his death. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, in 1812, and took his degree in 1817. His college career was not brilliant. He was called to the bar in 1819. Although his reputation throughout his long career was that of a hard-working lawyer, he was seventeen years in the practice of his profession before he was called to the Inner Bar. He received silk in 1835, while Lord Plunkett was lord chancellor. In 1842, during the attorney-generalship of the late lord chancellor Blackburne, he was appointed Castle Adviser under Lord De Grey's administration. In 1846 he was elected a Bencher of the King's Inn, and in the same year was appointed solicitor-general for Ireland, during the vice-royalty of the late Earl of Bessborough, who died in the government in 1847. Ou the return of the conservatives to power in 1853, Mr. Brewster was appointed attorney-general for Ireland, and sworn member of the Privy Council. He continued attorney-general until the dissolution of Lord Aberdeen's government in 1855, when, although solicited by Lord Palmerston to continue in office, Mr. Brewster thought fidelity to the Peel party necessitated his refusal, and he accordingly returned to his profession. He was succeeded in the official position by the present Judge Keogh, who had acted as solicitor-general under him. In 1866, when the party were again in occupation of the Treasury Benches, Mr. Brewster (thirty-one years after he had received silk), was appointed lord justice of appeal, in succession to the late Right Honorable Francis Blackburne, who, for the second time had been elevated to the lord chancellorship of Ireland. Again in 1867, on the retirement of Mr. Blackburne from the chancellorship, Mr. Brewster succeeded to the judicial honors, representing that his promotion should not have proceeded from their political friends. Those who have been contemporaries of Mr. Brewster can speak of the strength and power of his handling of cases at either side of the Hall of English Courts.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor. }
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor. }

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 27, 1874.

{SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

U. S. SUPREME COURT DECISIONS.—We are glad to learn that the first volume of Mr. Justice MILLER's continuation of Curtis' Decisions is now in the hands of the printer and will soon be forthcoming. The profession will expect this desirable work to be brought down to date, and not to end with Wallace.

THE BANKRUPT ACT—JUDGE HOPKINS' DECISION IN HAMLIN V. PETTIBONE.—The criticism which we elsewhere print upon a point in Mr. District Juge HOPKINS' recent decision in Hamlin v. Pettibone (ante, p. 404), is from the pen of Asa Iglehart, Esq., of Evansville, Indiana. We express no opinion on the point (perhaps only a dictum) as to which he differs from the learned judge, but recommend the perusal, both of the opinion and of his criticism, to our readers. We suppose that discussion of this kind, conceived in the proper spirit, and conducted with judgment and discrimination, is always in order, and that there is no judge so able, nor yet any court so high, that may not, at times, be benefited by it. We shall be glad to hear from this writer again on other questions.

THE OSAGE CEDED LAND IN KANSAS.—We publish in this number the opinion of the United States Circuit Court for Kansas, delivered by Mr. Justice MILLER, and in which the circuit judge concurs, respecting the title to the Osage lands. The tract in controversy is 50 by 30 miles in extent, and the lands claimed by the railroads under their grants aggregated 960,000 acres, upon which between 30,000 and 40,000 settlers have their homes, and whose rights were involved in the litigation. The decision is adverse to the railroad companies and will inure to the benefit of the settlers.

This controversy, in amount one of the largest that ever came before the judicial tribunals for settlement, derives additional interest from the fact that the secretaries of the interior department, at different times, have decided different ways—the last decisions being favorable to the railroad companies. And from these considerations the questions of law involved are highly important, and the lucid exposition and treatment of them by the learned justice will be read with interest by all classes of the profession. The cause was argued at the last June term and taken under advisement, and the decision has just been rendered. It gives us pleasure to lay the opinion before our readers at this early date.

RAILWAY NEGLIGENCE—COUPON TICKETS—INJURIES ON ANOTHER LINE.—The Chicago Railway Review, for August 8, publishes the interesting case of Hartan v. Eastern R. R. Company, Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, November, 1873, which holds that, where two railway companies, by mutual contract operate their road as one continuous line, but each manages and operates its own part thereof, and one of them sells a coupon ticket which will take the passenger over the entire line, and on that portion of the line owned and operated by the other company, the passenger is injured, the company selling the ticket is not liable. At the conclusion of the opinion of the court, WELLS, J., says: "The case differs from that of Hill Manufacturing Company v. Boston and Lowell Railroad Company, 104 Mass. 122, in the evidence both of the contract between the parties and of the joint relations between the connecting roads. And, besides, a carrier of persons stands in somewhat different relations to the subject of the service from the carrier of goods." We have examined this last case with considerable care, and are unable to perceive any substantial difference between the contracts between the connecting roads in the two cases. Nor do we perceive any reason why a different rule should be applied to carriers of passengers in such cases, from that applied to carriers of goods. Will a court of justice gravely lay down a rule of law for the preservation of inanimate merchandise in the hands of common carriers, which it will deny for the preservation of human life? See, also, upon the question of the liability of carriers of goods in such cases, Darling v. Boston, etc., R. R. Co., 11 Allen, 295; Burroughs v. Norwich & W. R. R. Co., 100 Mass. 26; Nutting v. Connecticut River R. R. Co., 1 Gray, 502; Judson v. Western R. R. Co., 4 Allen, 520; Perkins v. Saco & Portsmouth R. R. Co., 47 Maine, 573; Bruntnall v. Saratoga & Whitehall R. R. Co., 32 Vermont, 665; McMillan v. Michigan, Southern and Northern Indiana R. R. Co., 16 Mich. 119; Lamb v. Camden & Amboy R. R. Co., 46 N. Y. 271.

LAW SCHOOLS—ADMISSION TO THE BAR.—The Albany Law Journal, for August 15, reprints Dr. Hammond's letter in this journal of August 6, with the following remarks:

> Mr. Hammond's memory is at fault as to the exemption of law schools in this state from the provisions of the act requiring a term of study being a temporary one. He is also in error in supposing that the discussions to which he alludes mean hostility to the law schools. A well conducted law school is unquestionably a great aid to the student of the law; but it is folly to suppose tha such a school can fit a young man, with no previous study or experience, for the bar, in the space of a year. We believe it to be a positive injury to students, as well as to the profession, for a school to attempt to do anything of the kind. It enables young men to gain admission to the bar before they are fitted for its duties, and by so doing, in many cases helps them to an untimely professional death. But little stress can be put upon the fact that the graduates of the law department of the University of Iowa are examined by a committee appointed by the court. This method is, perhaps, preferable to that of graduation of course, but examinations as usually conducted are but poor tests. The best prerequisite to admission to the bar is a sufficient term of study.

It will be seen that this embodies substantially the views that we have already several times expressed. The opposition is not to law schools, but to too rapid graduation. Or, if it is found impracticable for law schools to lengthen their course of study, then the protest is against admitting their graduates to the bar on the faith of their diplomas, without further examination.

We do not wish to be understood as attempting to lecture the law schools on this subject while passing over in silence the conduct of the courts. We have good reason to believe that the conduct of many of the courts in the West and South with regard to admitting candidates to the bar, has been remiss in the last degree. We are glad to be able to testify that the federal courts at Saint Louis, and the circuit court of Saint Louis county, are conspicuous exceptions to this rule. But the painful fact is forced upon us that, as a general thing, the examination by judges, or by committees of the bar, of candidates for admittance to the bar, is a mere sham. We know of instances where a basket of champagne, or even a bottle of whiskey, has secured a favorable report, and where candidates have been admitted who had never read law a week, and who were even ignorant of the names of the leading elementary writers on the law. This state of things, which we believe is not new, but has existed in many quarters for years, is a scandal and a reproach to the legal profession. It inevitiably enforces upon men of sense, the conclusion that a profession which thus admits Tom, Dick and Harry to its honors, has very ilttle honor, and is unworthy either of the confidence or respect of the public.

Digitized by Google

Some of the Dying Glories of the Common Law.

The district of Columbia is governed by the common law, with very little statutory adulteration. The Washington Law Reporter, for August 11, in an able editorial, exhibits one of the beauties of that "perfection of human reason." One Thomas E. Walker, inflicted a mortal wound upon Michael J. Hillis, in the District of Columbia, but Hillis died at his home at Rosslyn, a place formerly within the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia, but which had been ceded back by Congress to the state of Virginia. The editor of the Law Reporter shows that, had the prisoner been convicted, the judgment must necessarily have been arrested; because, "while there may be some doubt us to whether an indictment for murder would lie, in the states in which the common law prevails, where the offence was partially consummated in different counties, although within the state, there can be no question that, where it was partially comsummated in different sovereign jurisdictions, an indictment would not lie in either." And, in support of this proposition, he cites the following authorities: Chit. Crim. Law, 117–18; 1 East P. C. 361; Bac. Ab. tit. Indictment; Com. v. Linton, 2 Va. Cases, 205; Stoughton v. State, 13 Smedes & M. 255; State v. Carter, 3 Dutch. 499; Orrell's Case, 1 Dev. 139; Riley v. State, 9 Humph, 646. The editor of the Law Reporter adds: "In England, and in most of the states, the failure of justice in this class of cases is prevented by statutory enactment; but the common law, as laid down in the above decisions, is the law of this district to-day." The jury, however, in the case of Walker, resolved the difficulty by acquitting the prisoner.

Another case which strongly illustrates the departing glories of the common law, was that of Pollard v. Lyon, lately determined in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. The action was for slander, and the words imputed were, "I saw her [the plaintiff] in bed with Captain Denty." The jury gave the plaintiff a verdict of $10,000. Now, since fornication is not an indictable offence in the District of Columbia, the court were obliged, in obedience to a firmly-settled rule of the common law, to arrest the judgment. It is but just to the court that we should quote their opinion. It was delivered by Mr. Justice HUMPHREYS. He said:

The motion in arrest of judgment is heard in general term now in the first instance. The words spoken by the defendant and charged in the declaration are "I saw her (the plaintiff) in bed with Captain Denty." It has been settled that at common law, words which if true, would subject the accused to infamous punishment, or to an indictment for a crime involving moral turpitude, are in themselves actionable without averment or proof of special damage. The rule must have been so settled on the ground that as between men, a charge made by one against another could result in no serious injury, as a general rule, unless the charge if true would subject the party of whom the words were spoken to the inconvenience and danger of an indictment in which the public would be arrayed against him. It may be true that a man suffers no real damage from words which, if true, would not and could not be followed by an indictment and punishment. Be the reason what it may, we find the rule and cannot depart from it.

Rude as the generation that established the rule may be thought to have been, it probably did not occur to them that the same rule would come to be applied in a more refined age so as to protect the defamer of a woman's character from responding in damages for the looseness of his tongue. Or it may not have entered the mind that the time would come when men could wantonly assail the reputation of woman's chastity. But we are bound by the stubborn rule of authority, and the remedy is by legislative action.

The words in this case import nothing else, legally or according to the common acceptation of those words, than a modest way of charging illicit intercourse between a man and a woman. The more delicate and covert the charge, the keener the injury. When the defendant said "I looked over the transom light and saw Mrs. Pollard in bed with Captain Denty," who would doubt his meaning?

If the charge was true, defendant could have justified; if untrue, he should be held to answer for the wrong committed. It is to be regretted that the rule in Ohio and Iowa is not the rule of the common law in governing us.

But we are bound by the rule that the charge must be in words which, if true, would subject the accused to an indictment. There is moral turpitude in the charge made; but the plaintiff could not be indicted even if the truth of the charge was established. The act of Maryland of 1749, removed the infliction of corporal punishment for fornication. and the act of 1786 repealed all proceedings for the punishment of fornication. We think that we are forced, however reluctant to do so, by the mandate of authority, to arrest the judgment.

Instances of this kind must convince the just and reflecting mind, notwithstanding all the encomiums which have been lavished upon the common law, what a rude and barbaric system, in many of its features, it really is. And perhaps its inconsistency and incongruity are nowhere more strikingly illustrated than in this very instance. It justly punishes the ravisher of female virtue with death; but against him who falsely imputes to her in public a want of chastity—who falsely accuses her of having voluntarily surrendered that which is dearer than life itself, it awards no punishment and affords no redress. Such maxims seem well adapted to the condition of such a people as the Sandwich Islanders, who are destitute of any due appreciation of female honor, but it is a reproach to the legislative body, wherever they are perpetuated among an enlightened and honorable people. Instances like these tend to convince us that the common law, instead of deserving the encomium of being the "perfection of human reason," deserves rather to be considered such a system of rude justice, combining many just and unjust maxims, as a nation of free islanders, surrounded, and, to some extent, isolated from other nations by a watery wall, have been able to frame for themselves; whose very isolation has led them to despise the systems of other people and to refuse to profit from the study of them, while it has nursed their minds into a bigoted admiration of their own errors and follies.

—FOR the information of a correspondent and others who may not know we would state that the Vanderbilt University, the law school of which is advertised on our outside page, is located at Nashville Tennessee. This institution has been munificently endowed by Commodore Vanderbilt of New York, to the extent, we understand, of three quarters of a million dollars. Its law school opens with a strong faculty, and gives promise of at once having position as the first law school of the south. Among the text-books adopted we notice Bigelow on Estoppel, and Dillon on Municipal Corporations. It is a compliment to these authors.

Digitized by Google

Indian Reservation—Railroad Land Grant—Construction of Land Grant Act to Kansas in Aid of Railways, and of Treaties of the United States with the Osage Indians.

THE UNITED STATES v. THE LEAVENWORTH, LAWRENCE AND GALVESTON RAILROAD COMPANY.

United States Circuit Court, District of Kansas, June Term, 1874.

Before MILLER and DILLON, JJ.

1. Land Patents—Suits by Government to Set Aside.—Where patents for lands have been issued without authority of law, the United States may, in their own name, maintain a bill in equity, in the circuit court, to annul and set aside the patents.

2. Osage Lands—Cancellation of Patents at Suit of Government.—On a construction of the treaty of the United States with the Osage Indians, of June 2, 1825 (7 Stats. at Large, 240), and the subsequent treaty with the same Indians, proclaimed January 21, 1867 (14 lb. 687), and of the act of Congress of March 3, 1863 (12 lb. 772), granting lands to the state of Kansas to aid in the building of railroads: Held, that land which, under the said treaty of 1825, had been set apart and reserved for the said Indian tribe, and which were in their actual use and occupancy, did not pass under the said railroad grant, and that the United States were entitled to have concelled patents which had issued to the railroad company under the erroneous assumption that the lands were embraced in the railroad grant.

This is a bill in equity in the circuit court, filed by the direction of the attorney-general, to set aside patents issued by the executive officers of the United States to the defendant company. The ground of the bill is that the patents were issued without authority of law and are void. The substantial question in the cause is whether the defendant company is entitled to the land patented to it. The claim of the defendant to the land is under the land grant act ofMarch 3, 1863 (12 Stats. at Large, 772), which is in the usual form, and under the treaty of 1865, proclaimed January 21, 1867 (14 Stats. at Large, 687), which it is contended ratified or conferred the right. These acts and treaties, so far as material, are referred to in the opinion of the court.

The lands in controversy are within a tract 30 by 50 miles in exextent, containing about 960,000 acres, and embraced in the counties of Neosho and Labette, and part of the counties of Bourbon, Crawford, Allen, Wilson, and Montgomery,in the state of Kansas, and were part of the reservation occupied by the Osage Indians, who have been in possession of it since 1808, until after the treaty of January 21, 1867, when they removed to their new home in the Indian Territory.

By treaty of June 2, 1825 (7 Stats. at Large, 240), the Osage Indians, by article 1, relinquished to the United States their title to a large quantity of lands. The second article of that treaty then provides that, "within the limits of the country above ceded and relinquished, there shall be reserved to and for the Great and Little Osage Tribe or Nation, aforesaid, so long as they may choose to occupy the same, the following described tract of land." [Here describing the reservation.]

The above tract of country thus reserved to the Osages, facing on the east fifty miles and running back to the western boundary of the tract described in the first article of the above treaty, continued to be the Osage Indian Reservation, and was used and occupied by them as such, and used by the government as provided in the second article of said treaty, until they relinquished their right thereto in 1867. The land in dispute is part and parcel of the reservation described in the second article of the treaty of 1825, and was used and occupied by the Osage Indians and the government until the treaty of 1865 was proclaimed, which took place the 21st of Jan. 1867. This last named treaty is dated the 29th of September, A. D. 1865, and was ratified on the 26th of June, 1866, with the addition of certain amendments thereto advised by the senate, and which amendments were accepted by the Indians on the 26th day of September, 1866, and the said treaty was proclaimed by the President on the 21st of January, 1867. There is an express provision in the seventeenth article of the treaty that it shall not go into operation until proclaimed by the President. 14 Stats. at Large, 687.

The nature of this treaty, and the senate amendment relied on by the defendant, sufficiently appears in the opinion of the court.

On the 10th day of April, 1869, Congress passed an act authorizing bona fide letters upon any of the lands ceded to the United States by the treaty proclaimed January 21, 1867, to purchase the same in limited quantities, within two years, at $1.25 per acre, whether odd or even numbered sections, saving, however, the legal rights of others. 16 Stats. at Large, 55.

Under this joint resolution a large number of settlers went on the land, made the required improvements, proved up their settlements before the local office, paid their money and received their certificates of entry. Three hundred and fourteen thousand, two hundred and twenty-eight acres of this land was entered under this joint resolution, and the settlers thereon, in addition to the fees and expenses of entering the same, paid the government therefor the sum of $454,072 10. Nearly all the rest of these lands have been settled upon; some under the joint resolution, by persons who were not able to make payment within the two years it was in force, and others under the belief that the trust specified in the Osage treaty, that these lands were to be sold on the most advantageous terms for cash, would be carried out by the Government, and that consequently they would be able to purchase their lands for cash when the government executed the trust.

There are between 30,000 and 40,000 of these settlers upon the land in controversy, who are indirectly interested in the result of the present suits.

The entries of the land under the joint resolution have been ordered to be set aside and canceled by the secretary of the interior, on the sole grounds that these railroads had a prior grant of these lands. They have nearly all been canceled, and are being canceled as they are reached in the regular course of business in the land department. The interior department at different times has been divided in opinion whether the railroad grants included the land in question.

Geo. R. Peck, U. S. district attorney, and Wilson Shannon, and McComas & McKeighan, for the United States; S. O. Thatcher, T. C. Sears, and N. T. Stephens, for the defendant.

Mr. Justice MILLER.—This case, with that of the same plaintiffs against the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company, is submitted to the court on the bills, answers, replications, documentary evidence, and agreed statements of facts. The facts are undisputed, and without complication. The questions to be considered are exclusively questions of law.

The bill is filed by the United States, under the direction of the attorney-general, to set aside and annul certain patents for lands, issued to the defendant by the secretary of the interior; on the ground that they were issued without authority of law. The case of the United States v. Stone, 2 Wallace, 525, is conclusive, so far as any authority is necessary, of the right to the relief sought, if this statement be true.

The defendant, a corporation which has built a road through the lands in controversy, and received of the United States the patents which are assailed in the bill, asserts the validity of these patents under an act of Congress of March 3, 1863, and the treaty with the Osage tribe of Indians, proclaimed Jan. 21, 1867.

In addition to the very able oral arguments on both sides at the bar, and the printed arguments of counsel engaged in the present case, there have been filed copies of printed arguments before the secretary of the interior, which show that his action in issuing the patents was not hasty, or wanting in reflection, but was the result of deliberate judgment after hearing counsel. This circumstance is not without embarrassment in the minds of the court now called on to consider the same question. But the constitutional adviser of the government,the attorney-general of the United States, has felt it to be his duty to ask for a cancellation of these patents, and, as the only question raised is upon the proper construction of the act of Congress and the treaty aforementioned, it is eminently a judicical one, which the court cannot avoid, or decline to decide; how high soever may be its respect for the decision of the department of the interior.

Digitized by Google

The act of Congress referred to, fouud in 12 Statutes at Large, p. 772, by its first section, grants to the state of Kansas, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of certain railroads and branches, every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers, for ten sections in width on each side of said road, and each of its branches.

The road, so far as the matter now in issue is concerned, is described in the act as one from the city of Leavenworth, by way of the town of Lawrence and the Ohio City crossing of the Osage river, to the southern line of the state, in the direction of Galveston Bay, in Texas. This description would carry the road through a large body of land, then in the peaceful possession and occupancy of the tribe of Osage Indians, lying within the border of the state of Kansas. By a treaty between the United States and this tribe, made September 29, 1865, before the line of said railroad was located, the tribe ceded to the Uuited States a large body of lands, embracing those in controversy.

The first question, therefore, which presents itself for solution, is whether the grant of lands, as made by Congress in 1863, includes the lands then held by the Osage Indians, by the ordinary tenure by which Indian tribes hold lands in the United States, but afterwards ceded by treaty to the government. I say, by the ordinary tenure by which Indians hold lands, because I do not find anything in the language of the treaty of 1825 with that tribe which changes the nature of their title.

Counsel for defendants have supposed that in considering the effect of the grant under the act of 1863 upon these lands, a material consideration, favorable to their claims, is that the grant is to be construed with reference to the condition of the title of these lands when the line of the road was located and adopted by the company. This argument is based upon what must be conceded to be true, that the particular Congressional subdivisions of alternate sections of odd numbers which are to constitute the specific lands granted by the act, must be determined and can only be determined by the location of the line of the road, by an actual survey, showing its relation to those sections. The counsel have, therefore, argued with much force that the act of Congress is not a grant in presenti, but a grant in futuro, and that as the particular sections granted must await the location of the road to determine where they would fall; therefore, that time, and that location, must govern or be looked to as governing all other considerations bearing upon the extent or limits of the grant.

This proposition, however, is obviously unsound, in view of the general course of the road established by the grant. It must be a road from Leavenworth to the southern boundary of the state, in the direction of Galveston Bay, in which Lawrence and the Ohio City crossing are points and the lands upon which it must operate; or, in other words, the general location and character of the lands which may be taken under the grant, are either definitely laid down in the act, or are to be inferred from considerations existing at the time the act was passed. And this is true, whether in technical language we call it a grant in presenti or a grant in futuro. In point of fact it has some of the characteristics of both classes of grants.

As these lands, though then in possession of the tribe, are in the line of the proposed road, and between Leavenworth and the southern boundary of the state, they are lands within the general descriptive terms of the grant, unless they are excepted out of them by other parts of the act, or by other paramount considerations.

I am of opinion that on both these grounds the act can not be held to include these lands.

1. When the act was passed the lands were, and had been for a very long time, in the peaceful and undisputed possession of the Osages. And though the treaty of 1825 between them and the United States did not so far vary their tenure as to give them a fee simple title, or, indeed, anything but a usufructuary right, it did guaranty to them the exclusive possession and use of these lands "so long as they may choose to occupy the same." This treaty was in full force when the act under which defendant claims was passed, and it is not believed that a tthat time any proposition to relinquish this possession had been made by the tribe, or any effort by the United States to induce them to do so. To hold, then, as argued by the defendants, that whenever they might choose to locate the line of their road through the Indian Territory, the title to the land, with all that full title implies, passed to them by virtue of this act, so far as odd sections for ten sections in width on each side would go, is to hold that Congress had violated this treaty provision, had disregarded the generally conceded rights of Indians in such lands, and had authorized a gross injustice to a feeble and ignorant ward of the government. For if the lands were subject to the grant at all, it must be admitted that no provision whatever is made in the act for the protection of Indian rights, nor even for delay in enforcing the title thus passed to defendants.

When I consider, that in the many grants of this character made by Congress, they have never, unless in this case, intended to include lands which, by treaty, or any other contract, or indeed any other equitable consideration, they should not grant, I can hardly believe that they intended, by the use of general terms necessary to a description of the route of the road, to grant away the lands which by all these considerations they were bound to retain within their own control.

In saying this, I do not consider the question of the power of Congress over lands thus situated. I consider only the question of intent, of the actual will of the legislative body, which they designed to put into the form of a statute. It is this, as in all cases of construction, which must govern; and if it were a question now for the first time presented to my consideration, on these general words of description alone, in the grant, I do not see how I could hold that Congress intended to include these Indian lands.

But the case does not rest on these general words of description alone. This was by no means the first act of Congress donating lands to aid in construction of railroads. Millions of acres had been previously granted for the same purpose, and so many statutes of that kind had been passed, that the language in which the grants were made had become reduced to settled formulæ, and one of these formulæ designed to protect rights previously acquired, as found in every other statute of a similar character, is found in this. It is in the shape of a proviso to the granting section, in the following words:

"That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner, by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatsoever, be, and the same are hereby reserved to the United States from the operation of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the routes of said road and branches through such reserved lands; in which case the right of way only shall be granted, subject to the approval of the president of the United States."

It will be thus seen that from the operation of this act, as of all others of like character, and by the settled policy of the government, there is excepted any and all lands which, by act of Congress, or in any other manner, by competent authority, for any purpose whatsoever, is reserved to the United States.

I cannot adopt the criticism of distinguished counsel, that the exception here provided for is limited to lands set apart and reserved for some special use which the government of the United States may have for them. These acts are all dealing with lands which belong to the United States—lands over which its ownership and dominion are absolute. There is no occasion, therefore, to make of such lands a reservation for the benefit of the United States. But there were many cases in which, while retaining the title, the government, by some of its branches, had set apart, had reserved for special uses of others, and for other uses than those of the government, lands of the United States. Such is the construction placed upon this clause in the cases of Wolcott v. the Des Moines Navigation Company, 5 Wallace, 681, and fully reconsidered and adopted in the more recent case of Williams v. Baker, 17 Wallace, 144. Can it be said, with any show of reason, that the lands under consideration in those cases, which were withdrawn from sale by reason of the disputed claims of the state of Iowa, were reserved to the use of the United States?

Digitized by Google

If, however, this criticism has any just foundation in its application to the general clause of exception found in this and in all other land grants, it connot affect the present grant; for in proceedings for the probable failure of the grantee, from various causes, to obtain all the odd sections on each side of the road within the prescribed limits, by giving other land in place of them, among the causes of such failure are mentioned previous sales, or grants, homestead rights, "or that the same has been reserved by the United States for any purpose whatsoever." Now if the solemn covenant in a treaty made by the United States with a tribe of Indians, that these lands "shall be reserved to and for the Great and Little Osage tribes or nations aforesaid, so long as they may choose to occupy the same," is not a reservation by the United States for another purpose than building railroads, it is difficult to comprehend the use of language or what kind of reservation that clause was meant to cover.

I am, therefore, of opinion that, by the necessary outlook at the condition of this land when the grant was made, and the gross violation of justice and solemn treaty rights in the Osages which a grant so construed necessarily implies, Congress did not intend to include these lands in the grant. And, 2. That in each of the two clauses reserving ands from the operation of the act, they have by apt words expressed theintention that these lands should not be included in the grant.

The treaty with the Osage Indians, of which we have been speaking, contains a clanse which is relied on by defendants as sufficient to remove any doubt which may arise from the foregoing views, and I now come to consider that branch of the subject. By the first section of that treaty as originally negotiated and signed on the 29th day of September, 1865, the Osages sold to the United States that part of their lands which includes the land now in controversy, with others. And in consideration of this grant and sale to the United States, the government agreed to pay the sum of $300,000, to be placed to the credit of the tribe, in the treasury of the United States, and that interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per annum should be paid to the tribes. The lands were to be surveyed and sold for cash as public lands, are surveyed and sold under existing laws. After reimbursing the United States, the cost of survey and sale and the sum of $300,000 above mentioned, the remaining proceeds of sale were to be placed in the treasury to the credit of the civilization fund, to be used under the direction of the secretary of the interior, for the education and civilization of Indian tribes residing within the limits of the United States.

When the treaty was under consideration in the senate, that body made numerous verbal amendments, and among others not merely verbal, they inserted after the word "laws" the words, "including any act granting lands to the state of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads through said lands." To this amendment, made June 26, 1866, the Indians consented. So that this part of the treaty, as finally proclaimed January 21, 1867, reads as follows:

"Said lands shall be surveyed and sold under the direction of the secretary of the interior, on the most advantageous terms for cash, as public lands are surveyed and sold under existing laws including any act granting lands to the state of Kansas in aid of the construction of a railroad through said lands, but no pre-emption claim or homestead settlement shall be recognized." 14 Statutes at Large, 687.

The phrase thus inserted and here italicised, is supposed by the defendant's counsel to have reference to the lands now in controversy, and to have the effect of subjecting them to the railroad grant. The difficulty of determining what is their precise meaning in the connection in which they are employed, is very great. As regards their influence on the decision of the question before us, they may be, or rather must be, considered in one of these lights. 1. As granting by treaty, and by force of their own meaning, lands to aid in the construction of this railroad which had not been so granted before. 2. As placing, by means of a treaty with these Indians, a construction upon the doubtful language of the act of Congress which we have already considered. 3. As a recognition, by competent authority, of the existence of such a grant, which must necessarily be the act aforesaid.

1. The first of these propositions is wholly inadmissible. Conceding the doubtful proposition that it was within the power of the president and senate and this tribe of Indians, without the assent of the house of representatives, to have appropriated these lands to such a purpose, they have expressed no such intention. Whatever the language may or may not mean, it is clear that it was not intended to go beyond existing laws. It did not design to make any new law, or confer any new right.

2. Nor is it easy to believe that the senate of the United States would undertake, in a treaty with Indian tribes, to construe an act of Congress. If they did, they certainly could intend to go no further than to express their own understanding of the meaning of statute, without designing to give to that expression the authority of a legislative construction. Neither the senate alone, nor in conjunction with the president, is authorized to construe acts of Congress so as to bind the legislative and judicial departments of the government.

In saying this it is not intended to deny that any contract in such a treaty, by which rights are conferred on either party to the treaty, based upon a construction of an existing act of Congress, may be valid, and the contract be construed as it was understood by the parties. But in this case, neither the state of Kansas nor the defendant corporation were parties in the treaty, nor was it the purpose of the treaty, as amended, to confer any new right on these or either of them.

Nor do the words inserted, or the language of the treaty as amended, imply any intention to construe the act of Congress granting lands to this road. The act is not recited or referred to, except inferentially. No doubt or question of its construction is raised or decided. If referred to at all, it is, hypothetically, as "any law granting lands to aid in constructing a railroad through said lands." Of course, if there was no such law, this treaty did not undertake to make one.

3. But the force of this phrase in the treaty must rest on the third proposition I have suggested, namely, that it is a recognition of the act we have been considering as a grant of these lands.

I have no hesitation in expressing my belief that the senator, whoever he may have been, that suggested that amendment, had in his mind the act which we have already construed, and that his purpose was to incorporate into the treaty a recognition of the validity of the grant, so that the treaty should not defeat it. There may have been in his mind, there probably was, a doubt of the right of Congress to make such a grant in the face of the treaty of 1825. The treaty now under consideration, originally presented to the Senate, provided for the sale of all these lands, and for the disposition of all the money arising from such sales, in a manner inconsistent with such a grant. With these two treaties staring him in the face, he must have felt the doubt whether the grant, even if by its terms it had included these lands, would be upheld as valid. To remove the argument which might be drawn from this treaty as originally made, it was easy to induce the senate and the Indians to recognize any right which may have been acquired by that act, or any other which was an existing law when the treaty was ratified by the senate. In consenting simply to this, the senate would feel that no wrong was done, because no new right was conferred by or concealed in the amendment, At the same time, as the new words introduced designated no specified statute or law, the attention of the senate was not, probably, directed to this particular statute. But as no other law was then in existence, so far as is shown to us which, by remotest inference, granted lands to aid in constructing a road through these lands, I must believe that the framer of the amendment had this one in his mind.

Digitized by Google

The true intent and meaning of the clause in the mind of the senate, seems to have been this: that, as the treaty directed all these lands to be sold, and made provision for the disposition of all the proceeds, and, as it was suggested that there might be a railroad grant, or grants, which covered some of the lands thus directed to be sold, this provision was inserted to remove or prevent a conflict between the treaty and the statute, if any such existed.

But this provision, intended to prevent the treaty from defeating the statute if such existed, is now relied on to give the statute a construction which we have already said was forbidden by its own terms. Leaving out of the case the want of authority in the treaty-making power to construe statutes for the courts, and the improbability that the senate would attempt in this mode to give a construction to the act of Congress, it is clear that they did not intend to do this. They meant to say that this treaty shall not, by reason of its comprehensive terms in disposing of these lands, destroy existing rights. It recognizes existing laws, and, in the sale ot these lands and disposal of the proceeds, existing laws shall be respected, if any exist, appropriating any part of these lands. But it certainly did not intend to declare what rights existed, or to construe statutes on which rights might depend, or to create rights in that regard which did not exist independent of the treaty.

As I have already expressed my clear conviction, that the act of Congress did not grant any of these lands, but by express language excepted them out of the grant, I cannot give to this ambiguous phrase in the treaty, after conceding to it the meaning most favorable to defendants of which it is susceptible, the effect of creating a grant of these lands where none existed before.

These propositions, in my judgment, dispose of the case. They require that the patents issued by the United States for these lands be set aside, anulled and held for nought, and that the defendants be decreed to have no title in any of the lands in question, and perpetually enjoined from asserting such title.

DILLON, Circuit Judge:—I fully concur in the conclusion reached in the foregoing opinion, and in the reasons advanced to support it.

DECREE ACCORDINGLY.

Land Grant to Aid Railways—Indian Reservation —Treaty with Osage Indians Construed.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. THE MISSOURI, KANSAS AND TEXAS RAILWAY COMPANY.

Circuit Court of the United States, District of Kansas, June Term, 1874.

Before MILLER and DILLON, JJ.

For reasons similar to those in the case of The United States v. The Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company (supra), the lands reserved for the benefit of the Osage Indians did not pass, nnder the land grant of Congress, to the state, to and in the building of railways, approved July 26, 1866.

The facts in the case appear in the case of the same plaintiff against the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company, supra.

George R. Peck, district attorney, Wilson Shannon, and McComas & McKeighan, for the United States; T. C. Sears, for the defendant.

Mr. Justice MILLER.—This case differs from that of the same plaintiff against the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company, in this: that the act of Congress which is the foundation of defendant's claim to the lands in controversy, was passed July 26, 1866.

The significance of this difference in the dates of the grants is found in the assertion of defendants that the lands in question had then been ceded, by the treaty which we have discussed in that case, to the United States.

It is hence argued that, as the United States had then the title to these lands, unincumbered by the Indian right of occupancy, there is no reason to suppose they were not included tn the general granting clause, or that they were reserved within the meaning of the excepting clause.

It will be perceived, by looking at the date of the act of Congress, and the dates of the respective stages of the treaty, that the treaty had passed the senate, but with material amendments, June 26, 1866—one month before the approval of this bill by the president. But it had then to be submitted to the Indians for their action on these amendments. Their approval was given September 21, 1866, two months after the passage of the act of Congress, and the treaty only became valid and operative by the proclamation of the president of January 21, 1867.

There was, therefore, no valid subsisting treaty by which the Indian title to these lands was extinguished when the act of July 26, 1866, became a law.

But if the treaty had been fully ratified at the date of the passage of the act under which defendants claim, that treaty was, itself, as much a reservation of these lands, within the meaning of the excepting proviso, as the treaty of 1825 was in the case we have before considered. It directed a sale of all these lands. It disposed of all the proceeds of the sale, and, by a necessary miplication in appropriatng them to other purposes, they were reserved for those purposes.

The amendment to the treaty which we have considered, as it regards the other case, can have no application to the act of July 26, 1866, because by its express terms it is limited to existing laws. The amendment had been acted on, and passed from the control of the senate, a month before this bill became a law. It was not an existing law when the amendment was proposed and adopted, and the amendment, therefore, had no reference to it.

The argument that the bill and the treaty must both be considered as pending at the same time, and therefore construed with reference to each other, is not, in my judgment, entitled to much weight. If it had been the intention of the senate, in making the treaty, to have consented or contracted that the bill which was then pending, and which might, or might not, become a law granting lands to the state of Kansas, should include these lands, they would certainly have used language that looked to that purpose. Their language has reference only to grants already made to existing laws.

So, if Congress had intended to grant these lands, knowing that a treaty for their cession was then under consideration in the senate, which, by its provisions, appropriated the lands and proceeds of their sale to other purposes, they surely would have used some language to specifically include these lands, or at least to take them out of the excepting clause.

A decree similar to that in the other case must be entered.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—I cc ncur.

DECREE ACCORDINGLY.

[Communicated.]

The Amended Bankrupt Act—Judge Hopkins Construction of the Amendments to the 35th and 39th Sections.

In the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, of the 13th, appears an opinion of Hon. J. C. HOPKINS, of the Western District of Wisconsin (Hamlin Assignee, v. Pettibone, p. 404), in which several points of great interest to the profession are discussed and decided. Four points are argued and decided, the decision of either one of which would have determined the motion presented. Two of the questions decided are interesting and important in the administration of the law as amended. One of them, however, only applies to pending suits. But the other is of paramount importance, and the decision of it is no less than a discussion and determination of the effect of the amending act upon the 35th and 39th sections of the original act and a construction of the same as amended, and to this point I propose to direct attention briefly.

Digitized by Google

The amendments to these sections, which are the subject of discussion in this opinion, consist, substantially, in the making of the validity of the transfers of property, forbidden therein, to depend, under the amended sections, upon the question whether the person receiving such transfer has knowledge that the same is made in fraud of the provisions of the act, instead of making it depend, as under the original sections, upon whether such transferree had reasonable cause to believe that such fraud was intended. In other words, the amendment consists in the substitution of "knowledge" for "reasonable cause to believe." The shortest statement of the result of the reasoning of the learned judge, is about this: Knowledge and notice are convertible terms. Notice is that which puts the party upon enquiry, and this latter is reasonable cause to believe. Hence, reasonable cause to believe is knowledge. If this be the correct construction, then, though there is a change of phraseology in these sections, their meaning remains the same, and the amendment is nugatory. But, notwithstanding the acknowledged ability and learning of Judge HOPKINS, which give his opinion upon these questions great weight, I shall endeavor to show, by reference to a very few simple rules of construction, that he has fallen into error in this case.

One of the elementary maxims of interpretation is, that statutes are to be read according to the natural and obvious import of their language; not so much regarding their propriety of grammar, as their general and popular sense. Sedgwick on Statutory and Constitutional Law, 260; 6 Exch. 328, 333; 20 Wend. 555; 1 Blackstone's Commentaries, 59; Smith's Const. Law, 661, Sec. 513. Taking this as a rule of interpretation, what is meant when it is said that a man knows a fact? The answer is, that he has that actual mental consciousness which with certainty assures him of its actual existence. It is the very highest degree of assurance of the existence of the fact. The word itself expresses the superlative degree of mental cognition, and is not, like notice and other similar words, subject to the classification of actual and constructive. This view is, I think, sustained by all lexicographers, as well as by the universal usage of the best speakers and writers in the language. We say we suspect a thing; we have information which tends to make us believe it, and if followed up would reveal it to us. We do believe it, still it may not be true. But when we say we know it, that is the end of controversy.

This being the popular and obvious meaning of the word used, it is not only within the maxim we have quoted, but within another well known rule: "It is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation." Smith's Const. Law, 627. If I am right in my view of the meaning of the word used, it is very obvious that knowledge is by no means synonymous with notice. Notice has a technical signification, distinct and different from its popular meaning, which is usually called constructive notice, which signifies, not actual cognizance of the given fact, but of such facts as would, upon enquiry and the use of diligence, lead to a knowledge of the given fact. Actual notice of course signifies knowledge, but constructive notice never was used, in any well considered case, as the equivalent of knowledge, nor was the term knowledge ever accurately used to signify constructive notice.

We quote from the opinion. After citing numerous cases to the point, that notice is knowledge, and among others 20 Howard, 343, the opinion proceeds: "In some of these cases notice is used instead of knowledge, but as is said in Goodman v. Simond, 20 How. supra, it is usually in the same sense, and that is one of its appropriate significations." This purports to be language quoted from, or sanctioned by, the case of Goodman v. Simond. But it is very apparent that there is some mistake here. The opinion in that case was delivered by Mr. Justice CLIFFORD, who discusses the rights of a bona fide holder of commercial paper, after quoting with approbation, Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1, in which it is said "that a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument, for a valuable consideration, without notice of facts which impeach its validity, may recover, although, as between the antecedent parties, the transaction may be without any legal validity," he proceeds: "The word notice, as used by the court on the occasion refered to, we think, must be understood in the same sense as knowledge, and indeed that is one of its usual and appropriate significations. This case then proves simply, not that constructive notice nor reasonable cause to believe is knowlege, but on the contrary the very reverse, that actual notice is knowledge, but by a necessary sequence constructive notice is not.

All the authorities cited upon this point by Judge HOPKINS relate to the doctrine of constructive notice, and contain very elaborate and accurate dicussions of its application in courts of equity, to cases of fraud, but not one of them gives the least sanction to the doctrine announced in the opinion, viz: that constructive notice, or reasonable cause to believe, is knowledge.

Suppose, however, that it be conceded for the sake of the argument, that there is such a thing as constructive knowledge as well as constructive notice, then there is room for interpretation, and we must look to the usual mode of ascertaining the legislative intent. Treating knowledge, then, as a technical term susceptible of two interpretations or significations, and calling the one actual and the other constructive, as in the case of notice, what was meant by Congress in the given case, by the use of the term? Was it actual knowledge, or was it reasonable cause to believe; i. e., knowledge of such facts as would put the party on enquiry—constructive notice merely? The intention of Congress must be obvious from several of the well known rules of interpretation founded in reason and common sense. The interpretation is mainly to be determined, as is said, "inside of the statute." But reference should be had to the whole act in the interpretation of any part or clause in which doubt arises, and such a construction should be given as to give effect to every part. Sedgwick, 237, 1 Binn, 601; 7 Cush. 53–89; 2 Mich. 138, Smith's Const. Law, 647, Sec. 502.

Again, where a statute is remedial or amendatory, reference should be had to the previous state of the law, or the statute amended; and the amendment, or the remedial act, should be so construed as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy. 1 Blackstone's Com. 61; Sedgwick, 235. Applying these rules to the question under consideration, we see that the act amended (the act of 1867) provides a system of bankruptcy, stringent and highly penal in its provisions, both as to acts of bankruptcy by the debtor, and preferences to the creditor. This excessive stringency rendered the act odious in the estimation of many of both the debtor and creditor classes, so much so, that for two sessions of Congress, the repeal of the act and the entire abolition of the system were iminent; and as a matter of legislative history, proper to be considered, this would have occurred but for the amendatory act, which is in its whole scope remedial, altering, amending or repealing, almost, if not quite, all, the penal provisions of the original act; requiring a greater number of creditors to join in involuntary petitions; increasing the length of time commercial paper might remain unpaid without constituting an act of bankruptcy; providing for the discharge of the bankrupt upon greatly easier terms; shortening the length of time prior to the filing of the petition within which a preference should be held invalid; and, in the same sections, striking out "reasonable cause to believe," and inserting "knowledge"—substituting a term which is susceptible of an interpretation consonant with the general remedial purpose, making preferences less obnoxious to the law, and more easily sustained as valid, that is, more difficult to impeach.

In this view there can be little hesitancy in determining that Congress meant to use the term knowledge in its primary and popular sense, if indeed, it is susceptible of use in any other. It were about as rational to say that when Congress struck out "four" and inserted "two," and substituted "three" for "six," it still meant "four" and "six," as to say that when it struck out "reasonable cause to believe," and inserted "knowing" and "knew," it still intended the courts to read it "reasonable cause to believe." A remedial act should be so construed as to meet the beneficial end in view, and to prevent a failure of the remedy; and, as a general rule, a remedial statute ought to be construed liberally. Smith's Const. Law, 692, Sec. 547. I need hardly extend this discussion further, for very clearly, upon principle and authority, the learned judge has fallen into error. If the view be correct that Congress intended so to change the law as to require, in order to defeat a preference, that the person receiving it should have had actual knowledge of the fraudulent intent, the rule which Mr. Justice CLIFFORD laid down in Goodman v. Simond, supra, and the rule applied in the interpretation of the term "knowledge," in criminal cases, where its appropriate use is most frequent, will prevail. 1 Bouv. Law Dic. 692. A. I.

The New Pension Laws.

We give below the text of all the pension laws enacted by Congress during the session just ended, with full and complete instructions for obtaining the benefits thereof:

"AN ACT to increase the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have been totally disabled

"Be it enacted, etc., That section four of the act entitled an act to revise, consolidate and amend the laws relating to pensions, and approved March third, eighteen hundred and seventy-three, be so amended that all persons who, while in the military and naval service of the United States, and in the line of duty, shall have been so permanently and totally disabled as to require the regular presence, aid and attendance of another person, by the loss of the sight of both eyes, or by the loss of the sight of one eye, the sight of the other having been previously lost, or by the loss of both hands, or by the loss of both feet, or by any other injury resulting in total and permanent helplessness, shall be entitled to a pension of fifty dollars per month; and this shall be in lieu of a pension of thirty-one dollars and twenty-five cents per month, granted to such person by said section: Provided, That the increase of pension shall not be granted by reason of any of the injuries herein specified, unless the same have resulted in permanent, total helplessness, requiring the regular personal aid and attendance of another person.

Digitized by Google

"SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after the fourth day of June, eighteen hundred and seventy-four.

"Approved June 18, 1874."

Under the provisions of the above act, only those pensioners who require the regular presence of an attendant are entitled to $50 per month. Those who have lost both legs, or a leg and an arm, are evidently not included. Proof of regular attendance will be required, and application must be made on form B. Blanks are furnished free to pensioners on application to the pension bureau. The increase dates from June 4, 1874.

"AN ACT to increase pensions in certain cases.

"Be it enacted, etc., That all persons who are now entitled to pensions under existing laws, and who have lost either an arm at or above the elbow, or a leg at or above the knee, shall be rated in the second class, and shall receive twenty-four dollars per month: Provided, That no artificial limbs or commutation therefor, shall be furnished to such persons as shall be entitled to pensions under this act.

"SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after the fourth day of June, eighteen hundred and seventy-four.

"Approved June 18, 1874."

The above law increases to $24 per month, from June 4, 1874, the pensions of those who have lost an arm at or above the elbow, or leg at or above the knee, without reference to the wearing of an artificial limb. In order to obtain the benefits of this act, pensioners have only to return their certificates, accompanied by a letter giving their post-office address, no formal application being required. No medical examination will be ordered, excepting in cases where the evidence on file fails to show the point of amputation. Pensioners receiving the increase will not be entitled to artificial limbs or commutation provided for by the act of June 17, 1874.

"AN ACT to equalize pensions in certain cases.

"Be it enacted, etc., That all persons entitled to pensions under special acts fixing the rate of such pensions, and now receiving or entitled to receive a less pension than that allowed by the general pension laws under like circumstances, are, in lieu of their present rate of pension, hereby declared to be entitled to the benefits and subject to the limitations of the general pension laws entitled 'An act to revise, consolidate and amend the laws relating to pensions,' approved March third, eighteen hundred and seventy-three; and that this act go into effect from and after its passage; Provided, That this act shall not be construed to reduce any pensions granted by special act.

"Approved June 6, 1874."

Heretofore, pensioners who were on the roll by special act, the act fixing the rate of their pension, were debarred from increase under the general pension laws. The above act places this class of pensioners on the same footing as other pensioners, so far as rating is concerned, but does not grant arrears, the increase dating from June 6, 1874. The return of the pension certificate to the pension bureau, accompanied by a letter giving post-office address, is all that is necessary.—U. S. Pension Record:

Book Notices.

PATTISON'S MISSOURI DIGEST.—A Digest of the Missouri Reports. Volumes 1 to 49, inclusive, beginning with the year 1821, and ending with the year 1872. By EVERETT W. PATTISON, of the Saint Louis bar. 2 vols., pp. 783. Price $15 00. Saint Louis: W. J. Gilbert. 1873. For sale by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth.

One of the most judicious and satisfactory digests of the reports of a state that was ever published was Meigs' Tennessee Digest, published in 1848, and embracing the first twenty-six volumes of the Reports of that state. So complete a picture did it present of what was actually decided in each case, and also of the ratio decidendi, that it came to be of almost equal authority with the Reports themselves. It was constantly quoted in the courts of Tennessee, in lieu of the Reports, and was frequently so quoted by the judges of the supreme court of that state in their opinions. But Mr. Meigs could never be induced to make a supplement to it; and the reason why he could not, may, perhaps, be explained by a remark which he makes in his preface, where he declares that the task which he had endeavored to accomplish was "at once profitless, slavish and inglorious." No juster estimate of the nature of such labor could be conceived. He who expects either to make money or acquire reputation through the labor of digesting the Reports of a state, unless it be an old and very populous state like New York, is pursuing a vain and foolish undertaking. He will discover in such a task little else than the most slavish toil; and the manner in which it must be proceeded with necessarily drives him, during most of the time he is engaged in it, from one title to another; so that he is even deprived of the satisfaction which the mind takes in pursuing to the end the continuous investigation of a single topic. If he works by topics, he is sure to make many omissions. To avoid this, he is obliged to go through each volume of Reports, and digest each case as it comes, and as he proceeds, distribute his notes in the proper parcel or pigeon-hole. The work of finally arranging, re-reading and squeezing together, if we might use an expression which every digest-maker will understand, completes the principal part of his task.

For five years Mr. Pattison labored most assiduously with all the time he could spare from his professional duties, in the preparation of the work now before us. Although we understand that he gets the usual copyright paid to authors of books of this kind—perhaps something more, yet, from our knowledge of such matters, we do not believe that he has, as yet, received a thousand dollars as compensation for this exhaustive toil; nor do we believe that his remuneration will ever exceed a dollar a day for the time actually spent upon this work. And yet we are convinced, both from our own examination and use of it, and from the general professional estimate of its value, that is one of the best works of the kind that has been published. Nevertheless, we have heard attorneys, far advanced in their profession, complain of the price at which it is sold — men who would charge a client fifty dollars for doing an amount of work no greater than can be found on any one of its pages.

There is among bookmakers, critics, and the profession generally, considerable difference of view as to how a digest of reports should be made. Some think that it should consist of succinct statements, in the abstract, of points decided, and nothing more. Others would add to such a statement the reason or reasons which influenced the court in so deciding. Others strenuously urge that in digesting cases, the facts of the case ought to be briefly stated, and then the ruling or judgment of the court thereon, and nothing more. Others, again, prefer this mode of abstracting cases, but would add to it the ratio decidendi. We are of opinion that the latter would be, if practical, decidedly the preferable way. But, in order to make a digest in this mode, the author must have far more time than is usually allotted to such a task, the publisher must be content to face the probabilities of a heavy loss, and the profession must expect a work three times as large, and costing three times as much, as would be the case if the first method above indicated were pursued. We like very much the views of Mr. Bishop (First Book of the Law, ch. 14), upon the question how a digest should be made. After giving his view of the manner in which the points decided should be expressed, he says, § 211: "when a judge announces a principle of special importance with special clearness, the digest should state it in brief form, marking it as a dictum; thus, (D). The extent to which this sort of work should proceed must depend upon circumstances; such as the particular object of the digest, and the space which it is deemed justifiable to allot to it. A book, which the profession will not buy, is of no use; therefore, every author, on whatever topic, and whatever the style of his work, has properly some regard for its merchantable quality. It is often necessary to make a smaller book than the subject really demands, for the reason that one fully large enough would not be purchased and used.

When Mr. Pattison commenced his task he saw that it would necessarily include some forty-five or fifty volumes of reports. He therefore felt it necessary, in order to bring it within the proper limits, to adopt the abstract form made in fraud of the provisioning of the act, instead of making it depend, as under the original sections upon whether such transferree had reasonable of stating the points decided, pursued by Mr. Brightly. This plan he appears to have adhered to throughout, using in all cases as much brevity as was consistent with clearness. The result is that his work makes two small, imperial, octavo volumes, which, with the help of interleaving, are swelled to the size of volumes of 600 pages each.

We could easily demonstrate, if we had space, that most of the paragraphs of any digest could be arranged, not incorrectly, under any one of three or more titles. This being the case, it is obvious that the arrangement of the subject-matter of a digest must be, to a great extent, arbitrary; and that the best arrangement will always be attained, when each item is placed under that title and sub-title, where a majority of the profession will be most apt to look for it in the first instance. Mr. Pattison was aware of this; and, accordingly, whenever he was in doubt as to the best arrangement, he consulted largely with the members of the bar, and adopted the arrangement indicated by the views of the greatest number. The result is an arrangement of titles as logical and useful, perhaps, as any that could be devised.

We cannot close our observations upon this excellent work, without referring to what appears to be a feature of great value. Mr. Pattison has devoted seventy one pages of closely printed matter to a table of cases criticised, doubted, explained, affirmed, overruled, etc. This is in addition to the regular table of cases digested, and must have cost great labor and patience in its preparation. In some of the states indexes of cases, not as complete as this, are published and sold in separate volumes at a high price. To give some idea of the manner in which this part of the work has been done, we quote the following:

Digitized by Google

" Wear v. Bryant, 5 Mo. 147; see, also, 4 Mo. 113. Owners of injured land entitled to locate, affirmed: McCamant v. Patterson, 39 Mo. 100. As to who are legal representatives, cited: Hammond v. Public Schools, 8 Mo. 84. Commented on: Kirk v. Green. 10 Mo. 254; see Page v. Hill, 11 Mo. 150. As to relinquishment of claim cited: Joeckel v. Eastman, 11 Mo. 126. As to reversion of lands to United States, cited: Holme v. Stantman, 35 Mo. 306; see Moore v. Moore, 14 Mo. 425; Wright v. Rutgers, Ib. 587. Commented on and disapproved, so far as it holds that parties by subsequent assent to location could claim the benefit of New Madrid certificates, issued by the recorder: Holme v. Stantman, 35 Mo. 309, et seq. That the owner was the person intended to be benefited, approved: McCamant v. Patterson, 39 Mo. 107."

PLEADING AND PRACTICE, under the Codes of Ohio, New York, Kansas and Nebraska, applicable also to other states having a code, with forms. By SIMEON NASH. 4th edition, greatly enlarged, 2 vols. Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co.. 1874. Sold by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth.

This work of Judge Nash, a well known jurist of Ohio, and the author of Nash's Ohio Digest, has been expanded from one volume to two. It sets out the Code of Ohio, and, in immediate connection with each section, the construction it has received by the courts, giving, as the author states, the language of the courts. This edition is full of forms of all kinds of pleadings under the code, and is a useful work of the character.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Pittsburg Legal Journal, for August 19th, contains nothing but selected matter which we have already published or noticed.

The Legal Intelligencer, for August 14, publishes Chambersburg Savings Fund Association v. McLellan, which discusses what is such negligence as will render an assignee liable for the loss accruing to the trust estate thereby.

The Irish Law Times, for August 1, continues its interesting leader on life insurance frauds, and otherwise prints a large amount of matter, but without interest on this side of the Atlantic.

The Pacific Law Reporter, for August 4, publ shes, without a syllabus, Burton v. Hard, Supreme Court of the United States, which discusses several questions of evidence.

It also reprints from the Internal Revenue Record, the case of Boise County v. Gorman, same court, the syllabus of which is given above.

The rest of its space is filled up with notes of cases collected from various sources.

The Irish Law Times, for August 8, contains a leader (No. 1) on Life Insurance Law and Legislation, the subject of which is warranty on the part of the person for whose benefit the policy is taken. We intend to reprint it. It will be good reading for those judges whose decisions have supported life insurance companies in dishonestly wriggling out of their obligations, after pocketing large sums of money in premiums. The other matter contained in this number of the Irish Law Times and Irish Law Times Reports, is for the most part only of a local interest.

The Pacific Law Reporter, for August 11, reprints from the Washington Law Reporter, the case of Pollard v. Lyon, holding that since the act of Maryland, of 1749, removing the infliction of corporal punishment for fornication, and that of 1786 repealing all proceedings against that offence, words spoken of an unmarried woman, imputing to her that act, are not actionable in themselves.

It also publishes without syllabus, several decisions of the Supreme Court of California—among them Pickett v. Hastings—Beneficiaries of the Van Ness Ordinance classified—The phrases "may be recovered," "legal process," defined—Statute of Limitations considered. Also Rewick v. Goldstone Patent Right—Contract. Also People v. Hunckler—Criminal Law—Twice in Jeopardy. The decision in this case is unintelligible for want of facts. It also publishes Forster v. Pico, Mexican Grant.

The Chicago Railway Review, for August 22, contains, in its legal department, abstracts of a number of interesting discussions on railway law, mostly of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.

Also McLellen v. Chambersburg Saving Fund Association, the syllabus of which is as follows: In auditing the third account of a trustee, the auditor examined and re-stated some items which had been contained in or omitted from the former accounts, and thereby established the fact that the former settlements were incorrect. Held, not to be erroneous.

Also the Warren Savings Bank v. Palmer, in which Mr. District Judge McCandless rules that under the amendment to the 39th section of the bankrupt law, the debtor will be required to file a list of his creditors, and the amount of their claims, where an involuntary petition was filed against him since December 1st, 1873, to which he had made a denial and a demand for a jury trial, and had since filed a demurrer.

The Albany Law Journal, for August 22, contains an article on Married Women as Attorneys, which is a gently facetious criticism on the opinion of Mr. Justice Nott of the court of claims, refusing to admit Mrs. Lockwood as a solicitor of that court. It also has an article on Supreme Court Reporting, which appears to be a controversy between the editors of the "Supreme Court Reports," New York, and Mr. Hun, the new "official reporter" of the same court. We sincerely hope that Messrs. Thompson and Cook may succeed in getting the "official" reporter by the heels; for their reports are as good as they can well be made, and as cheap as they can be published without loss, and there seems no good reason why, after the signal failure of one "official" reporter of that court, another should endeavor to occupy the same field, which is well occupied already. We have not seen Mr. Hun's first volume, but we have a strong feeling that he is endeavoring, under the prestige of "official" sanction, to crowd out his betters; and we say to him, that unless he expects to make a better "official" reporter than his predecessor, he had better "step down and out."

The Albany Law Journal contains a large amount of other reading matter—brief, various and well written, or judiciously selected.

The Nashville Commercial, Reporter for August 10, publishes Gheen v. Osborne, Supreme Court of Tennessee, of which the following is the syllabus:

1. If A., the owner of part of a lot, by his representations, or silence, induce B. to believe that C. is the owner of the whole lot, and under this belief B. purchased the whole lot, A. is estopped to set up title to any part of the lot, and upon the application of B., a court of equity will divest A. of the title to his part of the lot.

2. Where a bill is filed for the specific execution of a contract by a purchaser against his immediate vendor, and another alleged to be the owner of a part of the land purchased, and the title-bond is only signed by one of the parties, and the bill does not allege that the other party had sold to the other vendor, or had authorized the other vendor to sell the whole property, a specific execution will not be decreed.

In Wilson v. Eiffler, published in the same journal, the Supreme Court of Tennessee reversed and remanded the cause, directing a decree to be rendered against the defendant. After the case was remanded the defendant pleaded his discharge in bankruptcy granted to him pending the suit, and the court sustained the plea and held that no personal judgment could be rendered against him in the case.

The American Law Times reports, for August, contain Excelsior Insurance Co. v. Royal Insurance Co., Court of Appeals of New York, holding that, a mortgagee who has insured his mortgage-interest for his own indemnity, without any agreement with the mortgagor, may, in case of loss, call upon the insurer without first exhausting his remedy under his mortgage.

It also publishes re Deckert, noticed in this journal (ante, p. 320). Also Walsh v. Barton, from advanced sheets of 24 Ohio State Reportrs—the subject of which was a bill for the specific performance of contracts to convey land.

Also, Commissioners of Boise County v. Gorman, where the Supreme Court of the United States hold that a writ of error does not operate as a supersedeas until the filing of the bond, but that under the act of 1872 the bond may be filed and a supersedeas obtained any time within sixty days after judgment; and that such suspersedeas will have the effect of preventing further proceedings under an execution, but will not affect whatever may have been done prior to its being issued.

Also re Soloman, United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Virginia, in which Chief Justice Waite holds that a statute which permits the head of a family to waive a homestead exemption, is not an infraction of a constitutional provision by which a homestead is created; and that where a part who had, in a negotiable promissory note, waived his right of homestead exemption, and was subsequently adjudged a bankrupt, the homestead was not exempt as against the holder of the note.

Also Warren v. Ives, published in this journal for June 25 (ante, p. 312). Also several other interesting cases.

The Canada Law Journal for August (Milling & Williamson, Toronto), contains the judgments of the Election Court in the North Victoria, Cardwell and North Simcoe cases. Extra copies can be had at $1 each. It also contains some other interesting matter original and selected.

The Chicago Legal News, for August 22, publishes an able opinion of Mr. Justice Scott, of the Supreme Court of Illinois, in Buler v. Huestis, expounding a will executed by a married woman, under a power contained in a trust deed. The words in the will, "heirs of her body," are construed. The court holds that, so far as estates tail are concerned, the rule in Shelly's case is repealed by the state statute. There are several important questions passed upon this opinion. It will repay a careful reading.

Digitized by Google

Also an opinion of the same court (by Walker, Ch. J.,) in Carpenter v. Davis. In this case a husband devised a tract of land to his wife, and died, leaving children. The wife married again and had children by the second husband. He promised his wife, if she would sell the land devised to her by her first husband, that he would purchase other land in her name to be held by her for the children of the first husband. She sold the land and the husband purchased the other land; but instead of taking the deed in her name, as he agreed, he took it in his own name. On a bill filed by the children of the first husband, after the death of the wife, held that by agreement between the husband and wife, the property became a trust fund, and the husband not having pleaded the statute of frauds, equity would declare and enforce the trust; that the husband had no courtesy in the land, as it was held as trust property under the agreement with his wife, and that he was properly chargeable with the rents.

The Legal News also commences in this number the publication of the opinion of the Circuit Court of Cook County, Illinois, by Williams, J., in what is known throughout the country as the Cheney case. The editor of the Legal News says of this case: "It has been in the courts, in one form or another, for the past five years. A full history of the case will be found in the statement that precedes the opinion. Few cases have been so warmly and ably prosecuted and defended as this one. The late Bishop Whitehouse, from a sense of religious and official duty, pressed the prosecution with all the power and energy he possessed. Mr. Judd, chancellor of the diocese, gave the case years of thought and study, and did all that talent, perseverance and experience could do to sustain what he considered the authority of the church. Mr. Fuller defended Dr. Cheney with an ability that would reflect honor upon the most distinguished member of the bar. He seemed always to be equal to the emergency, and when defeated in the controversy, managed so skillfully as to prevent the defeat from working disasterously to the interests of his client. He deserves great credit for the skill and wisdom displayed in this protracted ecclesiastical controversy. Judge Williams has spent much time and labor in the preparation of his opinion."

[Want of space compels us to hold over several of our exchanges, received this week, for notice next week.]

Notes and Queries.

We are glad to have received the following. It seems that the bungle in the Missouri Statute suggested by F. W. (ante p. 422) has been resolved by an act of the last legislature. We hope other subscribers will help each other's difficulties in our column of notes and queries:—

SHELBYVILLE, MO., August 22, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In answer to query in your journal, bearing date of August 20th inst., signed "F. W.," you may reply that if plaintiff's witness lives out of the county where the trial is had, whether one mile from the place of trial or forty, his deposition can be taken and used at the trial. See page 45, "Session Acts" of 1873.

Very respectfully yours,

CHAS. M. KING.

HINTON, W. VA., Aug. 12, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—By virtue of a homestead law, which exempts $1,000 in real estate from sale, can A., who wishes to avail himself of the benefit of such exemption, set apart two houses, one in which he and family resides, and the other a business house which he rents to other parties, though both together are only worth $1,000? There has been no decision on the subject, either in Virginia or West Virginia, as the homestead laws in both states are of recent date. Please answer through the JOURNAL, and oblige

A YOUNG LAWYER.

ANSWER.—If our correspondent had been more careful in stating his question, we should be able to give him a more satisfactory answer. First, he should have set out the statute of West Virginia, which gives the homestead exemption. Secondly, he should have iuformed us whether the dwelling-house and store-house are on the same lot. We advise our correspondent to consult the following cases, where he will find his question repeatedly answered yes and no, under a variety of statues, and with various reasons given for the answer:—Hubbell v. Canady, 58 Ill. 425; Reinbach v. Walter, 27 Ill. 393; Re Tertelling, 2 Dillon C. C. 339; Rhodes v. McCormick, 4 Iowa, 368; Ragland v. Rogers, 34 Tex. 617, 621; Hancock v. Morgan, 17 Tex. 582; Pryor v. Stone, 19 Tex. 371; Moore v. Whitis, 30 Tex. 440; Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 220 (leading case); Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 181; Clark v. Shannon, 1 Nev. 568; Goldman v. Clark, Ib. 607; Hoitt v. Webb, 36 N. H. 158; Buxton v. Dearborn, 46 N. H. 43; True v. Morrill, 28 Vt. 672; Kelly v. Baker, 10 Minn. 56; Kresin v. Mau. 15 Minn. 116.

Legal News and Notes.

—IT is said that ex-Postmaster General Creswell has been retained on behalf of the government, under the Geneva award act, and will represent the interests of the United States in all cases to be considered.

—AT a public meeting recently held at Leeds, it was resolved to petition parliament for the release of Orton the unsuccessful Tichborne claimant, and for a new trial. Mr. Guilford Onslow was one of the speakers.

—THE New York Herald is responsible for the assertion that Judge Mackey of South Carolina, wears a silken gown, and goes to and from court preceded by the sheriff, carrying a drawn sword. The sheriff, we presume, is a colored person, which would make the thing look picturesque.

—THE Chichele professorship of international law at Oxford University, made vacant by the resignation of the Right Hon. Montague Bernard, one of the Washington commissioners, has been conferred on Mr. Thomas Erskine Holland, of Lincoln's Inn, barrister at law, and of All Soul's College, Oxford.

—THE attorney-general of Arkansas has decided that it is the duty of the state treasurer to obey the convention ordinance appropriating the sinking and school fund to pay the expenses of the state government. The treasurer refuses to obey the ordinance until compelled to do so by a mandamus from the court, and a suit is now pending to that effect.

—THE attorney-general has decided that the revised statutes do not change the law as to the toll upon the tonnage of vessels engaged in foreign commerce, and that now, as formerly, the said tax is only collectable upon the entry of such vessels, and not before their clearance, and is only collectable once in each year.

—WE regret to learn that the new constitution for Ohio, recently submitted to the vote of the people of that state, and which embodied so many excellent and needful reforms, has been defeated. The causes of the defeat are said to have been the submitting of four different propositions to a separate vote, which led many of the enemies of these respective propositions to combine for the defeat of the instrument.

—THE commissioner of the general land office has directed that the regulations respecting final proof of homestead settlement in the grasshopper region of Iowa and Minnesota, be so modified as to permit settlers to go before the clerk of their county court to make their depositions, instead of before the local land officers. This order is made on the representation of trustworthy parties that many settlers remote from a local land office, can illy afford the expenses of a long journey, especially in their present impoverished condition.

—WE learn that "the life of Chief Justice Chase," written by Mr. J. W. Shuckers, Mr. Chase's private secretary for ten years, is shortly to appear from the Appleton press. Among the specially interesting portions of the work is a chapter relating to the secret history of the reversion of the legal tender decision, and another giving for the first time various details in the Jefferson Davis case. It will also contain the eulogy of Chief Justice Chase, prononnced by Hon. William M. Evarts, before the Dartmouth Alumni at their last commencement.

—A MASS meeting was held on Saturday night, at Parsons, Kansas, the occasion of which was the promulgation of the news of the decision in the Osage land cases, which we elsewhere print. A press dispatch states that there was great rejoicing. At least five thousand people were assembled to celebrate their deliverance from the railroad companies, and the little city of Parsons was wild with enthusiasm. Speeches were made by Hon. M. W. Reynolds, Mayor Mathewson, Colonel Davis, T. C. Cory and others, and at a late hour the people adjourned, feeling, for the first time, that they could go to their own homes.

—JUDGE BLATCHFORD has decided that the United States district attorney is still entitled to two per cent., and the clerk of the United States District Court to one per cent. on all moneys recovered in custom-house seizure suits in his district. He holds that the law of 1874 abolishing moieties and informers' fees does not cover the allowance of these per centages which are given in lieu of costs and fees that the district attorney and clerk would otherwise be entitled to in the suits mentioned, but which are not allowed by any provisions of law.

—COL. S. S. FISHER, ex-commissioner of patents, and author of Fisher's Patent Cases, was, together with his son, drowned, while passing in a small boat through Conewago rapids, fourteen miles below Harrisburg. He was educated in Philadelphia, and practiced law in Cincinnati before his appointment. In 1871 he resigned, and again entered into the practice of law in that city with great success. By his knowledge of patent law, when commissioner, he did much to improve the administration of business in that office, the patent law of 1870 being mostly of his suggestion. He was also the first to introduce competitive examinations. His son, who was also drowned, was a bright boy of twelve years of age. Colonel Fisher was about 43 years of age. He leaves a wife and two children.

Digitized by Google

—If Comptroller Green of New York City, keeps on, he will acquire the reputation of being a "litigious person." The following are only a portion of the fees paid by him for professional services, during the past month:

Henry L. Clinton, retainer	$1,500
E. L. Paris, professional services	1,336
Lyman Tremain, professional services	12,500
J. C. Carter, professional services	4,000
Martin & Smith, professional services	3,500
James M. Smith, professional services	1,800
William Barnes, retainer	3,100

—THE Irish Law Times publishes the proceedings of the benchers of Gray's Inn, expelling Dr. Kenealy, from which we extract the following: "The following resolutions were moved by Master Manisty, seconded by Master Holker, and carried unanimously: '1st. That the pension find as a fact that Dr. Kenealy is the editor of the newspaper called the Englishman. 2d. That the Englishman is replete with libels of the grossest character. 3d. That Dr. Kenealy, being editor of that newspaper, is unfit to be a master of the bench of this honorable society.' The following resolutions were moved by Master Manisty, seconded by Master Hoiker, and carried by a majority of 10 to 1: '4th. That the call of Dr. Kenealy to this bench be and the same is hereby vacated. 5th. That Dr. Kenealy be prohibited from dining in the hall of this society until further order.'" When these proceedings were had, Dr. Kenealy was at home sick. We are sorry that the learned advocate should thus be deprived of his dinner, without an opportunity to be heard.

DISBARRED—WHAT A STARVING LAWYER WILL DO FOR BREAD.—Mr. Weightman, who, it will be remembered, was convicted at the Central Criminal Court, and sentenced to six month's hard labor for purloining books from Inner Temple Library some time ago, has, since his liberation from confinement, been called upon by his benchers to answer for his conduct, and has been disbarred after an investigation lasting over three days. During the enquiry it transpired that, on being released from prison, a check, representing public subscriptions, amounting to £600, was handed over to him. After the sentence of disbarment had been passed upon him he gave notice of appeal to the judges, but failed to put in an appearance at the appointed day; and notwithstanding every enquiry, no one has since heard of him. It was rumored that of the proceeds derived from the sale of one book which he had taken, he actually applied a portion to the sustenance of a brother barrister (since dead), who, like himself, was, at the time of the commission of the offence, starving and almost dying. Since the disclosure of the privations endured by Mr. Weightman, a fund has been established by all the inns of court to alleviate the wants of the poorer members of the bar.—Irish Law Times.

Notes of Cases.

[These notes of cases are either prepared or selected with care by one of the editors.]

Life Insurance Policy not avoided by Failure of Company to Comply with Law regarding Corporations.—A life policy issued by a foreign company, is not rendered void by the neglect of the company to comply with the provisions of the act of April 16, 1867, providing for the incorporation and regulation of insurance companies; nor will such neglect in an action brought against the company on the policy, excuse the policyholder from paying premiums according to the terms of the policy. Union Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. McMillen, 24 Ohio State, 67.

———. Failure to Pay Premiums.—Where a life policy is made and accepted, upon the expressed condition that the annual premium is not fully paid within the time specified, the policy "shall be null and void, and wholly forfeited," the failure to pay the premium avoids the policy. Ibid.

———. ———. Waiver of Forfeiture by Agent.—Where the policy also provides that no agent of the company, except the president and secretary, can waive such forfeiture, authority conferred upon an agent before the premiums became due to collect them, does not impliedly invest him with authority to waive the forfeiture. Ibid

———. ———. ———. Burden of Proof.—Notwithstanding the limitation upon the power of agents, declared in the policy in respect to waiving the forfeiture, the company is competent to invest such authority in any of its agents. The authority may be express, or it may be implied from circumstances, but the burden of showing it, in either case, is on the party claiming the benefit of its exercise. Ibid.

———. ———. ———. Ratification.— An agent, having no authority to waive the forfeiture, acting in the interest of the assured, received the unpaid part of a premium on a forfeited policy, after the life insured had ended, for which he gave a receipt antedated, and forwarded the money to the company, concealing the facts as to such payment. Held, that the receiving of the money by the company, in ignorance of such facts, was no ratification of the act of the agent in receiving the money. Ibid.

———. ———. ———. Failure to Return Premium Notes.—The fact that the company, on tendering back the money so received, omitted to return certain notes given in part payment of premiums, but which the forfeiture of the policy rendered uncollectable, will not affect the rights of the parties in suit on the policy; nor is the fact that the notes are payable to order material, where they show on their face the consideration for which they were given. Ibid.

Bankruptcy—Injunction—Practice—Jurisdiction.—In re Fendly, a bankrupt in the federal district court at Tyler, Texas, Mr. District Judge DUVAL, ruled the following points:

1. That a bill for an injunction to restrain the alleged fraudulent vendee of a bankrupt from selling the stock of goods, need not be verified by the oath of the creditor himself, but that it will be sufficient if verified by his agent or attorney.

2. That since the district court is clothed with equity jurisdiction in bankruptcy proceedings, it has jurisdiction to entertain such a bill.

3. That such an injunction is not dissolved by operation of law when the debtor is adjudicated a bankrupt. Upon this last point the learned judge says: "It is true that under section 40 of the bankrupt act there is some reason to suppose it was intended that injunctions should cease to operate when adjudication was had. This, however, is by no means certain. But if such be the correct construction, I confidently believe that it only refers to such injunctions as were granted simultaneously with the order to show cause, and it is not applicable to such as might be granted between the time of the commencement of proceedings, and up to the date of adjudication, or even up to the appointmen t of an assignee. Between those intervals of time, matters may occur, or facts become known, which would render the use of the writ absolutely indispensible to the rights of creditors. And, in my judgment, the section referred to does not preclude the bankrupt court from granting such writs, under summary proceedings had for that purpose, at any time subsequent to the commencement of proceedings and prior to the appointment of an assignee. And I further believe that injunctions thus granted continue until vacated by order of the court.

The Power of a National Bank to Lend Money on Mortgages, or real estate securities, was denied in Fowler v. Scully, 72 Penn. St. 456. Fowler gave to a national bank, not being indebted to it, a mortgage to secure future advances. It was held that, under currency act of June 3, 1864, the mortgage was void. The provisions of the act were very fully examined by AGNEW, J., and the conclusion reached that national banks could loan money on no other security than personal.—[Albany Law Journal.

The same point was recently decided in the same way by the Saint Louis Circuit Court, Hon. CHESTER H. KRUM, presiding. Judge KRUM delivered an opinion upon the question which, we believe, was published in the Saint Louis Republican.

Liability of Attorneys and Collecting Agencies for Collections Made by their Agents.—In Bradstreet v. Everson, 72, Penn. St. 124, the court considered, at considerable length, the liability of attorneys and collection agencies for collections made by their agents. In that case Bradstreet had a "commercial agency" at Pittsburgh, to which Mr. Everson delivered acceptances payable in Memphis and took a receipt for them "for collection." Bradstreet sent them to an agent in Memphis who collected the money and kept it. The court held that Bradstreet was liable. After citing and commenting upon Cox v. Livingstone, 2 W. & S. 103; Kraus v. Dorrance, 10 Barr. 462, and Rhines v. Evans, 16 P. F. Smith 192, the court continued: "These cases show the understanding of the bench and bar of this state upon a receipt of claims for collection. It imports an undertaking by the attorney himself to collect, and not merely that he receives it for transmission to another for collection, for whose negligence he is not responsible. He is therefore liable, by the very terms of his receipt, for the negligence of the distant attorney, who is his agent, and he cannot shift responsibility from himself upon his client." This doctrine is sustained by the following decisions in other states: Lewis v. Peck, 10 Ala. 142; Pollard v. Rowland, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 22; Cummins v. McLean, 2 Pike (Ark.) 402; Wilkinson v. Griswold, 12 Smedes & Mar. (Miss.) 669.—[Albany Law Journal.

Temperance Legislation—"Civil Damage" Laws.—The "Civil Damage Law" of Illinois, which is substantially identical with that of this state and of Ohio, has several times, recently, come before the Supreme Court of that state for construction. The Chicago Legal News of August 1, contains a late decision of the court in the case of Freese v. Tripp, which illustrates some of the abuses to which the act may be made subservient, as well as the proper rule of construction. The action was brought by the wife of an habitual drunkard against a saloon keeper, to recover damages for his having sold liquor to her husband. Evidence was offered and rejected that the wife was also a drunkard. It was also proved that the wife was in the saloon when liquor was man would take the property. That it was Mr. Howell, and that he would sold to her husband, and could have prevented the act had she been so disposed. The court on this point said: "The whole thing seems very much like a concerted plan to entrap the defendant, and was successful. Many like cases will probably occur in enforcing this act. There is nothing easier than for a husband and wife of low morals, as these parties were, to combine and make a case, calculating on the prejudice of jurors for success." The court below, however, charged the jury that they might "consider the anguish or pain of mind, feelings the plaintiff suffered," and the jury might give her "exemplary damages;" if the act of sale was not "willful," and "if it was willful or wanton the jury should annex more damages;" instructions hardly appropriate under the circumstances of the case, even if they had been legal. The court said: "We hold a fair construction of this statute requires a party suing under its provisions should prove to the satisfaction of the jury actual damages sustained. Without this, exemplary damages cannot be awarded. This is the construction placed upon the act by the highest court of the State of Ohio, and it is reasonable to suppose the legislature adopted the law with the construction put upon it as generally held." Schnieder v. Hosiers, 21 Ohio St. 98 (S. C., 8 A. L. J. 135). And that "the 'anguish or pain of mind, feelings suffered by such intoxication of her husband," is not a matter for the consideration of the jury; the statute contemplates injury in person or property, or means of support, and not mental anguish." A minority of the court were not prepared to say that, where the actual damage is shown, mental suffering might not be considered upon the question of exemplary damages.—[Albany Law Journal.

Digitized by Google

Homicide—Negligent Driving—Onus of Proof.—In this case, the prisonor having been convicted at the Commission Court, Green street, of the homicide of an aged woman, by drivjng a horse and cab over her while she was crossing the street, a question was reserved as to whether the mere act of driving, being of itself lawful, lay it upon the crown to prove that the accused was guilty of negligence in the act that caused death, or upon the prisoner to show that he had not been negligent. J. Murphy, Q. C. (with him W. O'Brien, Q. C.), for the Crown; J. A. Curran, contra. MONAHAN, C. J., FITZGERALD B., MORRIS and LAWSON, JJ., and DOWSE, B. (O'BRIEN, J. diss.) held that the onus lay upon the accused to disprove the prima facie case against him of having caused the woman's death, and affirmed the conviction. (R. v. Cavendish; C. C. R., Jan. 29, 1874.—[Irish Law Times.

Municipal Bonds—Jurisdiction to Enforce Payment—Equity.—There can be no jurisdiction in equity to enforce the payment of corporation bonds until the remedy at law has been exhausted. Heine v. Levee Commissioners, Supreme Court United States, October Term, 1873.

———. ———. Mandamus.—Where the law has provided that a tax shall be levied to pay such bonds, a mandamus after judgment, to compel the levy of the tax, in the nature of an execution, or process to enforce the judgment, is the only remedy. Ibid.

———. ———. ———. The fact that the remedy has been shown to be unavailing, does not confer upon a court of equity the power to levy and collect taxes to pay the debt. Ibid.

———. ———. ———. The power to levy and collect taxes is a legislative function in this country, and does not belong to a court of equity, and can only be enforced by a court of law, through the officers authorized by the legislature to levy the tax, if a writ of mandamus is appropriate to that purpose. Ibid.

———. ———. Liens.—Taxes are not liens unless declared so by the legislature, under whose authority they are assessed. Still less can a lien be created by the mere duty to assess taxes, which has not been performed. Ibid.

Right of Real Estate Broker to Commissions—Unconditional Sale—Question for Jury.—In Clendenon v. Pancoast, Surpreme Court of Pennsylvania, 31 Legal Intelligencer, 253, the plaintiff brought suit to recover commissions claimed to have been earned by the plaintiff as a real estate broker. When his evidence closed, the court orded a nonsuit. The plaintiff averred that he was authorized to p ocure, and did procure, a person to bargain and buy of and from the defendant the land in question, for the price or sum of $17,000. The question in dispute was whether the sale was unconditional; for, if so, the plaintiff was of course entitled to his commissions. The evidence showed that the plaintiff had some negotiation with a Mr. Howell in regard to purchasing it, and that they had fixed upon a time to go and examine the property. During an interview soon after between the parties, the plaintiff informed the defendant that he thought he had procured a purchaser, but had given him the whole of that week to decide. To this defendant replied, "if your man will take it by Saturday, all right, he can have it; after this week I will not be bouud." The plaintiff communicated this to Howell. The latter examined the property, and on Saturday morning informed the plaintiff he would take it. He, however, requested the plaintiff to ask the defendant whether it would be convenient to take some mortgages on account of the purchase-money. Thereupon the same morning the plaintiff told the defendant that his like to give him some mortgages in part payment of the purchase money. The defendant replied, "that lets me out, I won't sell." The plaintiff said "no, he only said he would like to give you the mortgages if it suited you, but he will take the property anyhow, and will pay you cash if you require it." The defendant persisted in his refusal to close the sale, and Howell insisted upon the purchase, declaring his readiness to pay the cash as soon as the papers could be prepared. On the above facts it was held that the question whether the sale was not unconditional should have been left to the jury, and it was error to direct a nonsuit.

Railway Negligence—Evidence to show Extent of Pecuniary Loss.—In Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. Dale, Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 31 Legal Intelligencer, 253, which was an action against a railroad company for physical injuries, it was held proper to admit, upon the question of damages, evidence to show that at the time of the accident, one part of the business of the plaintiff was dealing in lands, buying and selling the same; that he had a quantity of land then on hand; and to show the value of the business at the time of the accident, and the profits arising therefrom. The court say: "It is true that merely speculative profits are not to be considered, and against the consideration of such profits, the court carefully guards the jury by saying, "if, however, the business was uncertain and speculative, and not attended with any reasonable certainty of profits, then it would not have a pecuniary value to be estimated in this action. The damages in cases like these are to be arrived at by considering the reduction which the accident has wrought upon one's earning powers, whether mental or physical, or both combined, and in order to do this properly, reference must always be had to the business in which such an one is engaged at the time of the accident. No better rule can be laid down than that adopted by Justice SHARSWOOD, in the case of The iRailroad Co. v. Butler, in which he says: 'The proper measure of damages s the pecuniary loss suffered by the parties entitled to the sum to be recovered; and that loss is what the deceased would probably have earned by his intellectual or bodily labor in his business or profession during the residue of his lifetime, and which would have gone for the benefit of his children, taking into consideration his age, ability and disposition to labor, and his habits of living and expenditures.' This rule, though immediately applicable to cases brought for damages resulting from the loss of the life of a husband or parent, is nevertheless applicable, mutatis mutandis, not only to the case in hand but to all similar cases.

"Human business is as varied as human wants and human ideas. Each one adopts that which suits him best, or from which he can derive the largest profits, and when, by another's negligence, he is deprived of the power of properly conducting such business, the question of what damages he shall have by way of compensation is wholly for the jury."

Fire Insurance—Reinsurance, when a Fraudulent Preference.—Cassery v. Manners. New York Supreme Court, Special Term (Daily Register, July 6), presents the following state of facts: The New Amsterdam Insurance Company of New York, having sustained great losses in the Chicago fire of 1871, resolved to reinsure its remaining risks in the Home Insurance Company of New Jersey, a new corporation with a paid up capital of $100,000, and which had done but little business, and to effect such reinsurance paid the Home Insurance Company, $40,000. The president and secretary of the New Amsterdam Insurance Company, were also president and secretary of the Home Insurance Company, and some of the directors of the former, were also directors of the latter company. The amount of the risks thus reinsured amounted to about $10,000,000. Immediately after effecting this reinsurance the officers of the New Amsterdam Company commenced negotiations with the policy-holders at Chicago for a settlement of their losses as adjusted at fifty cents on a dollar, and procured a composition deed to be signed by most of the policy-holders to that effect. The said losses, if paid in full, would have exhausted the entire capital and surplus of said company, and the remaining policy-holders would have been entirely without security. The Home Insurance Company continued to do business only for a few months, and was then wound up. It paid promptly all losses which accrued upon the risks transferred from the New Amsterdam. On the 19th day of December, 1871, the plaintiff was appointed receiver of the New Amsterdam Company, it being declared to be insolvent, and this action is brought against the directors of said company to recover of them the $40,000 paid to the Home Insurance Company, it being claimed to have been paid in violation of law.

Upon these facts the court (VAN BRUNT, J.) hold that the reinsurance of its remaining risks after the Chicago losses, amounted to a withdrawal from its assets of a fund, namely, the $40,000 paid as premiums, in which all the policy-holders were entitled to share; that since this fund was not withdrawn to effect a reinsurance for the benefit of all its policy-holders, but for the benefit of a portion of them only, it is such a fraudulent preference of policy-holders as is forbiden by the New York statute; and the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor. } ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1874. {SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor. }

RESPONSIBILITIES OF EXPRESS COMPANIES.—We direct attention to the able opinion of Mr. District Judge BALLARD, pronounced in the U. S. Circuit Court for Kentucky, on this important subject. It will be read with interest not only on account of its importance, but for the clear and forcible manner in which he argues questions upon which there exist some diversity of judicial judgment. We are indebted for it to Gen. John M. Harlan of Louisville, Kentucky.

FORFEITED LAND GRANTS.—The decision of the Attorney-General of the United States, to which we have before referred (ante, p 411), to the effect that, upon a failure to build the roads within the time prescribed by the act making the grant, the lands, ipso facto, revert to the United States without further legislation, will have the effect to open for settlement the lands of the following companies which have failed to construct their roads within the time limited by Congress:

RAILROADS.	No. Miles.	No. Acres.
Jacksonville, Pensacola & Mobile	160	600,000
Pensacola & Louisville	43	165,000
Alabama & Florida	150	394,000
Coosa & Tennessee	35	67,784
Mobile & Girard	140	300,000
North Louisiana & Texas	90	250,000
St. Croix & Lake Superior (Bayfield and St. Croix),	220	1,180,000
Jackson, Lansing & Saginaw	50	150,000
Total,	888	3,106,784

DEFENDANTS AS WITNESSES IN CRIMINAL CASES.—The following is the recent Illinois statute on this subject: "No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any criminal case or proceeding by reason of his interest in the event of the same, as party or otherwise, or by reason of his having been convicted of any crime; but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility. Provided, however, that a defendant in any criminal case or proceeding shall only at his own request be deemed a competent witness, and his neglect to testify shall not create any presumption against him, nor shall the court permit any reference or comment to be made to or upon such neglect."

It is seen that it provides that the defendant in a criminal case may not be called upon to testify except at his own request, and contains the usual reservation against his refusal to testify, creating a presumption against him. We have already (ante p. 147) alluded at some length to this important question. The writer of that article, speaking only for himself, believes that accused persons ought, to be required to answer questions under such restrictions as the humanity of the judge may suggest. As Daniel Webster said when his namesake, Professor Webster, was accused of the murder of Dr. Parkman, a man that has no statement to make may safely be believed to be guilty. The truth is always near at hand, and, in most cases, will guide the innocent by a short and easy road out of every difficulty; and the law was not made for the protection of the guilty. The writer believes that the maxim, nemo accusare seipsum tenetur, is the primordial maxim of law which a convocation of thieves would frame for their own protection if permitted to legislate for that purpose. If the origin of this maxim were traced, it would no doubt be found to be an exaggerated protest against the criminal question or mode of extorting confessions from prisoners by torture, which was sanctioned by the civil law, and, indeed, by the practice of most of the nations of antiquity. The writer thinks the proper rule ought to be that the judge may propound to the prisoner such questions as, in his discretion, seems necessary for the elucidation of the truth on any doubtful point; but that the prisoner shall not be compelled by force to answer them, but if he fails to do so, shall be subject to whatever unfavorable presumption the jury may, having reference to his intelligence and situation, draw from such refusal.

Whilst entertaining these views, we do not seek to disguise or pass lightly over the fact that the voluntary confessions of accused persons are of very little value. In repeated cases, persons known to be innocent, and to all appearances sane, have accused themselves of capital crimes. The principle for which we contend is, that the law ought not to stop its ears against any source of evidence which offers additional light upon the subject under investigation, and which may afford additional means to the jury of arriving at a just verdict. The gross injustice and inconsistency of the common law is, that while it permits the supposed confessions of an accused person to be detailed against him through the imperfect memory, and perhaps prejudiced imagination of a third person, it cruelly seals his mouth and denies him the privilege of uttering a word in explanation. Such a rule of law is utterly indefensible and essentially wicked, and it is disgraceful to the legal profession that it has been suffered so long to exist.

Railway Negligence—Liability where a Train is Jointly Run by the Employees of Two Companies.

By an arrangement between the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, and the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company, the former company transferred the cars of the latter over the road of the former, from Stevenson, the terminus of the latter company's road, to Chattanooga. A passenger train of the latter company got belated in consequence of an accident. The superintendent of the two roads arranged by telegraph for the passage of this belated train. It was run over the section of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, from Stevenson to Chattanooga, by its own engine, in charge of its own engineer and train-men, who were employees of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company. While passing over this section of the line, it ran over and killed a "section boss" employed by the Nashville and Chattanooga company. The administrator of this man brought suit for compensation for causing his death, against both these companies; and the case, which was determined in the Supreme Court of Tennessee, in 1872, under the name of The Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Co. et al. v. Carroll, and which is reported in the Nashville Commercial Reporter, for August 27, discusses the interesting question of the joint liability of the two companies. It was insisted on behalf of the Memphis and Charleston company that the other company was liable, because they had undertaken as "contractors" to carry its trains through from Stevenson to Chattanooga; but the circuit judge instructed the jury to disregard this contract between the two companies, and to direct their attention to the question whether the deceased was killed by the locomotive, cars or train of defendants, or either one of them, and if so, he charged them that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, unless precluded on the principles of law, as afterwards explained to them. He then told them, in response to the request of the counsel of the Memphis and Charleston railroad company, that if the proof satisfied their minds that the Memphis and Charleston railroad company at Stevenson, or any other point, before the arrival of the cars at the place where the injury occurred, surrendered all control and custody over the cars and engine, and committed them to the exclusive charge and control of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company would not be liable, notwithstanding it owned the cars used on the track of the other road. But he added that, if the jury were satisfied that employees of both companies were engaged and co-operating in running the cars and jointly controlling them, the companies would both be liable. These rulings and instructions the Supreme Court held to be free from error. FREEMAN, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

Digitized by Google

We hold this charge was substantially correct. It was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the injury was done by the one company or the other, or both, through their agents and employees. Mr. Redfield in his work on railways, 591, states the rule to be that "a railway company is always responsible for an injury occasioned by want of proper care and prudence on the part of its servants in the management of a train which is under their exclusive care, management and control, though belonging to another company; and if such injury results from negligence of another company which has a joint right with defendants to use defendants' track under a lease, and which is running trains over defendants' track on its own account, the defendants are not responsible." The principle is that when one has control and management of the train, whether owner or not of the cars, it is responsible for damages for wrongs—and if this be so, it follows necessarily that if, in fact, that control be joint, and the train jointly under the control of agents of two companies, then both must be held responsible. Two persons may be joint masters, and thereby subject to a joint liability for the acts of servants or employees, and such joint liability may be converted into a several liability by the election of plaintiff to sue only one, which may be done in such a case. See Parsons on Contracts, vol. 1, note 10, p. 106. In fact the liability of two corporations must depend on the same principle, in the main, as in case of private individuals. On this question there is no error in his honor's charge at which the plaintiffs in error can complain.

Politics and the Bench.

The proposed nomination, by the democratic party of New York, of Judge CHURCH as governor of that state, calls forth an article from the able editor of Harper's Weekly, in which he uses the following language:

The question is very serious. The absolute independence of the judiciary is indispensable, and patriotism and good sense alike warn us to avoid any practice which tends to compromise it. Yet, if the bench is to be considered as a stepping-stone to purely political offices, if, indeed, it is not to be regarded as a bar to such positions, its independence is necessarily imperiled. It is true that Washington sent JOHN JAY from the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States to negotiate a treaty with Great Britain, and that he was elected governor of New York while he was chief justice of the United States, and accepted the position. But there is no reason that a man of peculiar and special ability should not be summoned from the bench to discharge precisely such a duty as that for which JAY went to England. The best opinion of the country applauded the nomination by President Grant of Judge NELSON as one of the negotiators of the treaty of Washington. Such a service is the very one for which an exception may justly be made, because a foreign treaty should be absolutely unpartisan.

It is to be regretted, however, that Chief Justice JAY, although in 1795 he was elected governor, during his absence and without his knowledge, had in 1792, consented to be nominated, after declining because of his position as chief justice. It is to be considered, however, that the time itself was exceptional, and that the men who had been most prominent in forming the new system felt it to be their duty to aid its practical operation in every way, and that the duty of absolute separation of the three great powers, and the perils of regarding judges as possible political candidates, were not as evident then as they have now become. The disposition to disregard this peril, and to consider judges as not practically debarred from the seductions of caucuses and conventions ought to be imperatively checked. If Judge CHURCH should accept a nomination as governor, that fact alone should insure his defeat. Party managers and judges should be taught that political candidates are not to be taken from the bench. For judicial deliberations must be guarded, as far as possible, from that most insidious of influences in a free government, party spirit.

The Washington Chronicle, alluding to the same subject, makes the following judicious observations:

When the name of Mr. Justice MILLER was urged in certain republican journals, he very promptly authorized a publication in the New York Times, that, under no circumstances would he allow himself to be a candidate for any political office; that when he accepted his judicial position he abandoned political aspirations, and that he believed it inconsistent with the dignity or purity of the bench for judges to allow themselves to become possible or probable candidates for any political office, however distinguished or honorable; and the consequence was that his answer was accepted. The same has been true in the history of the high courts of this country with other distinguished men. If judges desire it, their names will not be heralded as political candidates. A denial, prompt and conclusive, would stop the clamor of the most indiscreet friend. But so long as judges encourage and countenance the public use of their names as candidates, so long will they be dragged into these offensive discussions, in which they may justly expect their motives to be criticised, their actions watched, their opinions maligned, and their views misrepresented. And grave and serious as we confess this question to be, we have no hesitation in saying that the remedy is in the hands of the judges themselves, and to them the country must look for the remedy.

These, it is true, are not the views of non-partizan journals, and they may have been dictated by motives which they do not exhibit on their face; but they will, nevertheless, in the main, commend themselves to judicious minds, irrespective of party. It is not improbable that the popular confidence in the integrity of the highest court of the nation may have been, to some extent, impaired, within the last few years, by the knowledge that some of its members were possible, or even probable, candidates for the presidency. We cannot believe that the truth justifies the remark which the editor of Harper's Weekly makes concerning the late Chief Justice CHASE, when he says that "his most conspicuous legal opinion—that upon the legal tender—will always be tainted with the suspicion that it was affected by political considerations."

That such suspicions may lurk in the minds of some, there can be no doubt. There are some in whose tainted imaginations the most upright judge will never be above suspicion. But these are human owls that can see only in the darkness—cynics, whose minds are so thoroughly nursed in the habit of surmising evil, that the whole world is doomed to rest continually under the disadvantage of their suspicions. But whenever the integrity of the bench is subject, in any considerable degree, to the misgivings of intelligent hope, it is a public misfortune. The repose of society requires that the popular judgment should rest with confidence in the impartiality of the bench, and this cannot be if the bench comes to be looked upon as a stepping stone to political preferment. Judges, however, are but men, and as long as the people will bring them forward as candidates for high political offices, there are very few that will have the self-denial to resist the temptation. Besides it may not unfrequently happen that judges, from the just and impartial habits of thought, and from the integrity and purity of private life which the judicial office has a tendency to develope, as well as from the absence of any strongly expressed political opinions, become the most available candidates for political offices; and it is not to be expected that political parties will, when they stand in extreme need of such a candidate, stop to consider the propriety of selecting one from the bench. Such are precisely the considerations which are now urging the nomination of Judge CHURCH. The disposition to nominate him for governor of New York springs from a feeling that there is no other man in his party whose eminent abilities and irreproachable character will make him an available candidate against General DIX. There appears to be but one way to save the bench from the bad influences resulting from the candidacy of judges for political offices; and that is to amend the constitutions, state and national, so as to make them ineligible to such offices. But whenever such a proposition is seriously made, a strong public sentiment will no doubt be developed against it. A strong feeling will doubtless be discovered that there may be exigencies when it will be not only proper, but peculiarly fitting that judges should retire from the bench to except political preferment — when, in short, a Papinian or an Ulpian at the helm of state may be the only choice as against a Nero or a Caracalla.

Digitized by Google

Our sister republic of Mexico, after having been reduced, under successive military rulers, to the most deplorable anarchy, is now, for the first time, perhaps, since her independence, enjoying a period of repose and prosperity, under the administration of one who laid aside the robes of chief justice to assume the title of president.

Liability of Express Companies for Losses in Railroad Accidents.

BANK OF KENTUCKY v. ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY.

United States Circuit Court, District of Kentucky, July, 1874.

Before Hon. BLAND BALLARD, District Judge.

1. Express Company's Liability for Packages Lost in Railroad Accident.—An express company which receives packages of money to carry from one point to another, on a contract exempting it from liability in case of loss or damage by fire, is not liable for the loss of such packages in consequence of a fire resulting from a railroad accident, which happens without fault of the express company or its agents while such packages are being transported to their destination in the custody of the express company's messenger, upon a railroad train, operated and controlled by the agents and servants of the railroad company, and over which neither the express company nor its agents have any control. The railroad company, in such case, does not stand in the relation of agent or servant to the express company.

2. Stipulation against Liability in Express Companies' Receipt—Proof of Assent to Terms of.—Where a bank, through its teller, gives packages of money to an express company to transport to another city, and in so doing the teller fills out the blanks in the express companies ordinary printed receipt, and gives it to the agent of the company to sign, and the receipt contains a printed stipulation exempting the express company from liability for loss or damage occasioned by fire, it is no objection to the validity of this stipulation that the attention of the officers of the bank was not called to it; and it is not error to instruct the jury in such a case that the bank would be bound by it, whether it were known to them or not.

The plaintiff sued the defendant for damages for the loss of a package of money entrusted to the defendant by the Louisiana Bank at New Orleans, Louisiana, for delivery to the plaintiff at Louisville, Kentucky, but which was lost en route in consequence of a railroad accident. Under the instructions of the court, the jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff moved for a new trial.

John M. Harlan, Barr, Goodloe & Humphrey, for plaintiff; I. & J. Caldwell & G. C. Wharton, for defendant.

BALLARD, J.—On a former day there were in this case a verdict and judgment for the defendant. At the trial the counsel for the plaintiff took several exceptions to the rulings of the court and charge to the jury, and they have now moved for a new trial, assigning for cause that the court erred in refusing to give the instructions asked by them and in giving the instructions which were given.

The learned counsel have submitted no argument on their motion. They stand on the argument made and the authorities cited at the trial.

As both that argument and those authorities received, at the time, the fullest consideration, I think I would be justified in overruling the motion without adding to what was then said, but as the opinion then expressed by me on the main point in the case is apparently opposed to several respectable authorities, and is supposed to present a new and important question, I feel that I ought not to allow this opportunity to pass without attempting a vindication of an opinion, the correctness of which has been confirmed by subsequent reflection.

The facts in the case are substantially as follows: The Southern Express Company and the Adams Express Company are engaged each in the business of carrying money and other articles from one part of the country to another, for hire, at the request of any one who offers such articles to them for carriage. They do not use in their business any vehicles of their own except such as are required to transport the articles, entrusted to them, to and from railroad depots, and to and from steamboat landings. They use railroads, steamboats and the other public conveyances of the country. These conveyances are not subject to their control, but are governed entirely by the companies and persons to whom they belong. The packages entrusted to them are at all times, while on these public conveyances, in the care of one of their own messengers or agents. These companies are engaged in carrying by the railroads through Louisiana and Mississippi to Humboldt, Tennessee, and thence over the Louisville and Nashville Railroad to Louisville, Ky., under a contract by which they divide the compensation in proportion to the distance the article is transported by the respective companies. Between Humboldt, Tenn., and Louisville, Ky., both companies employ the same messenger, but this messenger, south of the northern boundary of the state of Tennessee, is subject entirely to the orders of the Southern Express Company, and north of that boundary is subject entirely to the orders of the Adams Express Company.

These express companies are in the habit of charging one price when they undertake to insure the safe delivery of the articles entrusted to them—that is, when they do not modify their ordinary responsibility as common carriers, and of charging another and lower price when their responsibility is limited. The Louisiana National Bank was aware of these regulations, and had in its possession printed blank receipts, or bills of lading, showing in the body the conditions and exceptions upon which the companies would undertake to carry at the lower rate, and in the margin the printed blank for the rate at which they would insure. Having received a letter from the plaintiff directing the forwarding by express of the sum of $13,528.15, the bank, by its teller, filled the blanks in that part of the bill of lading which contained the conditions and exceptions, and presented it to the Southern Express Company for its signature and delivered the package of money addressed to the plaintiff without stating who was the owner. The bill of lading was signed and redelivered to the teller of the Louisiana National Bank, and forwarded by him to the plaintiff at Louisville. It does not appear that the receipt was read at the time of its delivery, or that the attention of the officers of the Louisiana National Bank was called specially to the exceptions contained in it, but, as before stated, the bank was aware of these exceptions and of the stipulations for the lesser rate of compensation.

This package was carried by the Southern Express Company from New Orleans to Humboldt, Tenn., and there delivered to the joint messenger of the Southern and Adams Express Companies. While it was in the custody of this messenger between Humboldt and the northern line of the state of Tennessee, the car in which the package was contained was percipitated through a trustle-work on the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, at or near Budd's creek, and the car and package were destroyed by fire. This was caused by the fallen locomotive, without any fault or neglect on the part of the messenger who had charge of the package.

Digitized by Google

So much of the receipt as is material to the present controversy is as follows:

"SOUTHERN EXPRESS COMPANY,
"Express Forwarders,

"No. 2.—$13,528.15. JULY, 26, 1869.

"Received from the Louisiana National Bank one package, sealed and said to contain $13,528.15, addressed 'Bank of Kentucky, Louisville, Kentucky.'

"Upon the special acceptance and agreement that this company is to forward the same to its agent nearest or most convenient to destination only, and there deliver the same to other parties to complete the transaction, such delivery to terminate all liability of this company for such damage; and also that this company are not to be liable in any manner, or to any extent for any loss or damage * * * of such package or of its contents * * * occasioned * * * by fire or steam. The shipper and owner hereby severally agree that all the stipulations and conditions in this receipt contained shall extend to and inure to the benefit of each and veery company or person to whom the Southern Express Company may entrust or deliver the above described property for transportation, and shall define and limit the liability therefor of such other company or person.'"

Upon these facts the court charged the jury:

First—That the Southern Express Company and the Adams Express Company are common carriers.

Second—That the Adams Express Company is liable for the loss of packages delivered to the joint messenger of the two companies at Humboldt, Tenn., although the loss occur south of the southern boundary of the state of Tennessee.

Third—That if the jury believe the facts above detailed in relation to the execution of the receipt, then it, thus signed and delivered, constitutes the contract, and all the exceptions in it are a part of the contract, no matter whether each or all of them were known to the Louisiana National Bank or not; and the plaintiff is bound by this contract, whether it expressly authorized the Louisiana National Bank to make it or not.

Fourth—If the bill of lading contained no exception, it is clear that the defendant would not be excused because the accident occurred without its fault. It would be the insurer, and therefore accountable.' But the bill of lading, among other exceptions, contained this: "That the company are not to be liable in any manner, or to any extent, for any loss or damage * * of such package or its contents * * occasioned * * by fire."

Now, if you believe that the package was destroyed by fire, as above indicated, without any fault or neglect on behalf of the messenger, or the defendant, the defendant has brought itself within the terms of the exception, and it is not liable. It is not material to inquire whether the accident resulted from the want of care, or from the negligence of the Louisville and Nashville railroad and its agents or not, since the uncontroverted testimony shows that the car and train in which the messenger of the Adams Express Company was transporting the package, belonged to the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, and were exclusively subject to its control and orders. A common carrier who has not limited his responsibility, is undoubtedly responsible for losses, whether occurring on vehicles controlled by him exclusively, or belonging to and controlled by others, because he is an insurer for the safe delivery of the article which he to carry; has agreed but, when he has limited his liability so as to make himself responsible for ordinary care only, and the shipper, to recover against him, is obliged to aver and prove negligence, it must be his negligence or the negligence or his agents, and not the negligence of persons over whom he has no control.

If in his employment he uses the vehicle of others over which he has no control, and uses reasonable care—that is, such care as ordinarily prudent persons engaged in like business use in selecting the vehicles, and if the loss arises from a cause against which he has stipulated with the shipper—he shall not be liable for the same unless it arises from his want of care or the want of care of his employes.

Without, therefore, deciding whether or not the evidence adduced in the case tends to establish any want of reasonable or ordinary care on the part of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, I instruct you that such evidence is irrelevant and incompetent, and that you should disregard it—that is, give no more effect to it than if it had not been adduced.

The first and second instructions were not excepted to, but the third and fourth were. At the trial the plaintiff insisted that it was not bound by the terms of the receipt, because it was not shown that the attention of the Louisiana National Bank was called to them at the time, or that it expressly assented to them, but I am of opinion that there was no error in this portion of the charge. The Louisiana National Bank was aware that the receipt contained some exceptions and conditions. It accepted the receipt without remonstrance or objection, and both authority and reason demonstrate that the receipt must, under these circumstances, be regarded as constituting the contract of the parties. Dorr v. N. J. Steam Navigation Co., 1 Kernan, 485; Wells v. The Steam Navigation Co., 4 Selden, 375, and 2 Comstock, 204; Richard Grace v. Alvin Adams, etc., 100 Mass., 505; Halford v. Adams, 2 Duer, 480; York Co. v. Central R. R., 3 Wallace, 107.

It is now everywhere admitted that a common carrier may limit his responsibility by express contract, and if he may make an express contract with the shipper of goods, I cannot see why the contract may not be shown by the same evidence which would establish a contract between other parties. I cannot see why a writing, delivered by a carrier to an owner of goods, intended by the former to express the terms and conditions of his contract to carry, and received by the latter as such, should not constitute the contract between them.

A common carrier, it is true, is bound to carry all articles within the line of his business upon the terms and conditions imposed by law, if the shipper shall so demand. He has, however, a right to charge in proportion to the risk assumed by him. It is upon this ground the authorities hold, that unless his responsibility is modified by express contract, his undertaking to carry is upon the terms and conditions which are imposed by law. But when he has undertaken to carry at a less rate than he would have a right to charge, and would charge, if he undertook to carry only upon the conditions imposed by law, and has, by his receipt, delivered to the shipper stipulated for, a reasonable limitation of his responsibility, and the shipper has accepted the receipt without objection, the latter is as much bound by the contract thus made as any other party would be.

The correctness of the propositions contained in the remaining portion of the charge to which exception was taken may, I think, be demonstrated in two ways:

First. By the contract between the bank and the express company it agreed that the company should not be responsible for any loss or damage of the package which should be occasioned by fire. The loss of the package was occasioned by fire; hence the carrier, by the terms of the contract, is not responsible. It is not pretended that the contract was violated by using the cars of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company to transport the messenger and the package, or was violated in any other respect. It follows, therefore, that if the company is liable at all, it is not so by virtue of the contract, but in spite of it.

The contract, however, does not attempt to exempt, nor could it have exempted, the express company from loss occasioned by the neglect of itself or its servants, but when it is sought to charge the company with neglect, it must be such neglect as it is responsible for upon the general principles of law.

Now, upon these principles, no one is responsible for damage occasioned by neglect, unless it be the neglect of himself or his servants or agents. But the facts stated show that neither the company nor its servant was guilty of any neglect. It follows that the defendant cannot be charged in this account. Though the defendant used the Louisiana and Nashville Railroad to transport its messenger and the package, the railroad company was not, in any legal sense, the servant of the defendant. The defendant had no control over the railroad company or over its servants. The railroad company was no more the servant of the defendant than it is of any passenger whom it transports. It was no more the servant of the defendant than is the hack or cab the servant of him who hires it to transport him from one part of the city to another.

Digitized by Google

Second. All the authorities agree that when a common carrier has, by special contract, limited his responsibility, "he becomes, with reference to that particular transaction, an ordinary bailee—a private carrier for hire," or, "reduces his responsibilities to those of an ordinary bailee for hire." York Co. v. Central R. R., 3 Wallace, 107; N. J. Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 Howard. 382; Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wallace, 357.

I prefer the latter form of stating the proposition, because it is less misleading. I do not think that a common carrier, by entering into a contract limiting his responsibility, changes his character. He still remains a common carrier, with his responsibility limited in respect to the matter embraced in his contract, to that of an ordinary bailee for hire. The authorities are equally clear that an ordinary bailee for hire is bound to only ordinary diligence, and responsible only for losses and injuries occasioned by negligence or want of ordinary care. The defendant did, by special contract, limit its responsibility, and neither it nor its servant, the messenger, is chargeable with any neglect or want of care. The loss of the package was occasioned by fire. The contract provides that the defendant should not be liable for a loss so occasioned, and as neither the defendant nor defendant's servant was wanting in care, it follows that it is not responsible for the loss.

Suppose the package had been lawfully entrusted by the Louisiana National Bank to a private person to be carried for hire, and delivered to the plaintiff, and it was contemplated by the parties that such persons would transport the package and himself by the railroads, which, it was contemplated, the defendant would use, and the package had been lost under the same circumstances that the package delivered to the defendant was lost, would it, for a moment be contended that such private person would be responsible.

Suppose again that a person should deliver to his friend, who contemplated coming from New Orleans to Louisville by the ordinary modes of travel, a watch, to be carried and delivered at the latter city, and that while such private carrier, without reward, was proceeding on his way in one of the cars of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, the car should, by gross carelessness of those having charge of it, be thrown from the track, and the watch in charge of the carrier, without any neglect on his part, destroyed. Is it conceivable that such carrier would be responsible for the loss? To hold that he would be responsible would not only violate the plainest principles of law, but would shock the common sense of mankind, and yet, not only the private carrier for hire, but the private carrier without reward is responsible for the loss of a package entrusted to him, under the circumstances supposed, if the defendant is responsible for the loss of the package claimed in this case.

The private carrier for hire is responsible for losses and injuries occasioned by want of ordinary care on his part or on the part of his servants; and a private carrier without any pay is responsible, if not for want of ordinary care, certainly for gross neglect. It can not be maintained with the least show of reason that the Louisville and Nashville Railroad was any more the servant of the defendant in transporting the package sued for in this case, than it is the servant of the carrier for hire, and the carrier without hire in the cases supposed, and if these last are not responsible for the neglect of the servants of the railroad company, it is impossible to conceive that the defendant is responsible for such neglect.

The counsel for the plaintiff attempt to escape this conclusion by insisting that, though the defendant limited its responsibility, it still remains a common carrier, and that such carrier is responsible not only for any want of negligence of himself and his servants, but for the negligence of any agency which he may employ in his business.

This proposition is misleading. It is not strictly correct to say that a common carrier is reponsible for the negligence of any agency in his business, or even for his own negligence or that of his servants, in the sense in which his responsibility is distinguished from the responsibility of another person. A common carrier is bound to deliver goods entrusted to him, unless prevented by the owner, the act of God, or the pnblic enemy. He is, as the law terms him, an insurer for the safe carriage and delivery of goods subject only to the exceptions above mentioned. If he does not deltver goods entrusted to him he is responsible, not because the goods were lost by his neglct, or the neglect of a servant, or by the neglect of some agency which he employed, but because he insured their delivery. His responsibility is wholly independent of the neglect of any one. If goods delivered to him to be carried are lost while in his, or his servants custody, or while in the custody of some other person who is not his servant, he is equally responsible, not because he is liable upon any principle of law for the negligence of any person who is not his servant, but because he is bound by law to carry and deliver safe all goods delivered to him unless prevented, as before stated, by the owner, the act of God, or the public enemy. If he has limited his responsibility by special contract, and the loss has been occasioned by the cause excepted in the contract, then the owner, in order to charge him, must show that though the loss arose directly from the cause excepted, that cause itself was occasioned by the neglect of the carrier. But, when a public or private carrier is sought to be charged with loss occasioned by his neglect, when neglect is the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, I am not aware that he is liable for any negligence, except upon the same principles, and under the same circumstances, that any other person is liable. I am not aware that he, more than any one else, can be made responsible for the negligence of persons who are not his servants.

Undoubtedly the defendant did, notwithstanding its contract, continue to be a common carrier, but its responsibility was limited to that of an ordinary bailee for hire. Now, an ordinary bailee for hire is responsible for only ordinary care, and liable for the neglect of himself or his own servants, and not for the neglect of persons over whom he has no control. Consequently he is not responsible for a loss occurring under the circumstances presented in this case. If it be admitted that the common carrier has by his contract limited his responsibility to that of an ordinary bailee for hire, then it can not be consistently insisted upon that he shall be held liable as a common carrier who has made no express contract. To admit the contract, and to deny any effect to it, is too much for one proposition. The proposition of counsel, reduced to its essence, is simply this: that though the defendant has, by special contract, limited its responsibility to that of a private bailee for hire, it is still responsible as a common carrier. A proposition involving so obvious a contradiction can not require further exposure.

But obvious as the fallacy and error contained in the counsel's proposition appear to me, the proposition itself seems to be supported by the decision of the Supreme Court of California in the case of Hooper v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 27 Californa, 11; by the Sureme Court of Minnesota, in the case of Christenson et al. v. American Express Company, 15 Minnesota Reports, 270, and by the learned editor of the American law Register, in his note to the former case (Law Register, November, 1865, p. 30.)

In the first case the carrier made a contract stipulating that he would not be responsible except as forwarder. The court construed the contract as limiting the responsibilty of the carrier to that of a forwarder—that is, of an ordinary bailee for hire—but they held the carriers responsible for a loss occurring on a tug or a lighter which plied between the shore and an ocean steamer, occasioned by the negligence of the managers of the tug, although they were not subject to the control or orders of the express company.

Digitized by Google

In respect to the responsibility of forwarders, the court say: "They are not insurers like carriers, but they are liable for losses of goods while in their custody, resulting from negligence of themselves, and those they employ in their business of forwarders."

The correctness of the first part of this proposition cannot be disputed, nor do I question the correctness of the latter part, if by "those whom they employ in their business of forwarders," the court mean those who are the forwarders' servants, and subject to their control and orders. The court further say, the responsibility of a forwarder is the same as that of a warehouse-man, and "if a warehouse-man, instead of using his own warehouse, and employing his own subordinates, should, for a stipulated sum, paid to the owner, use in his business the warehouse of another person, who employs and controls the subordinates, there can be no doubt that he would be liable for a loss of the goods entrusted to his care, occurring while in his possession, and resulting from the negligence of such subordinates, although not under his control."

If by the words "entrusted to his care," the court mean to suggest a case where the warehouse-man has a contract to keep the goods in his own warehouse, I entirely concur in the proposition stated. But, if they mean that a warehouse-man, who violates no contract by removing the goods of his customer from his own warehouse into that of another prudent warehouse-man, is responsible for a loss of the goods resulting from the negligence of the subordinate of such other warehouse-man, I cannot assent to it.

Suppose a warehouse-man's warehouse should be destroyed by fire, it would be his duty to remove such of the goods of his customers as were saved to the warehouse of some other prudent person, and it cannot be insisted that he would be responsible for the loss of goods occurring there, resulting from the negligence of servants of the latter warehouse-man.

If a warehouse-man contract to keep goods in his own warehouse, and he should remove them—in violation of his contract—to another warehouse, I suppose he would be liable for all losses there occurring, just as a bailee who hires a horse to go to a particular place is responsible for loss or injury to the horse, should he drive or ride him to a different place, and the horse be lost or injured in the prosecution of such other journey.

Again, the court say: "The fact that the defendants made use of various public conveyances, their messenger with the treasure traveling a part of the way by stage, a part by steam-tug and lighters, and a part by ocean steamer, makes no difference as to their liability. For defendants' purposes, the managers of these various conveyances were their agents and employees."

If, as seems to be conceded, it was contemplated by both the plaintiff and defendants that the defendants would not use in their business their own vehicles, but the conveyances of others, not at all subject to their control or management, and that in the use of those other conveyances the defendants did not violate their contract, I cannot admit that the defendants, who, by the admission of the court, were liable only as ordinary bailees for hire, were responsible for losses occasioned by the negligence of the managers of those conveyances. I cannot admit that the managers of those other conveyances were, in any legal sense, their agents and employees. The relation of master and servant, principal and agent, does not and cannot exist where the master has no control over the servant, and the principal no control over the the agent.

The court further say: "The defendants had the means of holding the proprietors of those various vehicles, used in their business of expressmen, responsible to them, had they chosen to do so. If they did not take the proper means to secure themselves, it was their own fault.

But I cannot see how any argument can be drawn from this to show that the defendants were reponsible. Every bailee or depository may hold any one responsible for destroying or injuring goods in his possession, but it cannot be maintained that he is responsible for such destruction or injury unless he by his negligence contribute to the same. Besides, the plaintiff had his remedy against the proprietors of those other conveyances, which occasioned the loss (See the N. J. Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchant's Bank, 6 Howard, 382), and it might be retorted "that if he did not take the proper means to secure himself, it was his own fault."

In the Minnesota case it was stipulated that the carrier "was not to be held liable for any loss or damage, except as forwarders only, or for any loss occasioned by the perils of navigation and transportation. "The goods were received at New York, and were to be delivered to Christinson & Brother, Mankato, Minnesota. When the goods reached St. Paul they were placed by the carrier on board the steamboat "Julia," a boat belonging to the Northwestern Union Pacific Company, and managed entirely by its officers and servants, to be transported to Mankato. The goods remained in charge of the carrier's messenger. The boat at the time of the accident was strong, and in good condition. The carrier was guilty of no want of care in selecting the "Julia" to transport the goods, but, on the way, the "Julia" was, through the carelessness of its officers and managers, run against a snag and sunk, whereby the goods were damaged.

The court say that the carrier is not exempt from the loss by reason of the stipulation in its bill of lading that "it was not to be held liable for any loss or damage except as forwarders," because, they say: "In our opinion" * * the effect claimed for this clause of the receipt by the defendants is inconsistent with and repugnant to the scope and intent of the result, viewed as a whole, and in connection with the fact showing the defendants' real character and mode of doing business."

In other words, the court held that the defendants were common carriers, and that this clause of their receipt did not modify their liability at all. If the court was correct in this, it is indisputable that this clause did not exempt the carrier from responsibility for the loss claimed.

In respect to the other exceptions, "perils of navigation and transportation," the court says: "The exception does not excuse the carrier for negligently running into perils of the kind mentioned. The proper construction (of such words) is analogous to that which is put upon the words 'perils of the sea' in bills of lading. While thus it would seem very proper to hold that a snag in one of our Western rivers is a peril of navigation, as appears to have been done in Tennessee, if a vessel is wrecked upon one through the negligence of the carrier or of those whom he employs * * * the carrier is not absolved. Under such circumstances the loss is properly attributed to the agency of man, not to a peril of navigation."

Here again we have the same fallacies and misleading propositions which have been exposed in a former part of this opinion. The sinking of a boat by running on a snag in one of our Western rivers, is undoubtedly a "peril of navigation." It is none the less a peril of navigation though it occur by the fault of the person navigating the boat. It is wholly misleading to say that it is a peril of navigation when it results from accident and without fault, and that it is not a peril of navigation when it results from negligence. When goods are lost by reason of such peril, occasioned by the negligence of the carrier, the carrier is responsible, not because the goods were not lost by an excepted peril, but because he has brought about the peril through his own carelessness or negligence. He is made responsible for his negligence, not because he is a common carrier, but because he is guilty of negligence, and has occasioned loss thereby.

In the books which treat of common carriers, only those carriers are treated of who use their own conveyances; hence it is we often find it stated that the exception, "perils of the sea," or "perils of the river," included in the carrier's bill of lading, does not include losses arising from what would be generally understood to be "perils of the sea," when occasioned by the negligence of the servants of the carrier. In such case, the carrier being the owner of the vessel in which the goods are carried, and being responsible for its careful navigation, it is not material in effect whether it is held that a loss arising from an excepted peril, brought about by his negligence, is not a peril of navigation within the meaning of the bill of lading, or that the carrier is responsible for a loss occasioned by the negligence of his servants, but it is better and more correct to place the liability in such case on the latter ground, because to place it on the former is misleading.

Digitized by Google

Certainly, as the court says: "The exception does not excuse the carrier for negligently running into perils, * * * nor shall he be heard to set up his own negligence to excuse him from responsibility." But, in the case before the court, no negligence was imputed to the carrier. He did not attempt to set up his own negligence to excuse himself from responsibility. He set up that by the contract he was not to be liable for losses arising from the perils of navigation, and he showed that the loss did arise from a peril of navigation, without any fault on his part. He was not responsible for the negligence of the managers of the boat, as I have before shown, becasue he had no control or authority over them, and as he could be held responsible in the case only for negligence, it would seem he was not liable at all. I think that the court was misled by the definition of "perils of navigation" which it found in the books.

Clearly, that is none the less a "peril of navigation" or a "peril of the sea," because it is attributable to the agency of man. The very case which is generally used to define and explain what is a "peril of the sea," is that of a collision brought about by negligence. If a carrier's vessel should collide on the sea with another vessel, through the fault wholly of the latter, it is everywhere admitted that he would not be responsible for a loss arising from such collision, of goods which he was carrying under a bill of lading that exempted him from responsibility for loss arising from "perils of navigation" or "perils of the sea," and yet, undoubtedly, the collision in such case is attributable to the agency—nay, to the negligence—of man.

I have a profound respect for the opinions of the learned courts which I have here noticed, but I think that they are opposed to the general current of authorities—that they are founded on fallacious and misleading propositions, and that they disregard the well-settled principles of law.

The motion for a new trial is OVERRULED.

NOTE.—We regard the foregoing case as one of great practical importance, and valuable as a contribution to what cannot, perhaps as yet, be said to be a settled point of law, viz.: whether the railways and vessels, employed by express companies in executing the employment, are, or are not, to be regarded, as respects the owner or shipper of goods, as the agents and servants of the express company by which they are immediately employed. Writers and courts have differed on this question, and the reader will find the conflicting views well presented, and the cases down to 1865 collected in 5 Am. Law Reg. N. S. pp. 1 (article by Judge REDFIELD), 449, 513, 648.

The principal case as we understand it, turns upon the question whether, in a legal sense, as respects the plaintiff, the relation of the principal and agent or master and servant existed, at the time of the loss of the money, between the express company and the railroad company, and it denies that such relation subsisted. It admits that, notwithstanding the special contract, the express company sustained towards the owner of the money the relation of a common carrier, with the common law liability of a common carrier attaching to it, except in so far as this liability was reduced or modified by the bill of lading or special contract. And such we consider to be the law, of which indeed, since the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Railroad Company v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, there can be little doubt. The able and well considered views of Mr. Justice BRADLEY, in that case speaking for the court, cannot fail to meet with general judicial sanction.

Assuming that under the circumstances the special contract was binding upon the plaintiff, as, with some doubt, we think it was, the question of the express company's liability depended upon whether they had a provision in the special contract, just and reasonable in its character, which exempted the express company from responsibility for the loss.

The clause relied on to constitute such exemption, was the one "that this company are not to be liable in any manner, or to any extent, for any loss or damage of such package occasioned by fire." The package was lost by fire, and it was held that the express company was protected, if this fire was not caused by its own agents, but solely by the agents or servants of the railroad company over whom it had no control, but which company it employed to enable it to perform its contract with the plaintiff. The primary and fundamental duty of an express company is to carry the articles delivered to it. This is a personal duty resting upon it, which it cannot abdicate. Stipulations in contracts by common carriers for exemption from their common law liability, embodied in printed form and often imposed upon the public, are not to be extended in favor of the company by construction. In view of these considerations, with deference to the learned judge, and fully appreciating the clear and forcible manner in which he argues the view he adopts, we should have reached the conclusion that the special clause relied on by the express company was not broad enough, and clear enough to exempt the company from liability. We confess to being strongly impressed with the general soundness of the views of the Supreme Court of California and of Minnesota in the cases referred to. Hooper v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 27 Cal. 11. S. C., with note, 5 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 16; Christenson v. Am. Express Co. 15 Minn. 270.

As the duty of the express company to carry is essential and fundamental, is it unreasonable to hold that all agencies which it employs to enable it to discharge its duty in this behalf, are, pro hac vice, its servants, and if so, then it would be liable to the owner of the goods for the negligence of the railway company or its employees? We thus state briefly what seems to us the better view of this question; but at the same time we wish to direct the reader to the strong and forcible argument which the principal case presents in support of the opposite view. It is by discussions of this character that the law is at length settled upon just, rational and solid foundations.

Practice in Bankruptcy—Verification of Petition—Amendment.

IN re SOLOMON SIMMONS.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Michigan, August 3, 1874.

Before Hon. John W. LONGYEAR, District Judge.

1. Practice in Bankruptcy—Verification of Petition.—Under § 39 of the bankrupt act as amended by § 12 of the act of 1874, where there are less than five signers to a petition in compulsory bankruptcy, and the petition is verified by an agent, it is not necessary for such agent to state the residence of his principals, as the foundation of his right to act in the premises. In such cases the law is left as it was before the amendment of 1874.

2. ———. ———. In Case of Several Petitioners.—But although this is so, yet when there are several signers to the petition (although less than five) who do not, as in the case of partners, stand in the same right, it is not sufficient that there is a good verification by one of them; but the verification by or on behalf of each must be such that it would be sufficient if standing alone.

3. ———. ———. ———. Case in Judgment.—Tested by the foregoing, a verification in the following words is held insufficient, as being a verification by the first petitioning firm only, and no verification by the others:—"I, Samuel Heavenrich, being duly sworn says, that he is one of the firm of Heavenrich Bros., of Detroit, Michigan, and makes this affidavit in their behalf; that he is also agent for L. Morris, Dessar, Stern & Co., and Meyer & Schwab, and has full power and authority from them to make this petition—do hereby make solemn oath that the statements contained in the foregoing petition, by me subscribed, are true of my own knowledge, so far as the same are stated on my own knowledge, and that those matters which are stated therein on information and belief, are true according to the best of my knowledge, information and belief."

4. ———. ———. Amendment.—But in such a case the court has jurisdiction of the case, and may allow an amendment supplying a sufficient verification of the petition; which in this case is done, but upon payment of all costs.

On motion of respondent to vacate the order to show cause and dismiss the petition for want of a sufficient verification, and the cross-motion of the petitioning creditors to amend by supplying a sufficient verification.

By the twelfth section of the amendatory act of June 22, 1874, section 39 of the original act was, among other things, amended so as to provide that any person residing and owing debts, and committing any one of certain acts therein specified, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and subject to conditions therein mentioned, "shall be adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one or more of his creditors, who shall constitute one-fourth thereof at least in number, and the aggregate of whose debts provable under this act amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable. * * And the petition of creditors under this section may be sufficiently verified by the oaths of the first five signers thereof, if so many there be. And, if any of said first five signers shall not reside in the district in which such petition is to be filed, the same may be signed and verified by the oath or oaths of the attorney or attorneys, agent or agents, of such signers."

Digitized by Google

The petition in this case was filed July 11, 1874, by four creditors, who are described in the introduction of the petition as follows: "The petition of Simon Heavenrich and Samuel Heavenrich, doing business under the firm name of Heavenrich Brothers, of Detroit Michigan, in said district; of L. Morris, A. Dessar, Stern & Co., a partnership composed of A. Dessar, D. Stern, J. B. Dessar, and D. Dessar; of Meyer & Schwab, a partnership composed of Julius R. Meyer and Jacob Schwab, all of the city, county and state of New York." The petition is signed as follows:

HEAVENRICH BROTHERS,
Per Samuel Heavenrich.
L. MORRIS,
Per Samuel Heavenrich, agent.
DESSAR, STERN & CO.,
Per Samuel Heavenrich, agent.
MEYER & SCHWAB,
Per Samuel Heavenrich, agent.

The verification of the petition is as follows: "Eastern District of Michigan, ss:

"I, Samuel Heavenrich, being duly sworn, says that he is one of the firm of Heavenrich Bros., of Detroit, Michigan, and makes this affidavit in their behalf; that he is also agent for L. Morris, Dessar, Stern & Co., and Meyer & Schwab, and has full power and authority from them to make this petition, do hereby make solemn oath that the statements contained in the foregoing petition by me subscribed, are true of my own knowledge so far as the same are stated upon my own knowledge, and that those matters which are stated therein on information and belief, are true according to the best of my knowledge, information and belief.

SAMUEL HEAVENRICH."

"Subscribed and sworn before me this 11th day of July, A. D., 1874. JNO. GRAVES, United States Commissioner for Eastern District of Michigan."

The grounds of the motion to vacate and dismiss are: 1st. That the affidavit does not show any authority in Samuel Heavenrich to sign and verify the petition for the last three petitioners named, because it does not state that they do not reside in this district; and 2d. That it is not in fact made on behalf of the said petioners.

On behalf of the petitioning creditors it was contended as to the first ground of motion, that even if the provision quoted applies to this case the statement of the residence of petitioners in the introduction of the petition is sufficient to confer the authority to sign and verify the petition by agent or attorney; but it was at the same time contended that the provision in question applies only where there are five or more petitioners, and that, in a case like the present, where the number is less than five, the law as to verification remains as it was before the amendment, and that by that law a verification by one of several petitioning creditors was sufficient. And as to the second ground of motion it is contended that it is sufficient to state that the person making the oath is agent and has authority to make the petition; and that in this instance the person making the oath, being himself one of the petitioners, his statement that the contents of the petition are true of his own knowledge, so far as stated upon his own knowledge, was sufficient, because what was stated upon the knowledge of all the petitioners was necessarily upon the knowledge of each one of them. While opposing the motion, however, a motion was interposed on behalf of the petitioning creditors to amend by annexing to the petition a new verification in case the verification shall be held insufficient.

Mr. Don M. Dickinson, for petitioning creditors; Mr. H. M. Duffield for respondent.

LONGYEAR, J.—By the amendatory act of June 22, 1874, (sec. 12), non-residence within the district in which the petition is to be filed is made the sole ground of the right or privilege to have the petition signed and and verified by agent or attorney; and I am of opinion that, in all cases coming within the purview of the amendment, such non-residence should be stated and sworn to in the affidavit by which the petition is verified, especially where, as in this case the residence of the petitioners is stated in the petition by way of description merely, and not by way of positive averment. But it is not necessary to elaborate this point, because I am of opinion that this case does not come within the purview of the amendment, so far as the matter of the verification of the petition is concerned. The language of the provision under consideration is: "And if any of the said first five signers shall not reside in the district," etc. The words "said first five signers" relate back to the next preceding sentence, viz.: And the petition of creditors under this section may be sufficiently verified by the oaths of the first five signers thereof, if so many there be." If there be not so many as five, then certainly the provision can have no application, because it was not made, neither was it needed, for any such case. In all such cases the law was left as it was before the amendment. In the present case the petitioners are less than five in number, and therefore it was not necessary for the person verifying the petition as agent to state the residence of his principals as a foundation of his right to act in the premises. The sufficiency of the verification, then, must be tested by the law without reference to the provision in question.

The position of petitioners' counsel is that the verification is certainly sufficient as to one of the petitioners, viz, Heavenrich Brothers, and that a verification by one of several petitioners is sufficient (the whole number being less than five), and that it has always been so treated and held in practice. Such was my first impression, but upon reflection, and a somewhat critical search for decisions of the courts upon the question, I am satisfied that the position cannot be maintained where, as in the present case, the petitioners join in separate and distinct rights, and not in one and the same right as partners or otherwise. Where several petitioners join in the petition in the same right, the practice is, I believe, well settled, to treat a verification by one as sufficient, and no good reason is apparent why it should not be so. But the case of petitioners joining in separate and distinct rights is very different. There each stands as a separate and distinct party to the litigation, so far as the right in which he prosecutes is concerned. The debt, or right to prosecute of each may be contested separately from all the others. They are allowed to join in order to make up the requisite number and amount, but when so joined, the matter stands precisely the same as if each had filed a separate petition on his own separate debt, based upon the same act or acts of bankruptcy, and then consolidated into one suit; and a verification by or on behalf of each petitioner is just as necessary in the one case as in the other.

The only remaining question upon this branch of the matter, therefore, is, was the verification sufficient as to each one of the petitioning creditors? As to Heavenrich Brothers it was no doubt sufficient, and it was so conceded. As to the others, however, I think it was insufficient. True, Samuel Heavenrich, who signed the petition on behalf of the others as their agent, swears to his agency and to his authority "to make" the petition. This no doubt sufficiently establishes his authority to sign and verify the petition on their behalf. But the difficulty is, he utterly failed to so verify. His affidavit is not in terms, nor by any implication whatever, on behalf of any of the petitioners other than Heavenrich Brothers. On the contrary it is in terms, and by necessary implication, limited to them and them alone. In the first place he swore that he was a member of the firm of Heavenrich Brothers, one of the petitioners, and that he made the affidavit on their behalf; and then when he came to the substance of the verification he swore "that the statements contained in the foregoing petition by me subscribed, are true upon my own knowledge, so far as the same are stated upon my own knowledge; thus clearly limiting his verification to himself and his firm, and excluding any application of it to the other petitioners. There was, therefore, no verification whatever as to the three petitioners, Morris, Dessar, Stern & Co., and Meyer & Schwab, without which the order to show cause was not authorized.

Digitized by Google

It results that the motion of respondent must be granted so far at least as to vacate the order to show cause.

The only question remaining is that arising upon the motion on behalf of the petitioning creditors for leave to amend by supplying a sufficient verification. The solution of this question depends upon whether jurisdiction of the suit or matter depended upon there being a sufficient verification in the first instance. In re McNaughton (8 N. B. R., 44), this court held that jurisdiction was obtained by the filing of the petition, and that the verification of the petitioner, and the depositions of debt and of act of bankruptcy, were necessary only to obtain jurisdiction of the person of the alleged bankrupt by the process of the court, to wit: the order to show cause. See also In re Raynor, 7 N. B. R., 527. On a review of the grounds of judgment in re McNaughton, I still adhere to the opinion there expressed. It is true that decision was made before the recent amendments, but the amendments have not changed the law so far as it bears on the question now under consideration.

The language of the act both before and after the amendments (sec. 39) prescribing the means of acquiring jurisdiction, so far as relates to the petition, is, "shall be adjudged a bankrupt on the the petition of one or more of his creditors." Nowhere in the act nor by any rule or order, is any verification of the petition expressly required. Why, then, is a verification necessary at all? By some this question is answered by saying, because the Supreme Court have so indicated by the forms prescribed by them. But, in my opinion, that would be ascribing to the Supreme Court the exercise of an unwarranted power in the absence of anything in the act itself making a verification necessary. In my opinion the answer to the question is found in the provision of section 40, prescribing upon what showing an order to show cause may be made. That provision reads as follows: "That upon the filing of the petition authorized by the next preceding section, if it shall appear that sufficient grounds exist therefor, the court shall direct the entry of an order requiring the debtor to appear and show cause," etc. That "sufficient grounds exist" can be made "to appear" only by some sort of legal evidence; and by the prescribed forms the Supreme Court have, in effect, said what that evidence shall be, viz.: First, a verification of the entire petition, and second, depositions as to the alleged debt and act or acts of bankruptcy. The verification is no part of the petition. It is necessary that it should accompany the petition only in order to predicate upon it certain prescribed action in furtherance of the jurisdiction acquired by the filing of the petition, viz., the order to show the cause. The filing of the petition is mentioned in section 40 as authorized by the next preceding section as an accomplished fact, and then for the first time creates a necessity for a verification; and the commencement of proceedings is made to date from such filing. (Section 38.)

Therefore, having jurisdiction of the matter, notwithstanding the insuffiiciency of the verification, the court has power to allow the amendment asked. As no good reason appears why it should not be allowed, and as it does appear that a denial of the motion to amend and a dismissal of the petition would be a denial of the right of creditors to proceed at all by a new petition, for the reason that the six months' limitation within which a petition can be filed for the act of bankruptcy alleged has expired since the filing of this petition, I think the amendment ought to be allowed, and the same is allowed accordingly. But it must be upon terms of payment by the petitioning creditors of all costs upon the order to show cause hereby vacated and the costs of these motions, to be taxed, including a solicitor's fee of ten dollars.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Western Jurist, for August, contains an interesting article on law schools, which we hope to find space to print hereafter. Also an article on The Liability of a Master for the Wrongful Acts of his Servant, by John Proffatt, Esq., taken from the Albany Law Journal. Also the recent bankrupt act, reprinted from the American Law Times.

It also reports Black v. Burlington, etc., Railroad Company, Supreme Court of Iowa, of which the following is the syllabus:

"1. While at the point a railroad crosses a public highway, a traveler with a team and a railroad train have equal rights, and both are required to use equal care, yet a traveler approaching a railroad crossing to which a train is drawing near, is required to wait the passing of the train.

"2. It is competent, in order to show want of care in running a railroad train, that it approached a highway crossing at a high rate of speed without giving signals or alarms, and a witness may be permitted to testify to such rate of speed of the train as observed by him when it was passing a point 900 feet from the crossing in the direction from which the train was approaching."

It also publishes Davenport v. The Chicago, Rock Island, etc., Railway Co., already published in this journal, with a note (ante, p. 385).

It also publishes Farmer's Loan and Trust Co. v. Maquillan, published in this journal for June 25 (ante, p. 315).

It concludes with a digest of decisions of the Supreme Court of Iowa, mostly relating to railway taxation.

The numbers of the Daily Register received during the past week, contain several interesting decisions of the General Term of the Supreme Court of New York, each one prefixed with a carefully prepared syllabus. In Kelty v. Long (published August 18), the court rule several points as to pleading where suit is brought against a married woman under the act of that state. We presume that it has only a local interest.

In Caldwell v. Commercial Warehouse Co. (published August 19), the court rule that the provision of a charter authorizing the taking of commissions for the custody of property is not to be used as a cover for usurious interest.

In the Dutchess Mutual Ins. Co. v. Hachfield (published August 20), it is ruled that a bond made payable in blank, with the addition of the terms "his executors, administrators and assigns" following the space left for the insertion of the name of the payee or holder, is negotiable under the mercantile law of that state; and that in an action brought to recover possession of such a bond that has been feloniously stolen from its lawful owner, the law, in order to vest the title in the buyer, requires no more than that he should show that it was purchased in good faith, for value, and in the ordinary course of business, and without notice or suspicion.

The following is the syllabus of Moores v. Gunt (published August 21): "Where articles that have been purchased in this state enter into the construction of a vessel built in a foreign state, no lien, that can be enforced as such, can arise by force of our state statute when the ship arrives within this state. It was not intended, by the act of 1862, to create liens upon vessels not within this state, and there incurring debts for the purposes mentioned in the act, and it is doubtful whether a state can enact that a lien which did not already exist shall arise or attach from the act of sailing into its jurisdiction.

The following ruling (published August 22) is made with reference to contracts procured to be made by a wife through fraud of her husband: The general rule in equity is that an act done or contract made under a mistake or ignorance of a material fact, is voidable and relievable in equity, and it is a well settled principle that an assignment of property by a wife to a husband, made in consequence of untrue representations which produce false impressions, is invalid. Neither is it necessary to find that the husband knew the representations to be untrue, as the intimate relations existing between husband and wife require the utmost good faith in all transactions between them, and any misrepresentation or concealment of a material fact, or any suspicion of undue influence, will justify the interference of a court of equity. This rule applies even where the leading motive on the part of the wife in making the assignment was an improper and unlawful one.

The Western Insurance Review, for August, gives in a condensed form a large number of decisions on insurance law. It also publishes the opinion of the New York Commission of Appeals (Lott, Com.) in Hand v. Williamsburg Fire Ins. Co. We do not know what the decision is about, as we generally conclude that a dscision that is not worthy to have a syllabus is not worth reading.

The Chicago Railway Review, for August 29, contains abstracts of a large number of exceedingly interesting decisions on railway law, by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts and other courts. These embrace the following subjects: Safety of railway crossings a question of fact for jury; removal of suits to United States Courts; liability of master for injuries of servant to wife of fellow-servant; liability of railway carriers for injuring horses; validity of subscriptions to stock; notice of arrival of freight—reasonable time for removal; injury to lands by badly constructed embankments; remedy of landowner for damages caused by railway company in making their track conform to level of street at crossing; release of damages by person of unsound mind; vendor's lien upon railway iron; loss of goods through felony of carriers' servants—quantum of proof; agent of common carrier—when risk commences; conveyance of land for depot building—location of depot; occupation by a railroad of public roads.

Digitized by Google

The Legal Intelligencer, for August 28, contains a number of interesting articles, among which we note the following, of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania:

In Deer v. Greenawalt, a will was witnessed by two subscribing witnesses, and a blank was left for the name of the residuary legatee; this was afterwards filled up, but as the subscribing witnesses were not able to testify as to this fact: held, that as to the residuary devise, the will was not duly proved.

In Nippe's Appeal, the syllabus is that the conveyance by husband to wife of his interest in land subject to the lien for unpaid purchase-money, cannot be held to be fraudulent and void, no other creditors then having claims on the husband.

In Plymouth Manufacturing Company's Appeal, A. covenanted to convey to B by a "good and sufficient deed," a certain lot, "whenever the said building as aforesaid shall be erected and the business mentioned shall be in operation." Held, that the covenant was not a continuing one, and that the vendee was entitled to a deed free of conditions upon its performance; which right was not lost by a subsequent change of business and conversion of the building to other purposes.

The Legal Intelligencer also publishes Wells v. Cooper, English Common Pleas, of which the following is the syllabus:

1. It is in the discretion of the court to grant a new trial in a case where a person not impannelled has served upon the jury, and the court will not grant such new trial unless substantial injustice has been done by a wrong juror having served.

2. An action came on to be tried before a common jury, and the name of Thomas Fox, being on the common pannel, was called amongst others by the associate, whereupon one Thomas Cox, who was on special jury panel, went into the box by mistake, served upon the jury, and took part in the verdict, which was given for the plaintiff. The defendant alleged afterwards that Cox was a friend of the plaintiff, and had purposely, and in the interest of the plaintiff, tendered himseif as a juror, but this was denied by Cox in a letter written in answer to enquiries by the attorney of the plaintiff. Held, (by Keating and Grove, JJ.), that it was in the discretion of the court to grant a new trial, and a rule for a new trial discharged.

The Albany Law Journal, for August 29, contains a leader on the extradition of fugitives from justice, in which the editor shows that the lager beer clause of Massachusetts statute, may be made to reach a culprit under the very shadow of Yuba Dam. In an article on Liability of Express Companies, it discusses the rule laid down by Judge Ballard, in the case which we publish in this number, and shows that it is an innovation upon the rule established by a number of adjudications. It otherwise contains a large amount of interesting matter.

The Chicago Legal News, for August 29, publishes the opinion of Mr. Justice Davis of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Humaston v. The American Telegraph Co., in which it was held that where a company covenanted to pay for certain property a price to be fixed by arbitration, and prevented this mode from being adopted by revoking the submission, they could not take advantage of their own wrong, and deprive the plaintiff of the opportunity of showing to the court and jury what the value of the property was. The court states the rule for estimating the damages for a failure to deliver stocks according to contract.

Also an opinion of Judge McAllister, of the Supreme Court of Illinois at Columbus, in the case of The People ex rel. Smith v. Brown, holding that the Illinois statute of 1874, authorizing the state's attorney, ex officio, to file in the county court, without any proof of probable cause, an information in a criminal case, is unconstitutional, and is also unconstitutional so far as it authorizes criminal warrants to issue upon a charge unsupported by proof of probable cause, and in so far as it provides for a procedure entirely different from that in the circuit court.

It also concludes the publication of Judge William's opinion in the Cheney ecclesiastical case; prints an opinion of the attorney-generai of Illinois on equalizing taxes, and also notes of a number of interesting decisions.

The Washington Law Reporter, for August 25, publishes Doddridge v. Gaines, relating to new trials in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; also Luchs v. Jones, in which the following point is ruled: In case of the sale of real property under a deed of trust, the purchaser, as a matter of law becomes vested with the title, and if the person who executed the trust-deed remains in possession of the premises without any agreement to that effect, he becomes, by operation of the landlord and tenant act, tenant by sufferance to such purchaser, and, upon being notified to quit in thirty days, is liable to be turned out by proceedings under that statute.

It also prints the recent act of Congress for the protection of settlers upon railroad lands, together with rules established by the commissioner of the land office for proceeding thereunder.

The Pacific Law Reporter, for August 18, publishes without syllabus a number of decisions of the Supreme Court of California, relating to Ejectment, Pre-emptions, Taxation, Power of Legislature, and Void Assessment.

The Legal Gazette, for August 21, reports the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Baring Brothers & Co. v. Dabney, Morgan & Co. et al., of which the following is the syllabus:

"In 1812, the Legislature of South Carolina created a state bank. In 1821, the future profits of the bank were directed to be set apart for the payment of certain stock issued by the state. In 1838 an act was passed authorizing the issue, in the name of the state, of certain fire-bonds, the faith and funds of the state being pledged for the payment of the same. The profits of the bank, after the payment of the first stock, was to be set apart for the payment of the interest on the fire-loan bonds, and the final redemption thereof. In 1865, the bank became insolvent, and in the same year an act was passed directing the president and directors to collect the assets of the bank and hold the same to be appropriated. 1st. To pay the principal and interest of the fire-loan bonds payable in Europe; 2d. Of those payable in the United States; and 3d. To the redemption of the outstanding notes hitherto issued by said bank. Held, upon a question whether this act was constitutional, 1. That the assets of the bank having arisen from its capital and its operations, they were not profits, and could not be applied for the purpose mentioned in the act. 2d. The fire-loan stocks and bonds, even when guaranteed by the bank, were debts of the state and not debts of the bank, and the legislature could not by law appopriate the assets of the bank for the payment of the debts of the state."

The Legal Gazette also has an exceedingly interesting account of the crisis which happened last winter in the Court of Appeals at Montreal, wherein the whole bar of that city withdrew from the court and refused to practice in it for the space of four months, on account of gross incompetency and partisanship of some of the judges. The Legal Gazette concludes its article as follows:

"The whole affair was extraordinary. Lasting, as it did, for some four months, the "judicial crisis" was the theme of the newspapers, the politicians, the lawyers and the public generally. The struggle was highly interesting, and had the excellent effect of accomplishing, at least partially, the object sought for. The action of the Montreal bar was a noble one, and the wholesome example it has set may be followed with profit in case any of our courts become a burden and a reproach to the community. The fact that such a state of affairs existed in a court where the judges were all appointed, might also be considered with profit by those who in the midst of our republican institutions, declaim against an elective judiciary, and cry out for an appointive one."

The Legal Gazette also publishes two local decisions and a number of Pennsylvania statutes.

The Legal Intelligencer, for August 21, reprints from the Albany Law Journal, that learned and interesting article of John F. Baker, Esq., of New York city, on the Legal Custody of Dead Bodies. It also publishes a number of interesting decisions, among which we note the following:

In Warwick v. Wah Lee, PIERCE, J., of the Philadelphia Common Pleas, holds that a Chinese laundry in a basement, so conducted as to injure the trade of a tradesman in the next story, may be such a nuisance that equity will interfere to prevent damage therefrom.

In McFerren v. The Mont Alto Iron Company, Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, we find the following "glittering generality" given as a synopsis of one of the points ruled: "Testimony irrelevant for one purpose, may be admissable for another."

In the same case it is also ruled that a party competent, prior to the passage of the Pennsylvania act allowing parties in interest to testify, is not rendered incompetent by that act.

In Bigony v. Tyson, the same court hold that a bond in $2000, conditioned that Dr. B. shall not practice medicine in a certain locality, is not to be considered as liquidated damages.

The case of Strong v. O'Donnell, decided by DANA, J., of the Common Pleas of Luzerne County, relates to the taxation of shares of national bank stock. The following is the syllabus:

"1. Shares of national bank stock are personal property.

"2. Those belonging to non-residents are separated by the acts of Congress from the persons of their owners for purposes of taxation, and are to be taxed at the place where the bank is located.

Digitized by Google

"3. The states may direct the manner and place of taxing the shares of resident owners, and the legislature of Pennsylvania not having separated such shares from the person of their owner, their situs, like that of other personal property, is at the domicil of their owner, and they are to be taxed in the town or city where he resides, not in that where the bank is located.

"4. To avoid multiplicity of suits, the court has jurisdiction to enjoin against the collection of an illegal and unauthorized tax.

See, upon the same subject, Tappan v. Merchants' National Bank, ante, p. 239.

In the Commercial Bank of Cleveland v. Simmons, in the United States Circuit Court, Northern District of Ohio, it is held by Mr. District Judge WELKER, that the plaintiff, a national bank, had the right to bring suit in the U. S. circuit court of the district where the bank was located upon two notes indorsed to it by the payee, who was also a citizen of the state and resident of the district; That a national bank does not sue by virtue of any right conferred by the judiciary act, but by virtue of the right conferred upon it by the act of 1864, authorizing and creating it, and which constitutes its charter; that having no right to sue under the judiciary act, the limitation in the 11th section, as to suits on indorsed notes and choses in action, does not apply.

We recently published (ante, p. 232) an opinion of Mr. District Judge HOPKINS on the local jurisdiction of the federal courts in suits against national banks. It might be well to compare the two cases.

The Legal Intelligencer publishes the Oregon Steam Navigation Company v. Winsor, already published by us (ante, p. 350).

The Nashville Commercial Reporter, for August 20, publishes the case of Alexander v. Kelso, Supreme Court of Tennessee, Knoxville, 1872, in which the court discusses at length what constitutes an executor de son tort. The following points are ruled:

"1. If A. deposits with B. money to be kept by him for A., and A. dies, and B. pays the money out to a creditor, or to the widow of A., then B. is an executor of his own wrong; for the money is the goods of A. But if A. lends to B. the money, and B. pays it out after the death of A., to his creditor or widow, B. is not an executor de son tort, for he pays out his own money and not the money of A.

"2. A party sued as executor de son tort is a competent witness under the act of February 24, 1870, declaring parties to the record incompetent to testify where the suit is brought by or against an executor, etc. The provisions of the act applies only to rightful executors and administrators."

The same journal publishes Hale v. Hord, decided by the same court at the same term, where the court rule the following points:

"1. Since the passage of the code, unless objection is taken to the jurisdiction, a court of chancery will try an action of ejectment.

"2. A demurrer admits the allegations of the bill to be true.

"3. Under the code, 3907, a party has option to apply to the court in which a record is lost or destroyed, to have it set up and supplied, or he may, upon a proper case made out, have the record set up and supplied in a court of equity. Citing and modifying the case of Graves v. Keaton, 3 Cold. 12.

"4. The complainants claimed title under an elder grant issued upon an entry made in the entry-taker's office of Hawkins county, but the beginning corner was about one-half mile over the line in Green county, and the defendant's conflicting grant laid entirely in Hawkin's county. Held, That the complainants had a valid grant as to the land in Hawkins."

Notes and Queries.

LAMAR, BARTON COUNTY, MO., July 30, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—The act of the general assembly of Missouri, approved March 25th, 1874, entitled "An act to prevent non-residents of the state from herding or grazing their cattle on certain lands in this state," is a matter of much importance to us in this part of the state, but we fear it is unconstitutional. Can you refer us, through your columns, to any authority, pro or con? Yours, etc. R. B. R.

ANSWER.—We cannot. Perhaps some of our readers can.

RULO, NEB., August 18, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Please publish, in your valuable journal, a course of study for a law student reading in an office.

Yours, truly, J. M. C.

ANSWER.—Would recommend the student to give half his time to office work, copying, conveyancing, etc., and to reading, the first year, books, in the following order: Bishop's First Book of the Law; Walker's American Law; Blackstone's Commentaries; Kent's Commentaries; Starkie's Evidence, 1st volume; Stephen's Pleading; Smith on Contracts; Bispham's Equity.

Legal News and Notes.

—CHIEF JUSTICE DAILY, of the Common Pleas, of New York city, and president of the American Geographical Society, attended the recent anniversary dinner of the Royal Geographical Society in London, and was treated with marked consideration by the officers and members.

—ONE of the new rules of the post office department instructs postmasters that they must not allow postal cards to be used for abusive or obscene purposes, but postmasters are not expected to read them all to see what is on them. The violation of this rule renders them unmailable, but should they reach their destination through inadvertence they can only be delivered upon payment of six cents postage, the double-letter rate, deducting the one-cent stamp therefrom.

—THE Cleveland Leader considers the opposition to the new constitution of Ohio to have been: all corporate companies, on account of the restrictions proposed by it upon them in several respects; all county and little local rings holding "soft things" which the new instrument threatened to take away; the catholic voters; radical temperance people, who opposed the whole in order to make the more sure of defeating local option; "the idiotic vote cast for license and against the constitution;" the democratic dislike to an instrument framed by a convention authorized by a republican legislature. For whatever reason, the defeat of the measure is much to be regretted.

—A SPRINGFIELD special dispatch, 19th, to the St. Louis Republican, says that Judge Treat, of the United States Court, on that day issued the expected mandamus commanding the board of supervisors to levy a tax of 1¾ per cent. on all the taxable property in the county to pay the judgments obtained against the county for past-due interest on the bonds issued to build the court-house. It will be remembered that a previous mandamus from the same court was disregarded by the county board, and that the supervisors were fined $1,000 each for contempt, which they paid out of the county treasury.

—THE NEW REGULATIONS FOR THE ISSUANCE AND HOLDING OF PATENTS.—The new law relating to patents, trade-marks and copyrights, provides that no person shall maintain an action for the infringement of his copyright unless he shall give notice thereof by inserting in the several copies of every edition published in the title page immediately following, if it be a book; or, if a map, chart, musical composition, print, cut, engraving, photograph, painting, drawing, chromo, statute, statuary or model, or design intended to be perfected and completed as a work of fine art, by inscribing upon some visible portion thereof, or of the substance on which the same shall be mounted, the following words: "Entered according to the act of Congress, in the year ——, by A. B., in the office of the librarian of Congress, at Washington," or, at his option, the word "copyright," together with the year the copyright was entered, and the name of the party by whom it was taken out, thus: "Copyright, 18—, by A. B." For recording and certifying any instrument of writing for the assignment of a copyright the librarian shall receive from the person to whom the service is rendered $1, and for every copy of an assignment $1, said fee to cover in either case a certificate of the record, under seal of the librarian of Congress, and all fees so received shall be paid into the treasury of the United States. In the construction of this act the words "engraving," "cut" and "print" shall be applied only to pictorial illustrations, or works connected with the fine arts, and no prints or labels designed to be used for any other articles of manufacture shall be entered under the copyright law, but may be registered in the patent office. The commissioner of patents is charged with the supervision and control of the entry or registry of such prints or labels, in conformity with the regulations provided by law as to copyright of prints, except there shall be paid for recording the title of any print or label not a trade-mark $6, which shall cover the expense of furnishing a copy of the record under the seal of the commissioner of patents to the party entering the same. This act is to take effect on and after the 1st day of August next.

THE LAWYERS OF ANCIENT ROME.—All the civil magistrates were drawn from the profession of the law. The celebrated Institutes of Justinian were addressed to the youth of his dominions who had devoted themselves to the study of Roman jurisprudence; and the sovereign condescends to animate their diligence by the assurance that their skill and ability would in time be rewarded by an adequate share in the government of the republic. The rudiments of this lucrative science were taught in all the considerable cities of the East and West; but the most famous school was that of Berytus, on the coast of Phœnicia; which flourished above three centuries from the time of Alexander Severus, the author, perhaps, of an institution so advantageous to his native country. After a regular course of education, which lasted five years, the students dispersed themselves through the provinces in search of fortune and honors; nor could they want an inexhaustible supply of business in a great empire already corrupted by the multiplicity of laws, of arts, and of vices. The court of the Prætorian præfect of the East could alone furnish employment for one hundred and fifty advocates, sixty-four of whom were distingui shed by peculiar privileges, and two were annually chosen with a salary of sixty pounds of gold, to defend the causes of the treasury. The first experiment was made of their judicial talents, by appointing them to act occasionally as assessors to the magistrates; from thence they were often raised to preside in the tribunals before which they had pleaded. They obtained the government of a province; and, by the aid of merit, of reputation or of favor, they ascended, by successive steps, to the illustrious dignities of the State. In the practice of the bar, these men had considered reason as the instrument of dispute; they interpreted the laws according to the dictates of private interest; and the same pernicious habits might still adhere to their characters in the public administration of the State. The honor of a liberal profession has indeed been vindicated by ancient and modern advocates, who have filled the most important stations with pure integrity and the most consummate wisdom; but in the decline of the Roman jurisprudence, the ordinary promotion of lawyers was pregnant with mischief and disgrace.

Digitized by Google

The noble art, which had once been preserved as the sacred inheritance of the patricians, was fallen into the hands of freedmen and plebeians, who, with cunning rather than with skill, exercised a sordid and pernicious trade. Some of them procured admittance into families for the purpose of fermenting differences, of encouraging suits, and of preparing a harvest of gain for themselves or their brethern. Others, recluse in their chambers, maintained the dignity of legal professors by furnishing a rich client with subtleties to confound the plainest truths, and with arguments to color the most unjustifiable pretensions. The splendid and popular class was composed of the advocates, who filled the forum with the sound of their turgid and loquacious rhetoric. Careless of fame and of justice, they are described for the most part as ignorant and rapacious guides, who conducted their clients through a maze of expense, of delay, and of disappointment; from whence, after a tedious series of years, they were at length dismissed, when their patience and their fortune were almost exhausted.—[Gibbon.

—THE Missouri democratic state convention has nominated for judges of the supreme court, Hon. William B. Napton of St. Louis, and Warwick Hough, Esq., of Kansas City. Judge Napton is at present one of the members of the Supreme Bench of Missouri, to which position he has been called for the third time after successive retirements. He was first elected to that position in 1839, and continued a member of the court until 1851. Again in 1837 he was returned to the same position, and continued in it until 1862. He was re-appointed in 1873 to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Judge Ewing. His renomination at this time (which seems to have been made without opposition) is a just tribute to his unquestioned integrity, his experience, his extensive learning and solid ability as a jurist. One thing in connection with Judge Napton's renomination deserves notice. His opinion in the Clark county bond case, published in the first issue of this journal (ante, p. 5), was severely and unscrupulously denounced by some of the rural press; and it was thought that the granger element in his party would prevent his renomination. But the good sense of the people seems to have settled into the conclusion that he had simply reaffirmed principles established by his predecessors and by the Supreme Court of the United States, and that an honest judge could have done no less under the circumstances. Mr. Hough is about forty years of age. He was admitted to the bar in 1859 at Jefferson City. He is well spoken of by those who know him.

—THE Albany Law Journal, referring to the disgraceful conduct of the dominant party in New Hampshire, uses the following just language: "The recent judicial changes in New Hampshire, which resulted in displacing Judges Doe, Sargent and Smith from their positions in the highest court of the State, were, to say the least, of doubtful expediency and propriety. If political reasons governed in making the change, as has been stated, the act is positively disgraceful to the dominent party in New Hampshire. We have always depreciated any attempt at making political qualifications a criterion in the selection of judicial functionaries. And it is especially deplorable in our view to make political considerations alone an excuse for the removal of judges whose ability, learning and integrity are beyond question, and unsurpassed. Without disparagement, it may be said that Judge Doe is one of the most learned and indefatigable jurists who have adorned the bench of this country for many years. His opinions exhibit the utmost research and elaboration, and his work shows him to be wedded to a purely judicial life. His removal is a loss not only to the judiciary of New Hampshire, but to American jurisprudence."

—THE laws passed during the last session of Congress have been put in type, and press-work will be begun as soon as the index, now preparing at the state department, is ready, which will be in a few days. The laws are unusully long this session, and judging from the many calls for them from all parts of the country, are unusually important.—[Albany Law Journal.

—HON. ASHAEL PECK, judge of the Supreme Court of Vermont, has just been nominated by the republicans for governor of that state.

Notes of Cases.

[These notes of cases are either prepared or selected with care by one of the editors.]

Attestation of Will—Signature of the Testator.—Sir JAMES HANNEN, in the case re Elizabeth Maddock (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 696), decided a question of general interest to testators. The testatrix executed her will by making her mark at its foot, in the presence of two witnesses. Of these witness, one signed his name in due form; the other, an old man, named Samuel Birtwistle, wrote "Saml." but could not complete his signature owing to infirmity. This not being deemed sufficient another witness was sent for. He signed the will, whilst the first witness simply went over the signature he had previously written with a dry pen. The learned judge proposed two questions for decision: first, whether the second attesting was a valid attestation; secondly, whether the first attesting was a valid attestation? The first question was solved in the negative by Playne v. Scriven (Robert. 772). On the second question the judgment went more into details. The rule of law is, that "if a witness makes any mark with the intention thereby to subscribe, that is sufficient." Thus it becomes a question of intention. The learned judge expressed approval of the rule laid down in Charlton v. Hindmarsh (8 H. of L. Cas. 160), and thought it essential that the act intended as a subscription should be completed. This rule, hard as it may sometimes work, has received the approval of Lord CAMPBELL, Lord CRANWORTH, and Lord CHELMSFORD. From their lordships' remarks, it is evident that they were fully aware that such a rule might afford examples of the maxim summum jus summa injura, and such was the case in re Elizabeth Maddock; for it was held, that as the act which the witness intended to perform was not complete, the will was not duly attested.—[Law Times.

Will—Devise in Pursuance of Power.—Where a will is made by virture of a power in a trust deed authorizing an appointment to such person or persons as the devisor should appoint, devising real estate to A. for life, and the remainder in fee after A.'s decease, to the "heirs of A.'s body:" Held, that such appointment is valid, and in conformity with the terms of the power. Butler v. Huestis, 6 Chicago Legal News, 381; Supreme Court of Illinois.

———. ———. Appointment of a Less Estate than Authorized—Where a party has the power to appoint a fee, if there are no words of positive restriction, a less estate may be appointed. The appointment of a less estate than the donee might have created under the power is not thereby rendered void. But where an appointment is to be made of a particular estate, or in a certain manner and in no other way, the negative words must control, and the donee is not permitted to appoint a different estate, or in any other manner. Ibid.

———. ———. ———. Under a power authorizing the appointment of an estate in fee simple absolute, an appointment of a freehold estate for life to one person, and of the remainder in fee to the "heirs of the body" of that person, is valid, there being no negative words restricting such an appointment. But if the appointment to the "heirs of the body" was void, because not made to persons in being, no reason is perceived why the lesser estate may not be maintained. Ibid.

———. Interpretation.—"Heirs of the Body."—The words, "heirs of her body," used in this will are to be construed not to be words of limitation, but of purchase, and equivalent to children or issue, and are descriptio personarum. Ibid.

———. ———. ———. Prior to the statute de donis, the estate given in this will to the life-tenant would have been a conditional fee, to which on the birth of children, the right of alienation would attach. Since that statute, it is an estate tail, and in case of the death of the life-tenant, without "heirs of the body," it would revert to the donor, his heirs or appointee. But in Illinois, by virtue of the 6th section of the conveyance act, the rule in Shelley's case does does not apply to an estate tail; a life-estate only passes to the first taker, or life-tenant, and a fee-simple absolute vests in the second taker. Ibid

———. Estates Tail.—The estate devised in this suit was an estatetail, but by force of the Illinois statute the entail is saved in the first degree. So far as estates tail are concerned, the rule in Shelley's case is repealed by the Illinois statute. Ibid.

Wife's Mortgage—Foreclosure.—Where a mortgage is given by a wife to an individual member of a firm, to secure any indebtedness that might arise in the course of a commission business carried on by her husband, and where, between the partners of the firm, it is understood and agreed that the one to whom the mortgage has been given shall assume the accounts of the goods consigned to the husband, in an action to forclose, it is error on the part of a referee to refuse judgment on the ground that the goods (from the sale of which the action arose) were consigned by the firm, when the evidence showed that the consignment was made by the individual partner alone. Wood v. Lockwood, New York Supreme Court, General Term, May, 1874.—[Daily Register, Aug. 14.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

OBITER DICTA.—It is often difficult to separate matter of dicta from matter of judgment. Whoever has attempted to should construct head notes to adjudged cases, which in general embrace only the points in judgment, has frequently experienced this difficulty. In Starr v. Stark, decided by the U. S. Circuit Court for Oregon, in May last, Mr. Circuit Judge SAWYER asserts the proposition that where the record fairly presents two points upon the merits of the case, upon either of which the appellate court might rest its decision, and the court actually decides both, without indicating that it is intended to rest the judgment upon one rather than on the other, the decision upon neither can be regarded as obiter. The same principle was asserted by Mr. Justice NAPTON of the Supreme Court of Missouri, in Kane v. McCown, ante, p. 114.

BANKRUPT ACT—IMPORTANT RULING BY JUDGE LONGYEAR.—In the matter of William Buchanan, an alleged bankrupt, the petition was filed in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, on the 4th of February, 1874. No one appeared in opposition to the said petition, and the matter was adjourned from time to time, and finally came up for hearing on the 3d instant, on motion of John J. Speed for an adjudication of bankruptcy, he maintaining that, under the ruling of District Judge HILL, of Mississippi, the petition need not be amended to conform to the provisions of the amendment made to the bankrupt law, approved June 22, 1874, unless objection is made by the alleged bankrupt. Judge LONGYEAR denied the motion on the ground that he did not consider the court authorized to adjudicate upon a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy filed since December 1, 1873, not made in conformity with said amendment.

COVERTURE AS AN EXCUSE FOR CRIME.—The Beecher investigating committee got slightly off the track when they enunciated the following as a proposition of law: "It is a principle of the common law that a married woman cannot commit or be held to commit a crime perpetrated in the presence of her husband, and this upon the idea that the husband's presence and influence amount to duress, and that she is, therefore, not responsible." The learned counsel of the committee, who no doubt inspired this sentence, must have quoted it from memory. If he had taken the trouble to open the first volume of Bishop's Criminal Law, 5th edition, §§ 362 et seq., he would have found the following propositions enunciated and supported by the citation of numerous authorities: "Whenever the wife, being in the presence of her husband, is presumed to act under coercion, the presumption is only a prima facie one, which may be rebutted by evidence. * * * It follows that whatever the offence may be, the wife, like any other person, may be proceeded against jointly with her husband in the same indictment, and she can rely on the coercion only when the proofs are adduced at the trial."

LIABILITY OF EXPRESS COMPANIES—JUDGE BALLARD'S RECENT DECISION.—Whilst the question of the propriety of the rule laid down by Mr. District Judge BALLARD, in Bank of Kentucky v. Adams Ex. Co., published in our last issue, as to the liability of express companies for the loss of property in railroad accidents, where the common law liability is limited by stipulations in the receipt or bill of lading, continues fresh in the minds of our readers, the following remarks of the Albany Law Jouraal, having reference to shis particular case, will no doubt be read with interest:

In Christenso v. The American Express Company, 2 Am. Rep. 122 (15 Minn. 270), the liability of express companies in case of restriction in the receipt given by them was considered. The facts of this case were these: The defendants were an express company engaged in transmitting from place to place goods for hire, having at different points local agents whose duty it was to receive goods transmitted and deliver the same to the consignee, as well as to receive goods for transmission, having no vehicles or other means of transportation except at their local offices for local purposes, but transmitting goods in charge of their messengers, by steamboats, railroads, coaches, etc., owned and controlled by other parties. Plaintiff's agent delivered to them goods for transportation, taking a receipt, in which it was stipulated that the defendants were not to be liable for any loss or damage except as forwarders only. Nor for perils of navigation and transportation. The steamboat on which the goods were being transported, in consequence of the negligence of those in charge, ran upon a snag and was sunk, thereby injuring the goods. In an action to recover the damages, held that the defendants were common carriers, not forwarders, and as such were liable for the loss, notwithstanding the terms of the receipt which could not cover loss arising from negligence. The rule that express companies, who forward, goods from place to place for hire, in conveyances owned and managed by others, are common carriers and liable for negligence (even where the receipt restricts the liability) in themselves or in the agencies which they employ to transport goods and packages, seems to be supported by the following additional cases. Hooper v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 27 Cal. 11; Lowell Wire Fence Co. v. Sargent, 8 Allen, 189; Sherman v. Wells, 28 Barb. 403; Baldwin v. American Express Company, 23 Ill. 198; 26 id. 504; Read v. Spaulding, 5 Bosw. 395; Haslam v. Adams Express Co., 6 id. 235; Sweet v. Barney, 23 N. Y. 335; Verner v. Sweitzer, 32 Penn. St. 208; Southern Express Co. v. Newby, 36 Ga. 635. In Sweet v. Barney, supra, it was said that "it is conceded that the liability of a carrier begins with the receipt of the goods by him, and continues until the delivery of the goods by him, subject to the general exceptions. And an express carrier is bound to deliver goods at their destined place to the consignee, or as the consignee may direct." That a carrier cannot discharge himself from liability for the consequences of his own negligence, or that of his agents, is established by the following cases: Grace v. Adams. 1 Am. Rep. 131, and note; Ashmore v. Pennsylvania Steam Towing Co., 4 Dutch. 180; Davidson v. Graham, 2 Ohio St. 131; Camden & Amboy Railroad Co. v. Baldauf, 16 Penn. St. 77; Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. McCloskey's Administrators, 23 id. 526.

From these cases the doctrine may be deduced that an express company, even in case of a restricted liability contained in the receipt which it gives for a package, is not exempt from liability where the loss occurs in consequence of the negligence of the railroad or steamboat company which it employs to transport the package, although the package may be in charge of the messenger of the express company traveling on the cars or the steamboat, and although the express company may have no control over the railroad or steamboat company.

FORMER ADJUDICATION—ESTOPPEL—TITLE TO REAL ESTATE.—Every practising lawyer knows the perplexing questions which arise in respect to when former decrees and judgments are a bar to another suit, and has, perhaps, often invoked or combated the doctrine asserted in La Guen v. Gouverneur, 1 Johns. Cases, 492, where it is said: "The principle, however, extends farther. It is not only final as to matter actually determined, but as to every other matter which the parties might litigate in the cause, and which they might have had decided." And this general principle is repeated in similar language in many subsequent cases.

Digitized by Google

In the recent case of Starr v. Stark, in the Circuit Court of the United States for Oregon, Mr. Circuit Judge SAWYER examines this subject with his usual learning and ability, and reaches the conclusion that this general language must be restrained by a consideration of the facts of the cases in which it is used or adopted. The case just mentioned affords an interesting illustration of the tendency of courts in recent times to limit estoppels to cases where the exact point was in issue in the former suit, or failed to be litigated through the negligence of the party bringing the subsequent action. The facts were these: Starr, being in possession of certain lots in Portland, Oregon, filed a bill in chancery against Stark to determine an adverse claim of title by the latter, in which the complainant, as one ground of relief, alleged title derived to himself through a United States patent to the City of Portland, and that defendant claimed title adversely under a subsequent patent to himself. And, as another ground of relief, that the legal title was in defendant under his said subsequent patent; but, that through certain transactions set out, complainant had the equitble right, and was entitled to a conveyance of said legal title. The court, upon motion of defendant, held that the two grounds of action were inconsistent, and could not be litigated together in the same action, and required complainant to elect upon which he would proceed, and omit the other; whereupon, complainant, after excepting to the ruling and order, elected to rely on the first, and withdraw the second. A decree having been rendered in favor of complainant, on the cause of action retained, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Oregon, it was finally reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States, on the ground that the patent to the city was void, and the bill subsequently dismissed in pursuance of the mandate of that court. Complainant, then filed a second bill, alleging the equitable title before set up in the first, and withdrawn in obedience to said order of the court, and prayed a conveyance of the legal title. On these facts it was held, and as it seems to us properly, notwithstanding the dissent of the very learned district judge, that the proceedings and decree in the former action were not a bar to the second action.

Commenting on the case of La Guen v. Gouverneur, supra, SAWYER, J., says: "The principle is, that an end should be put to litigation; that parties should not litigate their rights by piece-meal; that they are bound to be diligent, and when called upon to litigate their claims they ought to present all they have to say, and that it is negligence to omit anything within their knowledge which might be available; and, if an omission is made, the consequences must fall upon the negligent party. Negligence of the party himself is the main element of the principle upon which the rule is founded."

The Forum — Newspaper Credits.

We have received the following communication from the learned editor of the Forum:

In your notice of the Forum in your valuable journal, for August 20, I think you make a slight mistatement. The greatest object of the review is to publish the most recent cases of importance or interest as soon as delivered, and not take them from the latest published reports. With this view we have either the state reporter or some one resident at the state capital, to report them, and if you publish any of the same cases, especially from your state, it occurred from the fact that your journal being weekly and enterprising, gets the cases as soon as delivered, as we do. We will give you credit whenever we take anything from the "CENTRAL." For instance, we give the case of Lewis v. Balto. & Ohio R. R. Another law journal publishes it, and it reached us before our July number came out, but then we had the case reported long before it appeared at all in any place.

"We must also differ with you about arranging our cases by subjects instead of by states. If one desires to see what was decided in his state, without regard to subjects, he has them before him, if he is looking up a particular subject. The index in the back arranges them from all the states. In the way you propose, one in order to find out what his state decided, would have to look circumspectly over the entire abstract of 20 or 30 pages."

In our notice of the Forum, here referred to (ante, p. 421), we had reference to abstracts of decisions, and not to cases reported in full. We said: "We recognize many of these abstracts of decisions as being taken from current legal periodicals, where they are published in full. The editor of the Forum would greatly enhance the value of such by quoting the periodicals from which they are taken, since, in many instances, his readers will want to see the case in full. Besides, this would enable him to give the credit usual among journals in such cases." The above communication of the editor of the Forum renders it perhaps proper that we should particularize. On page 150 of the Forum, for July, is an abstract of the very able decision of the Supreme Court of Michigan in People ex rel. Sutherland v. Badgley. This abstract is the syllabus of the case written by Mr. Justice COOLEY and furnished this journal and published by us in our issue of June 18 (ante, p. 299). It is not unlikely that the Michigan State Reporter may have sent this case to the Forum, with the same syllabus. But the next abstract is that of the decision of Mr. District Judge WITHEY in Warren v. Ives, published in this journal for June 25 (ante, p. 312). This abstract is also the syllabus of the case, and was drawn by one of the editors of this journal. We recognize an abstract on the next page of the Forum, case of Viser v. Scruggs, as being the syllabus of the case as published by us in our issue for June 25 (ante, p. 313). This syllabus was furnished us, together with the case itself, by Mr. Justice SIMRALL of Mississippi. It is not unlikely that he may have furnished it also to the editor of the Forum. The next abstract in the Forum is that of Kellogg v. Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railroad Company. This case was reported especially for this journal, and the abstract in the Forum was written by one of the editors of this journal. The next abstract in the Forum (p. 153) is that of Taylor v. Steamboat Commonwealth. This is the syllabus of the case as published in full in the Chicago Legal News for July 11 (p. 334). It was written by the editor of that paper. Passing on to page 158 of the Forum, we find an abstract of Udderzook's case, decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. This is the syllabus of the case as published in our issue of July 16 (ante, p. 352). It was written by one of the editors of this journal. On the next page we find an abstract of People's Ins. Co. v. Kuhn, Supreme Court of Tennessee. This is the syllabus of the case as published in this journal for April 30 (ante, p. 214). It was prepared for us by Hon. J. O. PIERCE of Memphis.

These and other instances which we might give, will serve to show what was in our minds at the time we wrote the passage above quoted. We do not wish to be understood as assuming the attitude of sticklers for newspaper credits. We simply desired to throw out a friendly suggestion to the editor of the Forum, which he might turn to the advantage of his readers, and which might incidently be a benefit to us.

—THE common law may be called the severity of one remedial system; fiction is the cowardice of the law, and equity is the justice of the law.

Digitized by Google

Bankrupt Act—Discharge—Proportion of Assets to Debts.

Mr. District Judge BLATCHFORD, in re Franke, has recently decided the point that in bankruptcy proceedings, commenced prior to the 31st day of December, 1873, and subsequently to the 1st day of January, 1869, and where all the debts proved against the bankrupt's estate where contracted subsequently to the 31st day of December, 1868, and where application for discharge is not made until after the passage of the act of 1874, the right of the bankrupt to his discharge is subject to the (now repealed) acts of July 27, 1868, and act of July 14, 1870, and that his estate must pay fifty per centum of the debts proved against it, unless a majority of the creditors consent to his discharge. In other words, he holds that section 9 of the act of 1874 is not retroactive, and does not control the bankrupt's right to a discharge in cases which otherwise are subject to the restrictions of the act of 1868 and the act of 1870.

The facts of the case, as stated in Judge BLATCHFORD'S opinion, are as follows: Charles J. Franke, Jr., and Charles F. Franke, were adjudged bankrupt, as co-partners by the court, on the 28th of June, 1872, on a petition filed against them. They appeared and filed a written consent to an adjudication. A warrant was issued, and the first meeting of creditors was held on the 2d of August, 1872. On that day thirty creditors proved their debts. An assignee was elected by the votes of twenty-seven of these. On the 19th of September, 1872, the bankrupts filed their sworn schedule of debts and assets. On the 23d of July, 1874, and not before, they filed a petition for discharge. By the 24th of July, 1874, forty-four creditors had proved their debts. The hearing of the petition for discharge was fixed for the 18th of August, 1874. No creditors appeared to oppose a discharge. The assignee has received moneys belonging to the estate to the amount of $9,996.22. It was not shown that the assets of the bankrupts were equal to fifty per cent. of the claims proved against their estate, upon which they were liable as principal debtors, nor was it shown that the assent in writting of a majority in number and value of their creditors, to whom they had become liable as principal debtors, and who had proved their claims, was filed at or before the time of the hearing of the application for the discharge. According to the schedule, all of the debts were contracted after the 31st of December, 1868. Notwithstanding these facts the register certified that the bankrupts had conformed to their duty under the act of Congress passed in 1867.

According to the act of 1868, no discharge could be granted to debtors whose assets were not equal to fifty per cent. of the claims proved against their estate upon which they were liable as the principal debtors, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of their creditors, to whom they shall have become liable as principal debtors, and who shall have proved their claims, be filed at or before the time of hearing the application. By the first section of the act of July 14, 1870, it is declared that the provisions of the second clause of the thirty-third section of said act of 1867, as amended by the first section of the act of 1868 shall not apply to those debts from which a bankrupt seeks a discharge which were contracted prior to the 1st of of January, 1869. "The requirements of the act of 1868," said the learned judge, "apply to all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after the 1st of January, 1869, whether the petition be one filed by or against the debtor. Under these requirements the right to discharge in this case is not shown; but the certificate of the register implies that it is supposed that because this is a case of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy, discharges may and must under the act of June 22, 1874, be granted without a compliance with the requirements of the act of 1868."

Judge BLATCHFORD has written a lengthy and elaborate opinion on these points, holding that the provisions of the act of 1868 must be complied with before a discharge in bankruptcy can be obtained, and the decision of the register in bankruptcy is overruled.

The Administration of the Law in the South.

The Washington Chronicle, a journal whose political bias certainly would not lead it to draw too strong a picture of this question, thus discusses the manner in which justice is administered in the courts of South Carolina:

From every indication it seems evident that not only in the administration of the affairs of the state, but in the execution of laws and the trial of causes in court, South Carolina is in an unusually unfortunate condition. Serious charges are openly made against the judges and officers of court, and it is said that it is impossible to obtain a just verdict from a jury, and if one is obtaincd the court fails to execute it. The juries are largly sclected from the colored people. Many of them are honest, and desirous to do their duty conscientiously, but ignorant of the most ordinary rules of business, and without any knowledge of law whatever, or any experience in the business transactions of life. It is no uncommon thing, correspondents report, to find half the jury asleep, and in the courts the testimony and arguments are frequenly interrupted by the judge ordering the sheriff to wake up those jurymen. If the judge has not had his dinner, or if having it, it sits heavily upon his stomach and he feels gengenerally annoyed, he sometimes breaks out, after a short stock of patience is exhausted: "Mr. Sheriff, wake up them niggers!"

It is evident that where emancipated slaves are permitted to sit as jurors, a stringent jury law is needed, discriminating closely as to intelligence. We remember a case tried before the late Judge HUDSON, of the Criminal Court of Memphis, where a colored man maliciously pushed a white man off a fishing.boat, and drowned him. The body sank to rase no more, and was not afterwards recovered. This was seen by several witnesses; but a colored jury gravely acquitted the prisoner, on the ground that the corpus delicti had not been proven. Through the ignorance of jurors (and even of judges) in some of the Southern states, the administration of justice has become the grossest farce. The constant failure of justice has broken down the confidence of intelligent people in the judicial tribunals; mob law is hence invoked and encouraged, and the very ends of government are defeated.

There can be no excuse, however, for the failure to enfore the law in those states where the blacks are not predominant, and where the entire administration of the law is in the hands of the whites. We have had instances of mob violence in Missouri, which would be a reproach to savages, and the feeble and cowardly efforts of the authorities to punish them, have been humiliating in the last degree. We will let the Louisville Courier-Journal, which has no interest in misrepresenting its own state, tell how the law is enforced in Kentucky.

The law against the carrying of concealed weapons is a dead letter. Every coward and bully goes armed. Every case of manslaughter goes unpunished. Every case of shooting with intent to kill passes by as an amusing episode, provided there is no funeral. Even the most atrocious, cold-blooded, deliberate, malignant, dastardly assassinations have left no mark on the statute-books except the mark of acquitals purchased by money or intimidation. Red-handed murderers roam at large among respectable people. Red-handed murderers occupy places of responsibility and trust. * * * There are at this moment fifty cases of homicide on our criminal docket, which ought to be recorded as murder cases, where the defendant is at large on bail, with the least possible danger of an adverse result. There are five hundred cases of petty shooting, with intent to kill, which will never come to trial. * * * In a word, there is no security for life, because no law for those who take it, in Kentucky, and has not been this many a year.

Digitized by Google

Any attempt to cure this state of things will be futile, unless the causes which have produced and which perpetuate it are first ascertained. These causes are two-fold: one for which the people are responsible, and the other for which the courts are responsible. So far as the responsibility of the people is concerned, it may be summed up in the simple statement that the popular difficulty in the way of preserving the peace and preventing crime consists in the fact that the law breakers are too numerous and too bold, and the law-abiding too few and too cowardly. So far as the responsibility of the courts is concerned, we may point to the fact that as early as 1822, the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, decided in Bliss v. Commonwealth, 2 Littell, 90, that a statute prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons was unconstitutional; and although this rule has, within a comparatively recent period, been changed in Kentucky, under a different constitution (Hopkins v. Com., 3 Bush, 480; Cutsinger v. Com., 7 Bush, 362), yet it existed for more than a generation, during which time the popular habit of carrying weapons had become inveterate. Since the late war the same court has, in a series of decisions, enunciated the extraordinary and startling doctrine that a man whose life has been threatened by another may kill his adversary "on sight," whenever and wherever he may chance to meet him. Phillips v. The Commonwealth, 2 Duvall, 328; Carico v. The Commonwealth, 7 Bush, 124; Bohannon v. The Commonwealth, 8 Bush, 481. There may be extraordinary occasions and conditions of society where such a principle ought to be applied, but it is our deliberate judgment that society can have no peace wherever, as a general principal of law, such a rule is suffered to prevail.

Right of Recovery where Money is Paid on a Raised Check.

ESPY v. FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF CINCINNATI.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 195, October Term, 1873.

Right of Bank to Recover Money Paid by Mistake on Raised Check—Effect of Bank Officer Pronouncing Such Check "Good."—A check drawn by S. and M. on the bank for $26.50, in favor of H., was raised to $3,920, and the payee's name changed to E. H. & Co., and offered to the latter by a stranger in payment for bonds and gold purchased by him. E. H. & Co. sent the check for information to the bank; whose teller replied "it is good," or "it is all right." In a suit brought by the bank against E. H. & Co. a judgment was given for plaintiff. On error to this court it was held:

1. That where money is paid on a raised check by mistake, neither party being in fault, the general rule is that it may be recovered back as paid without consideration.

2. But that, if either party has been guilty of negligence or carelessness by which the other has been injured, the negligent party must bear the loss.

3. That where a party to whom such a check is offered sends it to the bank on which it is drawn, for information, the law presumes that the bank has knowledge of the drawer's signature and of the state of his account, and it is responsible for what may be replied on these points.

4. That unless there is something in the terms in which information is asked that points the attention of the bank officer beyond these two matters, his response that the check is good will be limited to them, and will not extend to the genuineness of the filling-in of the check as to payee or amount.

5. Quære: Would the endorsement of the word "good," with the officer's initials, under such circumstances, make the bank liable beyond the genuineness of the signature and the possession of funds to meet the check as certified?

6. Where a check is certified for the purpose (known to the bank) of giving it credit for negotiation or circulation, to be used as money, and it so passed into the hands of third persons, the bank would be bound, though the case might be otherwise when it was only certified to give the party presenting it assurance that it was good for his own satisfaction in taking it.

7. But it is clear that a verbal reply that a check is good, given for the information of the party about to receive it, extends only to matters of which the bank had knowledge, or is presumed to have by the law, unless he is told that more extended information is expected or asked for as to the validity of the check.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

Stall & Meyer, customers and depositors with the First National Bank of Cincinnati, made their check on that bank for the sum of $26.50, payable to the order of Mrs. E. Hart, and delivered it to a stranger to all the parties to the transaction out of which this controversy arose This man erased the name of the payee and the amount for which it was given and inserted the name of Espy, Heidelbach & Co., bankers and brokers, and also the sum sum of $3,920, and passed it to Espy, Heidelbach & Co., in payment of bonds and gold which he purchased from them.

The check was paid by the bank through the clearing-house, and the next day the fraud was discovered and the bank made a demand on Espy, Heidelbach & Co. for the amount, as paid through a mistake.

If this were all the case there would be no doubt of their right to recover. The principle that money so paid under a mistake of the facts of the case can be recovered back is well settled; and in the case of raised or altered checks so paid by banks on which they were drawn, there are numerous well considered cases where the right to recover has been established, when neither the party receiving nor the party paying has been in any fault or blame in the matter. Of course if there is fault on the part of the party receiving pay for such a check, it strengthens the right of recovery.

But in the case before us the rights of the parties are to be determined by what took place between themselves before the check was paid. It appears by the bill of exceptions that the man who perpetrated the fraud, having ascertained from Espy, Heidelbach & Co. the price of the bonds and gold which he proposed to buy of them, told them that he had dealings with Stall & Meyer and would get their check for the amount, and after an absence of two or three hours returned the check in question. Not wishing to take it from this stranger without further information, they sent Mr. Snarenberger, one of their clerks, to the bank, with instructions to ascertain if the check was good, and to say that it was presented by a stranger. Snarenberger presented it to Mr. Sanford, the proper officer of the bank, who, after examining the check and the state of Stall & Meyer's account, said "it is good," or "it is all right." "Send it through the clearing-house."

There is a slight disagreement between Snarenberger and Sanford as to the precise words used, but we do not deem the difference of any importance. But there is difference in another point between these two, which with the jury might have had some weight. Snarenberger testifies that he told Sanford that the check was offered to his house by a stranger, which Sanford denies; and Sanford says that he told Snarenberger that if the check was offered by a stranger, he would advise them to have nothing to do with him; that he would be careful and not pay so large at check to a stranger, no matter how good looking he was.

On the return of Snarenberger, Epsy, Heidelbach & Co. delivered the bonds and gold to the stranger and received the check in payment, and in the language of the record, the stranger went his way and was heard of no more. Espy, Heidelbach & Co. endorsed the check, and it was paid as stated already, through the clearing-house.

In the suit brought by the bank to recover the money it had a judgment, to reverse which this suit is brought.

The defendants excepted to the admission of certain testimony given by the plaintiffs on the trial for the purpose of proving that the words "all right," "it is good," when used in reference to a check presented at the bank on which it is drawn, had, by the custom and usages of the bankers of Cincinnati, acquired a limited and well understood meaning, namely, that it had reference exclusively to the genuineness of the drawer's signature and to the state of his account at the bank. The objections made to this evidence were that in its nature it was inadmissible; that the person testifying showed his want of knowledge on the subject, and that the expressions "all right" and "it is good" were not the precise expressions used. But we need not enquire whether the court was right in admitting this testimony, because in the subsequent progress of the trial it became immaterial. The court refused to charge the jury, as requested by the plaintiffs in their fifth and sixth prayers, that if there was such an understanding among bankers as to the use of the terms mentioned, it limited the responsibility of the bank to these two matters; and in the charge of the court of its own motion, it placed the case beyound the influence of such testimony, by instructing the jury that as matter of law such was the effect of the words supposed, when used under the circumstances suggested by the interrogations of plaintiff's counsel in regard to the understanding of them among bankers.

Digitized by Google

We are relieved also, by an attentive consideration of the instructions given by the court, from another very grave question much discussed by counsel in this court, that is, whether a verbal statement, by the proper officer to certify checks, that the one presented is good, is, or is not, the equivalent of a written certification of the check in the usual manner. For the fourth instruction asked by the defendants and granted by the court is precisely what is claimed by counsel here as to the effect of such verbal statement, as will be seen at once by its inspection. It is as follows: "A verbal certification of a check is equally valid with a written certification, and constitutes a contract obligatory on the party giving the certification, the consideration of which is the property parted with by the party receiving the certification on the faith of the certification." The plaintiff in error, against whom the jury rendered their verdict, notwithstanding the instruction thus given, must be held to have had the benefit of the principle thus asserted with the jury, whether the court was right in giving it or not.

The plaintiffs on the trial below prayed ten distinct instructions to the jury, all of which were granted except the fifth and sixth, which we have considered. The defendants prayed eight instructions, all of which were refused or modified except the fourth, to which attention has just been called. Upon all these rulings of the court as well as upon the charge of the court of its own motion, errors are assigned.

But we are of opinion that the whole case turns upon the latter charge of the court. This consisted of four distinct propositions:

1. That if defendants below sent the check to the bank for the purpose of having the latter pass upon the genuineness of the signature and the state of the account of the drawer, the statement that it was good, or all right, would estop them from denying that the signature was genuine, and there were funds to meet it.

2. If defendants sent the check for the purpose of testing the genuineness of the signature of the drawers, the state of their account, and to test its genuineness in all other respects, and plaintiff knowing the full extent of the object for which it was sent, replied "it is good," or "it is all right," plaintiff is estopped to set up that the check was raised.

3. That if the defendants had no suspicion that the check was raised, and sent it to plaintiffs for examination without specifying the particulars to which they wished the examination directed, the plaintiffs had a right to presume that it was desired in relation to such points as the law presumed them to have knowledge, namely: the genuineness of the drawer's signature and the state of his account, and if they answered in good faith and had no means other than those of defendants of knowing that the check was raised, they were not estopped from setting up that fact.

4. That if the parties were mutually ignorant and unsuspicious concerning the check being raised, the law did not impose upon plaintiffs more than the defendants, the duty of calling on the drawers for information on that subject.

The plaintiffs in error, defendants below, can have no cause to complain of the first and second proposition laid down by the court below.

If the bank officers had their attention turned to the matter of the raising of the check, or even had notice that, in applying to them for information, the parties presenting it did so for the purpose of getting information which would include that subject, they could have limited their general statement that it was good so as to exclude its application to that point, or might have declined answering altogether. If, with this notice, says the court, they gave a general statement that the check was good, or all right, these words must be held to have reference to all the matters on which they knew the other party asked or desired their opinion. Unless we are prepared to hold, to the fullest extent, the principle asserted by the plaintiffs in error, that the general statement that the check is good binds the party making it as to everything connected with its validity; this charge of the court is as favorable to them as it should have been, and is only doubtful as it militates against the bank.

We think it is equally clear on principle that there was no error in the fourth proposition of the court. Undoubtedly, where there exists a suspicion that the check has been altered in the amount, or in the name of the payee, the proper party to be enquired of is the maker of the check. He and he alone has the means of settling that question conclusively. The bank, as a general rule, can know this no better than the party to whom it is presented for negotiation. It is the latter who first parts with his money or property on the faith of the check, and he is as much bound to diligent enquiry on that question as the bank. The latter is held by law to know the drawer's signature and the state of his account. He is no more bound to know or to answer beyond these two matters than the party who presents it for information. So if there be no suspicion of the fraud in raising the check, the parties are equally innocent, and no question of the relative degree of diligence in making enquiry on that subject arises between them. This is certainly true unless the bank, if it consents to give any information at all about the validity of the check, is bound to answer as to everything which may affect its validity. As this contention is the turning point of the case and is the one which is responded to in the third of the propositions laid down by the court, we turn now to consider that.

This assumes that neither party had any suspicion that the check was raised, and that no special reference was made to that point in the enquiry of the defendants below. It is also to be considered that the bank was not asked to certify it in the usual way by endorsing it as good, and that the party who asked information was the one whose name was in the check as payee. We do not propose to decide here what would have been the legal effect in the present case if the bank officer had, under precisely these circumstances, been requested to endorse the check as good and had done so, affixing his name or his initials in the ordinary way.

The strong argument of plaintiff in error is that such an endorsement would bind the bank for the entire validity of the check, and that what was said verbally by Sandford was the legal equivalent of such an endorsement. If this latter point were conceded, no case precisely in point has been produced where this would be held to bind the bank under the circumstances of the present case. The authorities relied on are mainly acceptances of drafts or bills of exchange, and it is the same class of cases that are relied on to show that a verbal acceptance, or promise to accept, is equivalent to a written acceptance. The highest courts in this country and in England have regretted the decision which gave original sanction to this latter proposition.—Boyce v. Edwards, 4 Peters, 122; Johnson v. Collins, 1 East. 103.

Digitized by Google

Bank checks are not bills of exchange, and though the rules applicable to each are in many respects the same, they differ in important particulars. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wallace, 647. Among these particulars is that a check is drawn against funds on deposit with the banker, and the endorsement that it is good implies that when the endorsement is made there were funds there to pay it. A bill of exchange is not drawn on such deposits necessarily, and its acceptance raises no implication that the drawer has such funds to meet it. It is a new promise by the acceptor to pay, funds or no funds. In both cases the bank is supposed to know the signature of its correspondent, and cannot, after endorsing it as good or accepted, dispute the signature. But as one of the main elements of utility in a bill of exchange is that it shall circulate freely, and it may thus pass through many hands on the faith of the acceptor's signature, it may possibly be that he should be responsible for the promise contained in it, as it came from his hands, for it was drawn on no special fund, and the possession of such fund by him does not affect his liability. By such acceptance he becomes primarily liable, as if he were the maker of a promissory note. How far these reasons should be applied to a certification that a check was good, seems extremely doubtful, both on principle and authority. Where the object is to use the endorsement to put the check in circulation, or raise money on it, or use it as money, and this object is known to the certifying bank, it may be argued with some force that the bank should, as in the case of an acceptance of a bill of exchange, be held responsible for the validity of the check as it came from the hands of the certifying bank. Such a rule would seem to be just when the checks are certified, as we know they often are, without reference to the presence of funds by the drawer, and when the well-known purpose is to give the drawer a credit by enabling him to use the check as money by putting it in circulation.

But such a verbal statement as was made in the present case cannot come within that principle. There was no design or intent on the part of the bank to assume a responsibility beyond the funds of the drawer in their hands, nor to enable the payee of the check to put it into circulation. Nothing was said or done by the bank officer which could be transferred with the check as part of it to an innocent taker of it from the payee. Such subsequent taker would have no right to rely on what was said by the bank officers, any further than the payee would.

We are of opinion that the court was entirely right in treating the case as one in which information was sought and obtained by Epsy, Heidelbach & Co., for their own use, and to govern their own action. For such information as the bank was willing to give, and did give, it was, no doubt, responsible, because it had reason to believe that the other party would act upon it. But only to this extent and only on this principle is it liable. It is not liable as for accepting or endorsing a draft or check with intent that it might go upon the market for general use and negotiation with the credit of its name attached to the paper just as it was placed on the market.

Under these circumstances we are of opinion that the circuit court was right in holding that in the absence of anything tending to direct his attention to other matters, the bank officer had a right to suppose that the information was desired of him only in regard to the signature of the drawers and the state of their account. These were material facts to be known, which both common sense and commercial law presumed to be within his knowledge. The answer he gave that the check was good, or was all right, must be supposed to be responsive only to these two points. The genuineness of the payee's name, and of the sum filled in the body of the check, were as well-known and as easily ascertainable by the payees themselves as by the bank officer, and unless the enquiry was so framed as to call his attention to these points, he had no reason to suppose, in the nature of the transaction, that he was expected to give information in regard to them. So the response of "good" should not on sound principle be held to extend to them. He was under no moral or legal obligation to give an opinion on these points. He had no reason to suppose that he was asked for such an opinion, and because he did give an opinion that the check was good in the only points of which he knew anything, it would be illogical to hold the bank liable on the ground that the response meant good absolutely and for all purposes.

The court told the jury very clearly that if the bank officer had any reason to believe that the defendants were seeking information in regard to the general validity of the check, or if they had been asked any question which related to the genuineness of the check as to amount or the names of the payees, his statement that it was all right would bind the bank. This was as far as the court ought to have gone in that direction, for they were not bound to answer such a question, nor, as we have already said, does the law or the nature of the business imply that they had any superior information on these points to that which the defendants had.

The case was certainly very fairly put before the jury, so far as the rights of plaintiffs in error are concerned, if the views here advanced are sound, and the judgment must be

AFFIRMED.

Remedy by Assignee in Bankruptcy Against Stockholders of Insolvent Corporations for Unpaid Stock.

NATHANIEL MYERS, ASSIGNEE OF ST. LOUIS SOAP COMPANY, v. F. A. SEELEY et al.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Missouri.

Before Hon. SAMUEL TREAT, District Judge.

1. Rights of Creditors against Stockholders.—The remedy in equity of judgment-creditors of insolvent corporations against the stockholders who have not paid in full for their stock, stated and discussed.

2. Bill in Equity by Assignee of Bankrupt Corporation Against Stockholders.—The assignee in bankruptcy of an insolvent corporation cannot maintain a bill in equity in the District Court against the stockholders of such corporation to collect assessments upon their unpaid stock; because such a bill would necessarily require the appointment of a receiver who could not be the plaintiff in the suit, and would hence supersede the regular bankruptcy proceedings. The proper course is for the district judge to order an assessment upon all unpaid stock to be collected by the assignee.

Bill in equity by the assignee of a bankrupt corporation against the stockholders to collect the amount alleged to be due on their respective shares of stock.

Meyers & Litton, for plaintiff; S. M. Breckenridge, Ira C. Terry, Lee & Adams, for defendants.

TREAT J.—The bill is by the assignee of a bankrupt corporation, against certain stockholders, to compel payment by them of the amount alleged to be due on their respective shares of stock. Many of the parties defendant have not been served, and many responsible stockholders are not made defendants.

Bills by creditors who have judgments against a corporation have been sustained against the corporation and its stockholders. Said bills being framed in the name of the judgment-creditors and of all others who may choose to come in and be made parties thereto. In such cases the decree has been for an account to be taken of the debts and assets of the corporation, for the appointment of a receiver, to whom the stockholders and officers are ordered to pay and account respectively for so much of the assets and capital stock as are necessary to pay the debts due to the creditors; the assets thus collected and received to be applied by the receiver in discharge of the debts.

The reason of that rule is, that the unpaid subscriptions are assets applicable to the payment of corporate debts which the corporate authorities may call in for corporate purposes. If there are adequate assets other than said calls, then the creditor has no legal or equitable right to insist upon such calls. Primarily, the amount due on subscriptions is a debt to the corporation which it alone can enforce. and unless the corporation is without other assets to meet its obligations, and fails to make the needed calls, creditors cannot interpose. When the facts justify their interposition, an account of assets and debts should be taken in order that it may be known what, if any, calls should be made. No further call should be made than what is sufficient, together with the other assets to meet all debts; for the bill by creditors cannot reach beyond the satisfaction of their demands. They have no other equity. Adler v. The Milwaukee Patent Brick Manufacturing Co., 13 Wis. 57.

Digitized by Google

If a company is insolvent, the original mode of making calls upon the stock is not to be pursued in the enforcement of such a decree; for the debt is then due on the stock without demand, and no stockholder can shelter himself behind an agreement that he might pay otherwise than in money, or money value, as other stockholders have to do.

Every share of stock subscribed represents an asset available to the corporation and its creditors. The payment of it in full, that is, actual cash payment, or payment of cash value, is enforceable. As between the corporation and its stockholders, its agreement as to paid up stock may be valid, but neither directors nor stockholders, nor both, can so act towards creditors as to debar the latter from insisting upon the actual payment by stockholders of what is really due on their stock.

The assignee of shares can be in no better condition than the assignor. The transfer is not, so far as the right to make calls is concerned, dependant upon the good faith of assignor and assignee in their dealings between themselves.

The question is simply whether the stock has been really paid in full to the corporation. The assignee may have paid for it to the assignors, and may have relied on the representations of the latter, and of officers of the company, that the shares bought were fully paid; yet creditors are not bound thereby, and if the stock was not fully paid, the holder is liable to creditors for the amount remaining unpaid.

The foregoing rules are clear enough for all ordinary cases brought by creditors; yet here as stated in the case cited from 13 Wis., and in the case of Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How. 380—where the corporation is in bankruptcy, what is the proper course to be pursued? The assignee in bankruptcy has all the authority of a receiver to collect demands and pay debts; the proceedings in bankruptcy are adjusting the accounts, and the court sitting in the bankrupt case is proceeding to ascertain what calls, if any, will be necessary. If this suit in equity (and it might have been brought in the United States Circuit Court) is to result in a decree for an account, etc., shall the decree take from the court sitting in bankruptcy all further cognizance of those matters, or in other words, shall the Court of Equity draw into its jurisdiction and supersede all the powers and functions of the court in bankruptcy, specially charged by law with the collection and distribution of the assets of this insolvent corporation?

This suit is by the assignee in bankruptcy, and under the orders of the court appointing him, an assessment may be made on the unpaid shares, just as if the same had been ordered by the corporation before bankruptcy, for he represents the corporation for the collection of all its assets. He represents also the creditors who are not bound by any agreement between the corporation and its stockholders, whereby the latter were to be considered as holding full paid stock. Hence, to now order an account to be taken by a master and to appoint a receiver, etc., would be virtually to supersede the pending proceedings in bankruptcy.

The proper course seems to be to dismiss the bill without prejudice, and order an assessment on all unpaid stock to be collected by the assignee; otherwise the proceedings will be embarrassed at every stage.

As the assignee is plaintiff, the court cannot appoint him receiver; and if he is to be superseded in the administration, what is to become of his powers and duties, and also of the ordinary and regular proceedings in bankruptcy? The powers and duties devolved by the bankrupt act seem necessarily to make a distinct proceeding in equity improper—to supersede that mode of satisfying creditors' demands against an insolvent corporation which has been adjudged bankrupt.

NOTE.—To avoid any difficulty arising from the two years' limitation clause in the bankrupt law, which might prevent the bringing by the assignee of new suits against the individual stockholders, to recover payment of the unpaid stock on their respective shares, the court, instead of formally dismissing the bill, as indicated in the opinion, subsequently directed "that the bill be retained for further proceedings thereunder on the following order: That the assignee proceed to collect from all stockholders of said company the amount due and unpaid on their respective shares." As to the general right of creditors and of the assignee in bankruptcy against the delinquent stockholders of a bankrupt corporation, see Sawyer v. Hoag, ante, p. 43.

Taking Private Property for Railroads.

CALIFORNIA PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY v. ARMSTRONG.

Supreme Court of California, April Term, 1874.

Hon. WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Chief Justice.
" JOSEPH CROCKETT, } Associate
" ADDISON C. NILES, } Justices.
" AUGUSTUS L. RHODES, } Justices.
" ISAAC S. BELCHER, } Justices.

1. Eminent Domain—Taking Property for Railroads—Damages where the Track is Laid before Condemnation.—Although a railroad company enters upon land and lays its track thereon before having it condemned in the proper proceeding, yet, upon proceedings afterwards instituted to condemn the land, the owner will not, under the California statute, be entitled to have the track so laid considered as a part of his realty, and its value considered in estimating the "just compensation" he is to receive. In this case the railroad company entered upon the land, pending a former proceeding, to condemn the same, which was dismissed.

2. ——. ——. "Special Benefits."—The "special benefits" mentioned in the California statute, are not confined simply to those benefits which are special to the particular tract of land taken, but include benefits which the track receives from the construction of the road, in common with other contiguous lands which are not taken for railroad purposes.

Opinion by CROCKETT J., WALLACE, Ch. J., BELCHER and NILES, JJ., concurring. RHODES, J., in a qualified concurrence.

This is a proceeding to condemn land for railroad purposes; and it appears in the case that, in the year 1868, the plaintiffs commenced a similar proceeding for the purpose of condemning the particular tract in contest here, and other lands; and obtained an order of court allowing them to enter upon and retain the possession of said tract pending the proceedings, and duly filed a bond as required by the statute in such cases. It further appears that, before the hearing in the present proceeding, the former proceeding was dismissed as to this tract; and that "before the commencement of this proceeding" the plaintiffs had constructed upon the land a railroad track, at their own expense, of the value of $2,211 24 without the consent of the then owner of the land, from whom the present defendant purchased. It is not expressly stated that the track was built whilst the order made in the proceeding of 1868, authorizing the plaintiffs to enter upon and retain the possession, was in force; but we infer that such was the fact. Nor does it appear on what ground, or for what reason, the former proceeding was dismissed. The commissioners in the present case assessed the value of the land, at the commencement of the action, at the sum of $403 50, exclusive of the railroad track; which they estimate to be to value of $2,211 24. This being a portion of the larger tract, they estimate the damages to that portion not taken at $1,112 50, and the benefits which accrued to the part not taken, "by the enhancement of the value thereof in consequence of the construction of the railroad (there being no special benefits), at the sum of $1,112 50." The court below held that the value of the railroad track, constructed by the plaintiffs, ought not to be estimated as a part of the land taken, and excluded it from the computation; and also held that the benefits to the land not taken should be set off against the damages thereto. These rulings constitute the grounds of error relied upon on this appeal.

Digitized by Google

The argument on behalf of the defendant on the first point is, that the plaintiffs, in constructing the railroad track, were trespassers, and that the track, being attached to the soil, became a part of the realty, and belonged to the owner of the land. Hence, he claims that its value ought to be included in the estimate of damages, in like manner as though the defendent had himself built the road. But this proposition cannot be maintained. Neither the constitution nor the statute contemplates that a person, whose land is taken in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, shall be entitled to anything beyond a "just compensation." He is to be paid the damage he actually suffers and nothing more. But to hold that, in addition to the fair value of the land taken, and such other damage as he may suffer by severing it from the remainder of his tract, he shall also recover the value of a railroad track in the construction of which he never expended a dollar, and which was built by the plaintiffs at their own expense, would be to defeat the obvious intent of the statute by an over-technical construction of it.

On the second point, the proposition is that it appears from the report of the commissioners that there were no special benefits to the lands not taken, resulting from the construction of the railroad; though they also find that it will thereby be enhanced in value in the sum of $1,112 50. From this the defendant's counsel deduce the argument that, inasmuch as this land will only be benefited in common with other contigous lands, and will receive no benefit peculiar to itself, it does not come within the rule which requires benefits to be set off against damages. In other words they insist, that the benefits must be special and peculiar to the particular tract—something different from, and in excess, of the benefits resulting to other adjoining lands. But there is no valid reasons for this distinction. The theory of the statute is that the land-owner shall receive a fair, just compensation for the damage he suffers; and if that portion of his tract which is not taken will be enhanced in value by the construction of the railroad, his damages will be diminished to the extent of the enhancement; and hence the statute contemplates that by deducting this benefit from the damages, the sum which remains will constitute a "just compensation" in the sense of the constitution. This was the view of the question announced in the case of The San Francisco, Alameda and Stockton Railroad Company v. Caldwell, 31 Cal., 367, which is decisive of the point.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

I dissent from the conclusion announced on the first proposition.

RHODES, J.

NOTE.—We published some time since (ante, p. 124), a note of a case, United States v. A Tract of Land, etc., where the government had forcibly taken possession of a tract of land for light-house purposes, and, after having built a light-house thereon, instituted proceedings to condemn it. The same court held that the light-house became annexed to the soil, belonged to the owner, and that its value was to be estimated in fixing the damages. This is no doubt good common law, but there is no sense in it. It is a lingering barbarism which ought to be repealed. Justice and sense in such a case would have been satisfied with giving the owner the actual value of the land, exclusive of the light-house, and also the damages he had actually suffered by reason of the trespass.

We publish the foregoing case at the request of several subscribers.

Lease—Assignment by Lessor as Secu ity—Rights of Such Assignee Against the Assignee in Bankruptcy.

DANIEL F. MEADOR et al. v. R. D. EVERETT, ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY OF L. H. CLARK.

United States Circuit Court, Western District of Missouri, August, 1874.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge.

The assignment, transfer and delivery of a lease by the lessor to secure a debt, is valid as against the assignee in bankruptcy of the lessor.

In the bankruptcy proceedings against L. H. Clark in the District Court, the petitioners, Daniel F. Meador and his copartners, filed a petition in the nature of a bill in equity for the enforcement of a lien, to which the district court sustained a demurrer and dismissed petition.

The petitioners, Meador & Co., appeal from this action of the district court.

Their petition as filed in the district court, in substance states that, in July, 1870, the complainants sold to L. H. Clark, one of the bankrupts, certain furniture to be used in his hotel at Kansas City, for the sum of $6,731.90, for which said Clark executed six notes for $1,000 each, payable in 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 months from date, and one note for $731.90, payable eight months from date; that the same having been proved against the estate of said Clark, that on the 1st of May, 1870, Clark executed a lease of said hotel to one John C. Parks for five years; that Parks took possession of the property under the lease July 1, 1870; that the lease was duly recorded July 8, 1870; that on the 7th of July, 1870, said Clark, to secure the payment of said notes, assigned, transferred and delivered possession of said lease to complainants with the consent of said Parks; that on the 6th of July, 1870, said Clark gave complainants a power of attorney to receive and collect the rents accruing to said Clark under the lease, until their debt should be paid, and thereby authorized and empowered them to do and perform all in reference to said lease that said Clark himself could do; that on the 6th of July, 1870, as a further security, and a further recognition of the assignment of said lease from said Parks, said Clark drew his bill of exchange for $6,731.90 on said Parks, who accepted the same, thereby becoming liable for said debt, and agreeing to apply the rent of said building to its payment, as the same became due; that said Everett, as assignee, now has possession of said hotel; and that by reason of the premises complainants have a lien upon the rents of said hotel and pray that the assignee be required to rent said hotel for ——months, the proceeds to be applied to the payment of their debt, and for general relief.

W. B. Napton, Jr., for the petitioners (appellants); Lay & Belch, for the assignee in bankruptcy.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—The bankrupt, owning a hotel, made a lease of it for five years to one Parks, reserving rent. Being indebted to the petitioners, the bankrupt, to secure them, it is alleged, "assigned, transferred and delivered possession of said lease to the petitioners, with the consent and sanction of said Parks, the lessee." At the same time it is further alleged, that "the bankrupt executed to the plaintiffs a power of attorney to receive and collect the rents accruing under the said lease, and to do and perform all acts with reference to said lease that the said lessor himself could do." And it is further alleged that the lessee accepted the lessor's bill in the plaintiffs' favor for the amount of their debt against the lessor, said bill to be paid out of the rents as they fall due. No copy of the lease or assignment, or power of attorney is in the record, but according to the averrments it must be taken that the assignment was in writing. In the absence of the written assignment and instrument I can do no more than to indicate the legal rights of the parties upon the facts set forth in the plaintiff's petition.

If the transaction between the bankrupt and the plaintiffs gave to the latter any rights or equities in respect to the rents or the demised property, the assignee in bankruptcy takes the estate subject thereto. In this respect he stands precisely in the place of the bankrupt. Assuming the allegations of the petition to be true, they show in the plaintiffs, as against the bankrupt, such rights in respect to the rents or demised property as the law will recognize and protect. It is well settled that it is competent for the lessor to separate, by contract or devise, the rent from the reversion, retaining one and disposing of the other, or disposing of the rent to one person and the reversion to another. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 338, where many cases are collected.

Whatever the contract between the bankrupt and the plaintiffs show the former disposed of to the latter, will be binding upon the former and his assignee in bankruptcy. In Russel v. Russel, 1 Brown Ch. R. 269, it was decided that the pledge of a lease by the lessor, by delivery merely, was in equity a mortgage of the leasehold estate as against the assignee in bankruptcy. Much more clearly would this be the case where there was an express assignment and delivery of the lease by the lessor to secure a debt. In ex parte Wells, 1 Vesey, 162, Lord Chancellor THURLOW said, "an assignment of rents and profits is an odd way of conveying, but it amounts to an equitable lien, and would entitle the assignee to come into equity and insist upon a mortgage."

Digitized by Google

The petition states a case which prima facie as to the demised estate puts the plaintiffs, so far as neccessary to secure payment of their debt against the bankrupt, in the place of the bankrupt, and therefore the demurrer of the assignee ought to have been disallowed.

The extent of the plaintiffs' rights I can not determine in the absence of the lease, the assignment and power of attorney. I only hold that the petition makes a case giving, to some extent at least, a lien which the bankruptcy court should respect. I see no reason why the rights of the plaintiffs and assignee may not be well determined upon the petition of the plaintiffs.

The order sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition is reversed, and the district court directed to permit the assignee to answer the petition if he shall be so advised.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

Municipal Corporations—Power to Tax.

A. L. SLACK, ADMINISTRATOR, v. JAMES S. RAY, ASSESSOR AND COLLECTOR.

Supreme Court of Louisiana, July 25, 1874.

Power to Tax Construed.—The grant to a municipal corporation of the full power to tax, gives, by implication, authority to use all necessary means to effectuate the object, including the imposition of appropriate penalties, such as is used by the state in collecting other taxes.

Appeal from Parish Court, Parish of Ouachita.

A. L. Slack, for plaintiff; W. W. Farmer, for defendant.

The opinion of the court was delivered by WYLY, J.—The plaintiffs enjoined the tax-collector from selling certain property, belonging to the succession represented by him, for taxes due the city of Monroe for the year 1873, and also for the penalties for non-payment of said taxes. The court dissolved the injunction as to the taxes, but maintained it in relation to the penalties. From this judgment the defendant, the tax-collector, has appealed. That the state can collect taxes and impose penalties for non-payment thereof, after giving due notice, was recently decided by this court in several cases, especially in the case of Morrison v. Larkin, tax collector. Indeed the proposition is not denied by the plaintiff. It is denied, however, that this right has been conferred on the city of Monroe by the state, and therefore, the defendant has no authority to sell the property of the plaintiff.

Looking to the charter of Monroe we find section 25, which provides:

"That for the purpose of levying and collecting taxes and licenses, the mayor and city council are hereby invested with full power to pass all laws, not inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, or of this state, to compel the payment, by compulsory process, of all taxes or licenses which may be due; and they are hereby authorized to confer on the assessor and collector power sufficient to carry into effect the laws and ordinances pertaining to the levying and collecting of such licenses and taxes." Acts 1871, p. 242.

We think this section confers full authority on the city of Monroe to assess and collect taxes, and to impose penalties for non-payment of taxes. The grant of full power to tax carries with it authority to use all means necessary to accomplish the object, and the imposition of penalties after due notice for non-payment of taxes is a legitimate means of collecting revenue, and it is a means employed by the state in collecting its taxes. The state can confer this power because there is no limitation in the constitution inhibiting it.

As the state can collect, in a summary manner, its taxes and the penalties for non-payment thereof after due notice, it can confer the same power on the political corporation which it employs in administering the government.

There is no force in the objection that section 25 of the charter of the city of Monroe is not covered by the title, and therefore repugnant to article 114 of the constitution, and void.

The title of the charter is: "An act to incorporate the city of Monroe; to fix its boundaries; to provide for the government, and create a recorder's court for the same." The statute would fail "to provide for the government" of the city of Monroe if it failed to authorize the levy and collection of taxes for the support thereof.

There are other objections, but they are without weight. It is therefore ordered that the judgment appealed from be amended so as to dissolve entirely the injunction sued out by the plaintiff, and as amended that it be affirmed, appellee paying costs of both courts.

NOTE.—Power to establish fire limits—The same court, in The Mayor, etc., of Monroe v. Hoffman, held that the right to establish fire limits is given among the municipal powers granted to the incorporation, and that the right to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings carries with it, necessarily, the right to remove them when constructed in violation of the prohibition.

We are indebted for the above case to W. W. Farmer, Esq., of Monroe, La.

Admirality Pleading—Libel in Personam—Description of Vessel.

HENRY K. MORREN v. PATRICK KEEN et al.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Michigan, August 4, 1874.

Before Hon. JOHN LONGYEAR, District Judge.

1. Description of Lake Vessel in Libel in Personam.—In a libel in personam against the owners of a lake vessel, it is sufficient to describe the vessel as "the barge Illinois, her boats," etc., without alleging that the vessel is of twenty tons burden or upwards, or that it is enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, or that it is employed in the business of commerce and navigation, or is capable of being so employed, or without alleging in any other manner that the vessel, her boats, etc., are of such a maritime character as to entitle the court to entertain jurisdiction in the premises.

On demurrer to libel. The libel is in personam against the respondents as owners of "the barge Illinois, her boats," etc., for supplies. There is no other or further description of the vessel set up in the libel than that above quoted. The grounds of the demurrer were 1. That it is not alleged in the libel that the vessel was of twenty tons burden or upwards; 2. nor that the vessel was enrolled or licensed for the coasting trade; 3, nor that the vessel was mployed in the business of commerce and navigation, or was capable of being so employed; 4, nor in any manner that the vessel, her boats, etc., were of such a maratime character to entitle the court to entertain jurisdiction in the premises.

Mr. F. H. Canfield, for the demurrer; Mr. H. B. Brown, opposed.

LONGYEAR, J.—The libel is in the usual form of libels in personam under the general maritime law. 2 Conk. Adm. 478, et seq., 482, 488; Ben. Adm. 2d ed., 554 (No, 83). The allegations, the absence of which constitute the first three grounds of demurrer, were necessary in order to confer jurisdiction under the act of Congress of February 26, 1845 (5 Stat. at Large, 726), entitled "An act extending the jurisdiction of the district courts to certain cases upon the lakes and navigable waters connecting the same." 2 Conk. Adm. 491, and note a. But the supreme court in the case of The Eagle (8 Wall. 15), adopting the only logical conclusion from their earlier decision in the case the of Genessee Chief (12 How., 443), authoritively decides that general admiralty jurisdiction was not limited in this country to tide waters, but extended to the lakes and the navigable waters connecting them, and hence that the act of 1845 was insperative and ineffectual, with the exception of the clause which gives either party the right of trial by jury when requested. Since that decision, the limitations as to jurisdiction imposed by the act of 1845 have had no existence, and the necessity of inserting in the libel the allegation in question has ceased; and consequently, a libel which is sufficient under the general maritime law, is now sufficient in cases upon the lakes and their connecting waters. See the General Cass, 4 Ch. Leg. News, 89, S. C. 5 Am. L. T. 12. The first, second and third grounds of demurrer are therefore not well taken.

Digitized by Google

As to the fourth ground of demurrer, I find no adjudications or opinions of text writers upon the point; but judging from the forms adopted and universally used from an early period in admiralty jurisprudence down to the present time, it seems to have always been considered sufficient to describe a vessel in a libel, whether in rem or in personam, as the ship, barque, sloop, schooner, steamboat, steamer, barge, or as the case may be, giving her name, without further specification or qualification. See 2 Conk., Adm. 490, note a. These terms seem always to have been considered sufficient to denote the maritime character of the subject. In their ordinary meaning they signify maritime things, and, independently of the consideration of long usage, the use of those terms alone is no doubt sufficient to confer jurisdiction without further description or qualification. The rest follow by necessary implication. If the fact be different, it must be taken advantage of by way of special allegation, and cannot be by way of demurrer. The fourth ground of demurrer is, therefore, also not well taken.

The demurrer must be overruled, with costs of the demurrer to libelant, with leave to respondents to answer the libel on condition of payment of the costs of the demurrer, including a counsel fee of $10.

DEMURRER OVERRULED.

[Communicated.]

Some of the Dying Glories of the Common Law.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., August 31, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—On the 27th of August, under the heading "Some of the Dying Glories of the Common Law," it seems to me that you are a too severe. If we examine the reasons for the common law rules in slander, we find much good sense in them, in the light of surrounding customs. To charge a man directly with an indictable crime at common law, subjected the false accusor to an action, because it subjected the party slandered to hue and cry and consequent imprisonment, wherein habeas corpus, bail and speedy trial did not figure so readily as now, as well as to the obloquy which followed. The law properly implied damages, at least nominal, to prevent false clamor. Bacon Abridgement, Title, Slander, B. On the other hand, words which imply crime, as "he is forsworn," are not actionable unless spoken concerning a judicial proceeding; while to say that a man is per jured involves a direct charge of crime and is actionable.

The only doubt there would seem to be about the good sense of the common law rule, is the above exception to the general rule in all cases, that damage must accrue before there is a right of action, which makes any class or kind of slander actionable without averment and proof of actual damage. If a man set fire to his field and it burns into his neighbors field, doing no harm, he is liable to no action. If, on the contrary, the fire burns his neighbor's barn, he has a right of action against the one who started the fire. That fixes a uniform rule of consequential damage at common law, to which a limited class of verbal slanders forms an exception. It is difficult to see the difference between the fire in the field and the fire from the tongue. There were reasons for the common law exceptions in slander, which have no force in this country.

If I comprehend you rightly, you, as well Judge HUMPHRIES, who delivered the opinion in the case of Mrs. Pollard, seem to give the impression that to charge one with fornication or adultery is not actionable at any event; and you soundly berate the common law for its faults. In a practice of twenty-three years I have never failed to sustain actions for such slanders; and when the lady was of good repute, never failed to secure heavy damages. It belongs to that class of cases in which you must aver and prove special damage. And it is always possible among a lady's friends to prove that some one shunned her society on account of the slander, or that she lost an opportunity of favorable marriage. The loss of an acquaintance is sufficient to give the right of action. See precedent for it, 2 Chitty's Pleading, 641. The special damage sufficient to support an action, must be a certain actual loss (as of a particular marriage) or the acquaintance or friendship of some specified person. 1 Rol. Ab. 36; 1 Lev. 261; 2 Bos. and Pul. 284; 1 Saund. 243; 3 B. and P. 372-4-6: 1 Taunt. 39; Bacon Ab. Slander C.; 8 T. R. 130. See also precedent for charging a governess with fornication, 2 Chitty's Pleading, 641 b.

In Mrs. Pollard's case it seems the loss of it was more the fault of the lawyer than the law; for he surely could have proved, and must have done so, special damage, to have recovered $10,000; otherwise even in actionable (per se) slander, his damage must have been nominal. Why did he not aver it and save his case? If his client did not suffer damage, she ought not to have her action; if she did, let her aver it, and she has a case in which the judgment cannot be arrested.

The rule is laid down in the 1st vol. of Chitty's Pleading, page 395, as follows: "Damages are either general or special. General damages are such as the law implies or presumes to have accrued from the wrong complained of; special damages are such as really took place, and are not implied by law, and are eithersuper added to general damages arising from an act injurious in itself, as when some particular loss arises from uttering of slanderous words, actionable in themselves, or are such as arise from an act indifferent, and not actionable in itself, but injurious only in consequences." At page 396, the same author says: "So, in an action for words, not actionable in themselves, but becoming so only in respect of particular damage." And again at page 397, he says: If an action be brought for words, not in themselves actionable, and the plaintiff does not prove the special damage laid in the declaration, he will be non-suited, because the special damage is in such case the gist of the action; but when the words are of themselves actionable, the jury must find for the plaintiff, though no special damage be proved." If a man is slandered in his business, he has no right of action except he aver, and prove special damage. We have now in Arkansas a statute which makes words charging any one with adultery or fornication liable to an action. Since the decision in McGough v. Rhodes, 12 Arkansas, 625, it is very doubtful whether it dispenses with averment and proof of special damage—whether it does more than re-enact the common law. Yet is it right that the law should presume anything about it? What right has any one, not damaged, to recover anything? The common law presumed damage from the use of words which charged another with crime. This presumption was conclusive. See 1 Chitty's Pleading, 407; 6 Term Rep. (Durnf. & East) 691.

It seems that if any part of the common law rules as applicable to slander, has grown absurd in the light of modern civilization, it is that which presumes damages, as a legal conclusion, and encourages vexatious suits in cases where no real real damage occurs; hence slander suits have grown into general disrepute.

SAM. W. WILLIAMS.

REMARKS.—It is possible that we did not make ourselves clearly understood in the article referred to. Perhaps we should have qualified what we wrote, so as to make it read that the law awards no punishment and affords no redress against him who imputes to a woman a want of chastity, unless such imputation has occasioned her pecuniary loss. By recurring to an article on "Councils of Honor," in a previous number (ante, p. 396), our correspondent will perhaps be able to understand more fully the nature of our criticism upon the common law rule. It is this: That the common law gives damages, not for the outraged feelings — not for the defamation, but only for the pecuniary loss which may or may not happen in consequence. In other words, as clearly and convincingly shown by Mr Townsend, in his work on Slander and Libel, § 57, "The protection is to the property and not to the reputation." "When we consider," says this learned and philosopical writer, "that falsely and maliciously to impute, in the coarsest terms and on the most public occasion, want of chastity to a woman of high station and unspotted character, or want of veracity or courage to a gentleman of undoubted honesty and honor, cannot be made the foundation of any proceeding, civil or criminal; whereas, an action may be maintained for saying that a cobbler is unskillful in mending shoes, or that any one has held up his hand in a threatening posture to another, it would seem to need nothing more to satisfy the most skeptical that the protection is to the property and not to the reputation." Ibid.

But our correspondent fully asserts, and very clearly expounds this principle, when he calls attention to the familiar rules of the common law, with reference to special damage in actions resulting from a defamation of the character. The point wherein we seem to differ is this: He believes that there should be no words actionable per se—that pecuniary damage should be averred and proved in all cases; we believe that pecuniary loss should not constitute the gist of the action at all, but that the action should be given for the outraged feelings and impairment of the reputation, whether it entail any pecuniary damage or not. We think that the principle that the action is given for pecuniary loss, is a barbarous relic of the old Saxon codes —one of the "dying glories of the common law," which modern courts have relieved against by a number of ingenious devices and fictions, not the least of which is that fiction to which our correspondent calls attention, which makes the loss of a friend or companion evidence of pecuniary loss. Unable to abrogate the rule itself, without incurring the imputation of usurping the functions of the legislature, the courts have also (as we think) relieved against it liberally and beneficially, by extending from time to time the number of verbal slanders from which the law will conclusively presume pecuniary loss—in other words the slanders which are actionable per se. And it would really seem that the chivalrous judges of the common law might, while protecting the professional reputation of a cobbler, and making it actionable to call a man a bogus peddler (Pike v. Van Wormer, 6 How. Pr. 101), or a vagrant (Miles v. Oldfield, 4 Yeates, 423), have extended the same beneficial rule, so as to protect the reputation, and silence the defamer of woman.

Digitized by Google

But the common law has never been imbued with this spirit. If it had, we never should have had the barbarous rule that a father can only recover damages for the seduction of his infant daughter, on the ground that she is his servant, and that her seduction has deprived him of her service, and thereby entailed upon him pecuniary loss. We cannot avoid thinking that such principles of law are better adapted to the code of the Sandwich Islanders, than to that of an enlightened and honorable people.

Fiction is at once the courage and the cowadice of the law. For while a king brandished the sword of state over the heads of his judges, and threatened them with the Tower, they may have been excused in resorting to fictions in order to change unjust and unyielding rules of law—since artifice is the only weapon of the slave against the master, of the weak against the strong. And it may, and doubtless often did, require great courage to do even this. But it is at the same time cowardly to say one thing and mean another, and in a court of justice where the truth ought always to be spoken, this out not to be done. But if, as our correspondent seems to imply, the earlier judges of the common law have succeeded in reforming the law of slander by fictions and devices, so as to protect the reputation of woman, why should our courts of justice at the present day, adhere to those fictions and devices? Under what obligation are they to continue to say one thing and mean another? Why ought they not to do what seems more worthy of a court of justice, cast aside the fiction—the falsehood—and advance directly to the truth? Instead of reforming this ancient barbarism "indifferently," why should they not "reform it altogether?"

[From our own correspondent.]

Judge Shaw.

BOSTON, August, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—It is not easy to estimate the value of Judge SHAW'S labors. Only those who knew him when living, and saw what and how much he did, and how admirably he did it all, and have observed and considered the influence and effect of his labors, both while he lived and since his death, are competent to form a just estimate of their value; and even the estimate of such, must in some respects at least, be inadequate. But the judgment of all such will be found to be that he was both a great and a good magistrate. For thirty years he sat in the seat of the chief justice of this commonwealth. He was appointed in 1830, and he resigned in 1860. Among all his associates during these years, learned and able as many of them were, he was indeed chief. Once or twice only, on some question, the majority of the court was against him, and then he dissented. His dissent was respectful and manly. The chance is, he was right. He tried or heard more causes in these thirty years, it is believed, than any other judge. His first opinion will be found in the 10th of Pickering, which contains also more than twenty other opinions that were written by him. Many of the questions considered in the course of this long period are new; many are quite complicated—some are of great public concern—in respect of some, the puplic mind was excited and divided; parties were hostile and clamorous; there was intense feeling; sometimes the just cause was the unpopular. Yet in all these cases he was master. The just cause, through him largely, if not chiefly, prevailed; the beneficient end was answered. Everybody felt that he got to the bottom of things; all knew that he was honest. He did not excite enthusiasm, but he commanded the general respect. He dealt only with the understanding,—which Locke calls the most elevated faculty of the soul. There was no rubbish in his mind. In investigation, he advanced step by step only. He verified as he went. In difficulties, so far as depended on him, he saved the commonwealth from reproach. He was independent. He kept his conscience and his shirt clean. His personal wants were few, and he had the means to supply them. Above all, he was courageous. He pursued the way his understanding pointed. He did not overlook the law in any vain expectation that somehow, somewhere in the empyrean, he might find a law still higher; but he took as his guide the constitution and law of the land and of the seas, as he found it, and diligently sought to find out what, in truth, these imported. And when he had decided a case, discussion stopped. With equal courage and independence, he had a finer understanding and was withal a better writer than Lord HOLT,—whom, in some respects, he resembled.

Sir EDWARD COKE was great. Neither was he wanting in courage. When the king said to to him—"So, I am under the law?"—COKE replied—"yes, you are." At another time, he declared that the king could not, by his proclamation, make that an offense which was not an offense before; "for if he may," said COKE, "then he may change the law of the land in a high point." He declared that the king had no prerogative but that which the law of the land gave to him. He carried the resolutions, which, a half a century later, were the foundation of the habeas corpus act. He advocated free trade. It is said he never deserted a friend; nor took a bribe; nor corrupted anybody; —and I can well believe it. He delighted in his morning bath, and in clean clothes. He was temperate. He was committed to the Tower—that nice little place on the Northern bank of the Thames, into which, in these last years of the nineteenth century, if you, a visitor in London will pay a shilling and wait until a party of twelve such is assembled, a man, dressed in a fool's uniform, with a long staff in his hand, will conduct you, and tell you all about the Traitor's Gate, and the Bloody Tower, and the Bell Tower and the Flint Tower, and divers other such nice little Towers and things, and show you where the good Sir SIMON BURLEY was beheaded in 1388; where the Duke of Clarence, brother of Edward the Fourth, was drowned in Malmsey wine; where the gay Edward sickened and died, and where his three children were murdered in the Bloody Tower,—from whence Jane Shore was released only to die in poverty; and Annie Askeed was tortured, and Jeffries ended his life in captivity, and the beautifuld Lady Jane Gray was beheaded on the Green, and the pious Annie Boleyn, after being beheaded, was thrust into an old chest and put in the vault of the chapel; and Margaret, the last of the Plantagenets, was brought to the Block, and Cranmer, Ridley and Latimer were imprisoned, and the great Sir Walter Raleigh was simply beheaded in 1618,—pointing out to you, as you go along, many other such pretty and strange and wonderful things, including all sorts of armour worn by all sorts of men and boys, except only the men of sense—and the head-blocks and thumb-screws and limb-stretchers and crown jewels,—all of which, I suppose, teaches, or is designed to teach, that in England there has been progress toward a better state of things in these centuries—and is certainly cheap at a shilling;—into this nice and instructive place, I say, Chief Justice COKE was thrust, as a prisoner, and thither went, as a brave man ought, and as in like case Judge SHAW would have done, rather than declare the law to be what he knew it was not; and there, in the few months that he was kept, he wrote the finest part of his "Commentaries on Littleton." Honor and thanks to Sir Edward Coke through this and all the succeeding centuries. But, alas! the greatest of men even sometimes make mistakes, and Sir Edward is not an exception to this rule. When he was liberated, he suffered himself to be elected sheriff for Suffolk and Buckinghamshire, and in the exemplary discharge of his duties as such, he stood, as was the custom, with a white wand in his hand, behind the puisne judges, who were not worthy or but just worthy, to shine his boots, and held the court room doors open while they strutted their brief strut in and out. All honor to the memory of Judge SHAW! Sooner than have done that, it is my belief, if there were need, he would have wheeled a barrow in any honest business of his own,—which, happily, in all that part of his life from ten to eighty, he was just able to do.

PELHAM.

Notes and Queries.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL., Sept. 2d, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In 1857, A. and B. bought of C. two lots in the city of B——. Five hundred dollars to be paid down, and two notes, one payable in one year, the other two years with interest, each drawn in the sum of $300, constituted the consideration.

As between themselves, A. and B. agreed, by parol, that A. should pay the five hundred dollars down, and that B. should lift the two notes as they became due. A. complied with his part of this agreement, but B. failed to take up the two notes, or either of them; whereupon, A. also paid the notes. These notes were signed by A. and B. jointly. A. has been in possession, and had control of the property ever since its purchase.

Now, the question is, has B. any interest in the lots which the law will recognize? Will not a court of equity compel B. to give to a A. a quit-claim deed? Or, in other words, what is A.'s remedy, the record showing that the property was conveyed to A. and B., and the facts showing that A. alone paid the purchase price of the same? Please answer in the next number of the JOURNAL, and much oblige yours, etc.,

C. D. M.

ANSWER.—The title being in A. and B. there is nothing stated which would make B. a trustee of the title for A. A.'s remedy is to have equity charge the $600, with interest on the lots, thus subrogating A. in the place of the vendor.

Digitized by Google

If A.'s possession has been adverse to B. for the requisite length of time under the laws of Illinois, he would need no remedy, as he would have a title in this way.

SHELBINA, MO., Sept. 2d, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A note given, payable four years after date, with following interest clause: "Interest ten per cent., said interest to be paid annually; and if we fail to pay the interest when due, it is to bear the same rate of interest as the principal." Now, the note is secured by deed of trust, providing, that upon failure to pay any part of the principal or interest when due, the whole shall become due and payable, and that the trustee may proceed to foreclose the deed. Can the deed be foreclosed for failure to pay the interest at the end of the first year? Or, in other words, if there was no deed securing the payment of the note, could the interest be collected at the end of the year? Or is it optional with the payee whether he pay the interest at the end of the year, or pay interest on interest until such time as he does pay it? Very respectfully yours, C. M. K.

ANSWER.—The interest is due annually. The contract so states; and the purpose of the last clause is not to give the maker an option to delay payment of interest four years, or at his pleasure, but to give the holder the right to 10 per cent. interest on interest, if the annual interest be not paid.

MARYSVILLE, KANSAS, Aug. 14, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Have there been any decisions declaring the loans made by building associations to their stockholders usurious, and where can I find them? J. D. B.

ANSWER.—Such loans (including those of "loan fund associations") have been decided usurious in the following cases: Martin v. Nashville Building Association, 2 Coldwell, (Tenn.) 418; Philanthropic Building Association v. McKnight, 35 Penn. State, 470; Columbia Building Association v. Ballinger, 12 Richardson, (S. C.) Eq. 124; Houser v. Hermann Building Ass., 41 Penn. State, 478; Reiser v. William Tell, etc., Ass., 39 Penn. State, 137; Denny v. West Phila., etc., Ass., Ib. 154; Premium Fund Association's Appeal, Ib. 156; Melville v. American, etc., Ass., 33 Barbour, 103; Savings Bank v. Wilcox, 24 Conn. 147. See Parker v. Fulton Loan and Building Association, 46 Ga. 166; Bibb County Loan Association v. Richards, 21 Ga. 592; Silver v. Barns, 6 Bing. N. C. 180; Burbridge v. Colton, 8 Eng. L. & Eq. 62; Cutbill v. Kingdom, 1 Wellb. H. & G. 494; Delano v. Wild, 6 Allen, 1; Bowker v. Mill River Association, 7 Allen, 100; Hoboken, etc., Ass. v. Martin, 2 Beasley, 427; Shannon v. Dunn, 43 N. H. 194; Franklin, etc., Ass. v. Marsh, 5 Dutcher, 225; Merrill v. McIntire, 13 Gray, 157; West Winstead Savings Bank, etc., v. Ford, 27 Conn. 282; Citizens' Mutual Loan Ass. v. Webster, 25 Barb. 263.

BRENHAM, TEX., Sept. 1, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—On page 85 of No. 7 of the JOURNAL for February last, you discuss the question whether or not the homestead, exempted by law from forced sale, descends to the wife in fee simple, at the death of her husband, in Missouri. In Texas, with her liberal exemption laws, the question becomes an interesting one; but, as yet, we have had no decision of it. The Vermont decisions, as it seems, turn upon the construction of the 5th sec. of the homestead act, and if it is not asking too much, we will be obliged to you if you will publish that section in an early number of your journal. Respectfully, S. & G.

ANSWER.—Section 5 of the Vermont statute, above referred to, reads as follows:

"If any such housekeeper or head of the family shall die, leaving a widow or any minor children, his homestead, to the value aforesaid, shall pass to and vest in such widow or children, or, if there shall be both, in such widow and children, without being subject to the payment of the debts of the deceased, unless legally charged thereon in his life-time; and such widow and children, respectively, shall take the same estate therein of which the deceased died seized; provided, that such children shall, by force of this chapter, only have an interest in such homestead until they shall attain their majority; and the probate court having jurisdiction of the estate of such deceased housekeeper or head of a family, shall, when necessary, appoint three commissioners to set out such homestead to the persons entitled thereto." Gen. Stats. Vt. ed. of 1863, pp. 456-7.

There are some other decisions bearing upon this point which we have not heretofore noticed, and we hope to find time hereafter to collate them. The courts of Massachusetts use the expression "the estate of homestead." The question has been passed upon in several California cases, the result being, if we remember rightly, that there are no terms known to the common law which will accurately describe the estate which descends to the widow and child un under the homestead law of that state.

MARYVILLE, TENNESSEE, August 14, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A. owns a tract of land; in the summer of 1873 he harvested a crop of oats off a certain field; in the month of September, 1873, he leased the same field to B., to be sown in wheat, expressly stipulating that the field should be cultivated in wheat. B., sowed the field in wheat, but from some cause, either a freeze out or faulty seed, the wheat in the spring failed to put in an appearance, but in its room and stead a very fine volunteer oat crop grew and matured on the same land, the oats springing from the seed wasted from crop of previous year. The lessee was to receive two-thirds of the wheat grown, he furnishing the seed wheat. What are the legal rights of the lessee in the crop of oats?

Has he any interest in, or is he entitled to any part of the oat crop, if so, what part?

Please answer through columns of CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.

ENQUIRER.

ANSWER.—If the lease extended beyond the harvest period for the oats, and the lessee was in possession, he would have the right to gather the oats, but would have to account for the fair or customary use of the land. A contingency happened not anticipated by the parties, and in relation to which the contract did not determine their rights: and hence the law will regulate their rights according to the principles of justice and right.

Summary of our Exchanges.

The Chicago Legal News, for September 5, publishes the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in the United States Supreme Court, construing the laws of Congress relating to the pre-emption and entry of government lands, and stating the effect to be given to the opinions of the government officers in determining the rights of contesting claimants under such laws.

Also the decision of Mr. Chief Justice Waite in Self v. Jenkins, United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of North Carolina, holding that a court of equity has no power to restrain the treasurer of a state from paying out money in pursuance of law, on the ground that an earlier appropriation for a specific purpose had been misapplied.

Also McMarren v. Kean, published in this issue of this Journal.

Also The Heroine, a suit in Admiralty before Mr. District Judge Deady, of the District of Oregon, by seamen of the British barque Heroine, for wages. Several interesting points in admiralty law are ruled.

Also Merrick v. Davis, Supreme Court of Illinois, which was a trial of the right of property in a growing crop.

The Washington Law Reporter, for September 1, publishes Deener v. Brown, Supreme Court, District of Columbia, General Term, determining the rights and liabilities of the parties to a bank cheque where there has been delay in presenting it for payment.

Also a decision of the secretary of the Interior, of which the following is a syllabus: "For ascertaining the proper and necessary recitals of a patent in a given case, the applicant is bound by the terms and disclosures of such filings as, conformably with the law, he rests his right to enter and purchase upon; and for the further ascertainment and protection of rights, and as a duty on the part of the government, the examination of the general land office should, whether protest be filed or not, proceed beyond the papers filed by the applicant, and into those general records of the office, which evidence the final disposition made of the public domain; and if, upon examination, it is found tha any part of the premises applied for has been previously disposed of, express exception thereof should be inserted in the subsequent patent."

It also reprints from the Chicago Legal News, Butler v. Huestis, which we have already noticed.

The Chicago Railway Review, for September 5, republishes Randall v. Ewell, 52 N. Y. 521, and also notes of several interesting decisions in railway law.

The following is a summary of the principal contents of the American law Register for September:

Rights of Surities Inter-Sese.

Frost v. Plumb, Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.—Injury to horse for unlawful purpose—hirer liable for tortious injury to horse, notwithstanding illegality of contract—distinction between acts which are merely breaches of the illegal contract and independent torts. Odinion by Carpenter, J. Note.

Glenden Iron Co. v. Uhler, Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.—Trade-mark—geographical name—name of incorporated town cannot constitute a valid trade-mark, although adopted and used prior to the incorporation. Opinion by Mercur, J. Note.

Martin v. Robson, Supreme Court of Illinois.—Husband and wife—rule as to liability of husband for torts of the wife committed during coverture—modification in the rule is required in states where by statute the sole control of her property and earnings is given to married a woman—husband not liable in Illinois where the act is committed out of his presence, and without his participation. Opinions by Thornton, J., and by Sheldon, J., dissenting. Note.

Digitized by Google

The Pennsylvania, United States District Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania.—Admiralty—salvage service may, in exceptional cases, be rendered by a passenger, although he has no opportunity to leave the ship—reduction of salvage allowance, for subsequent assumption of illegal authority. Opinion by Cadwalader, J.

Pittsburgh, etc., R. R. Co. v. Andrews, Court of Appeals of Maryland.—Negligence—passenger in railroad train putting his arm out of the window is guilty of such contributory negligence as requires the court to say, as matter of law, that he cannot recover. Opinion by Miller, J.

Swasey v. Antram, Supreme Court of Ohio.—Joint action—Judgment against all the defendants after death of one, is voidable—married woman has no authority to enter a general mercantile business—business treated as the husband's. Opinion by Welch, J.

The Irish Law Times, for August 22, continues its leader on Life Insurance Law and Legislation. It also republishes from the Solicitor's Journal, a compendium of the proposed new rules of practice under the English judicature act, which takes effect in November. This will prove of much interest to those who have leisure to watch the progress of law reform in England, but any attempt to condense it would be futile.

The Albany Law Journal, for September 5, comes to us with its usual amount of excellent matter. An article on the Contracts of Married Women, appears to be a review of some of the points of a former contribution to that journal, by Mr. Proffatt, of New York City.

In discussing the ruling of Mr. Justice Hunt, in denying Miss Susan B. Anthony the verdict of a jury in the prosecution against her for illegal voting, the learned editor of the Albany Law Journal seems to have got himself into a regular hornet's nest. Mrs. Matilda Josslyn Gage "went for him" in the Syracuse Journal, and showered a perfect hail-storm of invective upon his devoted head. If every epithet had been a brick-bat there wouldn't have been a grease-spot left of him. He seems, however, to have endured it with the same philosophic placidity with which the Wandering Jew received the volley of grape-shot; and now he turns upon his persecutor with a weapon so sharp, and with a speech so caustic, that it would make a man cry "O, don't!"

The Albany Law Journal also publishes Madras Railway Co. v. The Zemindar of Carvetingarum, before the judicial committee of the privy council, which hold that the principle that if a man bring and accumulate upon his land anything which, if it escape, may cause damage to his neighbor he does so at his peril, is not applicable to the case of water stored in tanks in India, which have existed from time immemorial, and are preserved and repaired by the landowners by reason of their tenure, as essential to the welfare and existence of the people.

Also Commercial Bank of Cleveland v. Simmons, which we have heretofore noticed, in which Mr. District Judge Walker holds that the right of the national banks to sue is not controlled by the judiciary act, but by the national banking law of 1864.

The Legal Gazette, for September 4, reports Mercantile Insurance Co. v. Folsom, Supreme Court of the United States, in which it is ruled that contracts of insurance which clearly show that it was the intention to make them operate retroactively, are as valid as those intended to cover a subsequent loss, if it appears that the insured as well as the underwriter was ignorant of the loss at the time the contract was made.

And also that, where upon a submission of the facts to the court below, the finding is general, nothing is open to review but the rulings of the court in the progress of the trial.

It also publishes Davenport v. Dows, same court, where it is ruled that although a stockholder may bring a suit when the corporation refuses, as is settled in Dodge v. Wolsey, 18 Howard, 340, yet such a suit can only be maintained on the ground that the rights of the corporation are involved; and that where such suit is commenced the corporation must be made a party.

The Legal Gazette also publishes The Chicago City Railroad Co. v. Allenton, which it credits to the Chicago Legal News, but with a syllabus for which the editor of the Gazette claims credit. It is as follows:

1. The directors of a street railway corporation in Chicago "resolved to increase the capital stock of the company." Held, that their charter did not give the directors power to increase the stock, without the consent of the stockholders, and their action was therefore illegal.

2. The constitutional question involved in the case shirked by the supreme court.

The Legal Gazette also publishes the proposed amendments to the consfitution of Michigan, and several interesting Pennsylvania statutes.

The Financier, for September 5, comes to us with a 24-page supplement containing a statement, in tabular form, with remarks, of the funded debt of the states and principal cities and railroad corporations in the United States. It will prove of immense value to financial men and investors.

The Legal Intelligencer, for September 4, contains a number of interesting decisions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Among them we note Gallagher's appeal, in which it is decided that a bequest of the interest of a certain mortgage for life is a specific legacy, and if the specific security is lost the legatee takes nothing; and that a widow, electing to take against the will, takes nothing specifically, but under and through the executor.

The following is the almost unintelligible syllabus of Resser v. Johnson.

1. A plaintiff will not be restrained from selling an alleged interest in real estate of his judgment debtor, unless the want of such interest is clear and manifest. The determination of title will be left to an ejectment.

2. In this case the invalidity of plaintiff's lien by reason of defendant's adjudicated bankruptcy was not sufficiently clear to justify an order restraining execution.

In the case of Peterman's estate it is ruled that an assignor for benefit of creditors, reserving the benefit of the exemption act, is entitled to select out of what property he pleases. The appraisers of the assigned estate must appraise what he retains. It is not laches for him to wait until the sale of realty in which he had an undivided interest, and then claim his exemption out of its proceeds.

The following is the syllabus of Hays v. Briggs:

The Act of 1843 and 1871 relating to lateral railroads, give appeals upon the questions of compensation and necessity for land taken, but not as to location. Whether the petitioner is allowed too little space, is to be determined upon exceptions to the report of the viewers.

The acts give a right to take land for wharfage, but not for harborage.

A lateral railway may cross a carrying railway to reach navigation.

The owner of land on the margin of a river is protected from having it taken for the use of a lateral railway, if he, bona fide, intends to use it for such purpose himself, although compelled to defer present improvement.

Testimony of special instances of sale is not competent upon the question of the value of land taken.

In Torrens et al. v. Campbell, it appeared that A., by writing, purchased the business and assets of B., and agreed to pay his debts. In a suit on this promise by C., a creditor of B., held: That it was admissable to prove that at the time of the agreement, B. exhibited a list of his debts, on the strength of which the promise was made, which list did not contain C.'s debt. Held also, that the action could be maintained by C. in his own right and name, as A. had received assets from B., the promisee, at the time of the promise.

The Legal Intelligencer also publishes an English decision (Vice Chancellor Bacon) on Trade Marks.

The Washington Law Reporter for August 18, publishes Barnes v. The District of Columbia, in which the Supreme Court of the district expound the liability of the district under its present government, for injuries to persons falling into excavations in its streets. This is an interesting case, and we shall notice it hereafter.

The Reporter also reprints from the Chicago Legal News the case of Heffron, which we have heretofore noticed.

It also publishes a decision of the secretary of the interior, of which the following is the syllabus:

"1 Land, when once appropriated under the homestead law, is thereafter removed from pre-emption settlement and homestead entry, and can only be again subject to them by a cancellation of the homestead entry in the manner prescribed by law.

"2. Such cancellation becomes effective at the date of the receipt of the order therefor at the local office.

"3. To initiate a valid right, under the pre-emption law, to a tract of land, covered by a homestead entry, some act of settlement must be performed by the pre-emptor, subsequently to the cancellation of said homestead entry."

Our other exchanges, so far as received, do not appear to contain much matter of general interest.

Legal News and Notes.

—HENRY SLATER, a prominent member of the bar of Baltimore, committed suicide the other day, by cutting his throat.

—A boarding-house keeper in Trenton, N. J., has brought suit against the owner of a bee-hive to recover damages for continued invasions of her dining-room by the bees at meal-times, stinging and driving away the boarders; and, out West, a bequest of money to a priest, to be expended in masses for the soul of the testator, is contested on the ground of its being contrary to public policy.—[Albany Law Journal.

Digitized by Google

—ELEVEN jurisconsults, designated by the German imperial government to prepare a civil code, have accepted the duty.

—JOSEPH H. BRADLEY, Jr., a prominent member of the Washington bar, died recently in that city.

—HON. E. M. PAXSON, Judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia, and Warren J. Woodward, President Judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Berks, have been nominated for judges of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

—ALEXANDER MCKINLEY, Esq., formerly an active member of the Philadelphia bar, but more recently flag secretary under Admirals Dupont, Thatcher and Farragut, respectively, died recently in Philadelphia.

—THE attorney-general has decided that the proviso in the army appropriation bill of the last session of Congress, to the effect that only traveling expenses shall be allowed to any person holding employment or appointment under the United States, supersedes and cuts off the allowance of mileage to United States marshals, as provided in the fee bill.

—A curious exemplification of the value of extradition laws was furnished in the courts yesterday by the arrest of a merchant charged with burglary committed at Stockholm, in July last. The man confessed his crime and will probably be sent back to Sweden to stand his trial. With the progress of enlightenment, dishonest people may probably discover that roguery does not pay.—[New York Herald, Aug. 31st.

—THE Legal Chronicle, speaking of the late decision of the Court of Claims in refusing to admit Mrs. Lockwood as a solicitor, says: "We do not believe that the bar at large will support the decision of Judge Nott, for much as they dislike to see a woman move into a sphere which does not seem to be her own, yet they are far too chivalric to help crush her, or deny her the right to earn her daily bread as she may best be qualified, merely because she is a woman."

—WE learn that thirty-six essays, written in German, English, French and Italian, have been sent into the Social Science Association by competitors for the prize of £300 placed at the disposal of the association by his Excellency Don Arturo de Marcoartu, ex-deputy to the Cortes in Spain, and to be awarded for the best essay on the following subject: "In what way ought an international assembly to be constituted for the formation of a code of public international law, and what ought to be the leading principles on which such a code should be framed?"

—THE Illinois Wesleyan University of Bloomington, Illinois, has a law department: Ruben M. Benjamin, A. M., is dean and professor of Property, Contracts and Domestic Relations. Owen T. Reeves, A. M., is professor of Pleading, Evidence and Equity Jurisprudence. Robert E. Williams, Esq., is professor of Constitutional, International and Criminal Law. The course of instruction is two years in duration, and is by recitation and lectures. Its graduates are entitled to admission to the bar without further examination.

—THE association for the reform and codification of international law, established last year in Brussels, will hold its second annual meeting at the Hotel de Ville, Geneva, on September 7. It is expected that the conference will be attended by many eminent publicists of Europe and America. The Law Magazine and Review says: "The English bar will likewise be represented. Sir Vernon Harcourt, Mr. Hinde Palmer, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Sergeant Simon, and others have been invited to attend. Mr. Thomas Webster will read a paper on Property in Intellectual Labor; Mr. H. D. Jencken, the general secretary of the association, has argeed to bring forward in a treatise he has prepared, the very important question of 'The International Laws regulating Negotiable Securities,' including bonds and shares. Professor Amos and Professor Leone Levi will also, it is hoped, be present, and contribute their share to the valuable matters to be considered at the conference."—[Albany Law Journal.

—THE biography of Salmon P. Chase, by his private secretary, contains the following extract from a letter written by Mr. Chase, June 2, 1863, to Mr. Jay Cooke. It is an honor to his memory, and exhibits his character in striking contrast from that which is implied in the base suggestion that his opinion in the Legal Tender case was influenced by the motive of promoting his chances as a candidate for the presidency:

"You informed me two or three weeks ago that you had purchased 300 shares of Philadelphia and Erie railroad stock for me. At that time I was expecting means of payment from the sale of a farm in Ohio, and would have been glad to hold the stock for income. The sale, however, has not yet been effected, and I have, therefore, not been able to make payment. This morning I have yours of yesterday, notifying me that you have sold the stock at an advance which gives a profit of $4,200 on the transaction, and you inclose me a check for that amount. As I had not paid for the stock, and did not contemplate purchasing with any view to resale, I cannot regard the profits as mine, and therefore return the check for $4,200. It is herewith enclosed. I am much obliged to you for your willingness to regard the money paid for the stock as a temporary loan from you to me. But I cannot accept the favor. When Congress, at the last session, saw fit to clothe me with very large powers over currency and financial movements, I determined to avoid every act which could give occasion to any suspicion that I would use the powers conferred on me to effect markets unnecessarily, or at all, with reference to the private advantage of anybody. To carry out this determination faithfully, I must decline to receive any advantage from purchases or sales made with views to profits expected from the rise or fall of market prices. For these reasons I must decline to receive the check. For, in order to be able to render the most efficient service to our country, it is essential for me to be right as well as to seem right, and seem right as well as to be right."

—THE CRIMINAL QUÆSTION OF THE ROMAN JURISPRUDENCE.—The deceitful and dangerous experiment of the criminal quæstion, as it is emphatically styled, was admitted rather than approved in the jurisprudence of the Romans. They applied this sanguinary mode of examination only to servile bodies, whose sufferings were seldom weighed by those haughty republicans in the scales of justice or humanity; but they would never consent to violate the sacred person of a citizen, till they possessed the clearest evidence of guilt. The annals of tyranny from the reign of Tiberius to that of Domitian, circumstantially relate the execution of many innocent victims; but, as long as the faintest remembrance was left alive of the national freedom and honor, the last hours of a Roman were secure from ignominious torture. The conduct of the provincial magistrates was not, however, regulated by the practice of the city, or the strict maxims of the civilians. They found the use of torture established, not only among the slaves of oriental despotism, but among the Macedonians, who obeyed a limited monarch; among the Rhodians, who flourished by the liberty of commerce; and even among the sage Athenians, who had asserted and adorned the dignity of human kind. The acquiesence of the provincials encouraged their governors to acquire, or perhaps to usurp, a discretionary power of employing the rack to extort from vagrants or plebeian criminals a confession of their guilt, till they insensibly proceeded to confound the distinction of rank, and to disregard the privileges of Roman citizens. The apprehensions of the subjects urged them to solicit, and the interest of the sovereign engaged him to grant, a variety of special exemptions, which tacity allowed, and even authorized, the general use of torture. They protected all persons of illustrious and honorable rank, bishops and their presbyters, professors of the liberal arts, soldiers and their families, municipal officers, and their prosterity to the third generation, and all children under the age of puberty. But a fatal maxim was introduced into the new jurisprudence of the empire, that in the case of treason, which included every offence that the subtlety of lawyers could derive from an hostile intention towards the prince or republic, all privileges were suspended, and all conditions were reduced to the same ignominious level. As the safety of the emperor was avowedly preferred to every consideration of justice and humanity, the dignity of age and the tenderness of youth were alike exposed to the most cruel tortures; and the terrors of a malicious information, which might select them as the accomplices, or even as the witnesses, perhaps, of an imaginary crime, perpetually hung over the heads of the principal citizens of the Roman world.—[Gibbon.

Notes of Cases.

[These notes of cases are either prepared or selected with care by one of the editors.]

A novel question was presented in Williams v. Firemen's Fund Insurance Co., 54 N. Y. 569. The action was on a fire policy, containing a prohibition against storing petroleum, etc., on the premises. The defendant claimed an infraction of this provision. It seemed that the plaintiff, who had been in the army during the late war, had received a gun-shot wound resulting in a cutaneous disorder, which he treated by an application of crude petroleum oil to the surface of his body, and for that purpose he kept crude petroleum in a jug on a shelf in his room, and had some quarts of it in the building at the time of the fire, It was not pretended that the fire proceeded from or was aided by this material. The court held that this was not a "storing" within the meaning of the policy. Commissioner Reynolds suggested that even if the plaintiff had taken a quantity of the oil internally it would not have amounted to a "storing" on the premises. We are very glad this is so settled. Any other decision would have been an ungenerous requital for the sufferings of the plaintiff in the cause of his country, and would operate to retard enlistments in the event of another unholy rebellion. Let it once be adjudged that a man must not only bleed but itch for his country, unallayed by emollients of an inflamable nature, or run the risk of having his property destroyed by fire, without the power of enforcing his insurance, and our liberties are no longer secure.—[Albany Law Journal.

Digitized by Google

Partnership—Substitution of New Members for Old without Changing Firm Name—Rights of Creditors Against Retiring Partner.—The case of Speer v. Bishop, published in the American Law Record for August, was a decision of the Supreme Court, Cincinnati, in general term, before Judges O'CONNOR, TILDEN and YAPLE. It presents a highly interesting and oft-recurring question in the law of partnerships. The decision is not final, the case having been appealed to the Supreme Court.

H. S. & Co., composed of H. S. and one of his sons, were copartners under that firm name, doing business for a number of years in the city of C., when they removed to the city of B., and carried on business there as partners, under the same firm name, H. S. always being the monied man of the firm, and having a good reputation and credit as a business man; and while in B. they also kept an office in the firm name of the city of C. They dissolved their copartnership, H. S. retiring from the firm, and another of his sons entering it with the other, the first partner. Neither bore the name of H. S., the name of the father. By agreement, the new firm took the claims and assumed the debts of the old firm, and the new firm was to and did continue business under the old firm name of H. S. & Co. H. S. recommended the new firm under the former to the old customers. Notice of this change, etc., was duly published in the newspapers printed in the cities of C. and B., and advisory letters were sent to all who had formerly dealt with the old firm. B. & Co., merchants of the city of C., were strangers to the old and new firms, and had no personal acquaintance with any of the members thereof; but they knew H. S. by reputation, and that his reputation was good, and they took daily the newspapers in which the notice of dissolution, etc., was published, but never saw or had knowledge thereof. One of the new firm called upon them and purchased goods. He represented himself as one of the firm of H. S. & Co. B. & Co. did not enquire of him who composed the firm, nor did they know; but they enquired on 'change concerning the standing of H. S. & Co., and learned it was good. After the first purchase, H. S. & Co. purchased by orders, written upon paper with letter-heading, printed H. S. & Co. After these purchases, and in ten months after its formation, the new firm of H. S. & Co. failed, with liabilities amounting to some $60,000, and with assets not exeeeding $6000 in value. In an action of B. & Co. against H. S. & Co., including H. S. individually by name, for the price of the goods so sold and delivered to the new firm: Held, that the firm name H. S. & Co., was more than a mere designation of a house, or association of persons of any names indifferently, but was a declaration that H. S. personally was a member of the firm, and strangers not knowing the facts were justified in dealing with the firm on the faith of such representation, without inquiring further; that as H. S. voluntarily and actively caused and assented to the use of his name as a partner in that connection, he was, as against B. & Co., estopped from denying that he was a partner in the firm, and that they could sue and recover against him as such, for the goods so sold and delivered by them.

The fact that one of the new firm, in the absence of all the members of the firm of B. & Co., may have handed their porter or other employee a card with the names of the two members printed in the upper left and right corners, and H. S. & Co. in the center, was not notice to B. & Co. of the fact that H. S. was not a partner, such card never having heen handed to B. & Co.

Husband and Wife—Married Woman a Partner.—A married woman has not capacity to enter into a general mercantile partnership not connected with or relating to her separate property, and where she assumes to do so with the consent of her husband, and is by him assisted in managing and carrying on the business, the husband, and not the wife, is to be regarded in law as the partner. Swasey v. Antram, 24 Ohio State, 87.

———. ———. The feme covert having obtained a "permit" to trade within the lines of the army, with the knowledge and consent of her husband, entered into a partnership with other persons, for the purpose of buying and selling goods and merchandise under said "permit," and herself, with the assistance of her husband, managed and conducted the business. The firm was subsequently dissolved, and its property transferred by the other partners to her, she agreeing to pay all the partnership debts. She then sold the property to S., who had notice of all the facts, and who in like manner agreed to pay the partnership debts. This was all done with the knowledge and concurrence of the husband, who joined her in executing the bill of sale to S. In an action by a creditor of the firm against the husband and the other members of the firm, not including the wife: Held, that the goods in the hands of S., or the price agreed by him to be paid therefor, and not yet paid, are liable to atatchment in the action. Ibid.

Bank Deposits—Right of Arrest.—Where money is deposited from time to time in the course of ordinary banking business, subject to check at sight, the relation between the parties is that of debtor and creditor, and not that of trustee and cestui que trust. In such case the credit is given to the pecuniary responsibility of the banker, and not to his personal integrity, and the deposit becomes the propertyof the recipient, to be paid on demand as a debt due and payable. Therefore, in an action to recover the money so deposited, no right of arrest exists under the New York Code. Buchanan Farm Oil Co. v. Woodman, June court.—[Daily Register, Aug. 15.

Bankruptcy—Railroad Corporation—Act of Bankruptcy—Mortgage.—It is not an act of bankruptcy for a railroad corporation to convey its property in trust to secure bonds to be issued and sold, and the proceeds to be applied to pay all its unsecured debts, the same being done bona fide with a view to enable the company to continue its legitimate business, though it may be technically insolvent, or likely soon to be so. In re Union Pacific Railroad Company, U. S. District Court, District of Massachusetts, (LOWELL, J.) 31 Legal Intelligencer, 261.

Same.—Such a mortgage is not made invalid by the circumstance that the unsecured creditors are offered the right to take the new bonds, or the proceeds of sale thereof, at their election. Ibid.

Same.—It seems that a mortgage for money to pay debts ratably would not be an act of bankruptcy even in a trader. Ibid.

Same.—Some distinctions between traders and railroad corporations, in respect to mortgaging their property, pointed out. Ibid.

Property in Membership of Board of Stock Brokers—Assets.—Where, under the articles of association of a board of stock brokers, a member cannot transfer his seat to a party not elected and approved by the board; and where upon the insolvency of a member, his rights as such are forfeited, and the board is authorized to dispose of his seat, and apply the proceeds to the payment of his indebtedness to other members of the board to the exclusion of all others, only the residue of the proceeds of the sale, after paying all the liabilities provided for in said articles of association, is assets of such insolvent member. Hyde v. Woods, U. S. Circuit Court, District of California, SAWYER, J., 1 Am. Law Times Reports, N. S. 354.

Same—Case in Judgment.—Under such articles, F., a member, failed to meet his engagements in the board, August 24, 1872, and being indebted in a large amount to sundry members, on that day assigned his seat in the board to W., with authority to sell and pay the proceeds to his various creditors in the board. With the assent of the board, W. sold the seat to T., who was elected by the board, for ten thousand dollars, and, with the approval of the board, paid the entire proceeds pro-ratably to F.'s creditors, who were co-members. October 1st, 1872, F. was adjudged a bankrupt on petition of a general creditor, filed September 18th, 1872. After said sale and payment, an assignee having been appointed, he brought suit against W. to recover said sum of ten thousand dollars. Held, That the assignee was only entitled to the residue after payment of F.'s liabilities to the co-members provided for in the articles of association, and there being no surplus, he was not entitled to recover. Ibid.

Principles which Govern in Interpreting Wills.—If wills are to be interpreted in the light of precedents, the court will follow those which are most in harmony with the genius and laws of this country, and customs of its people. It will be guided by those that effectually do justice, and not by such as would give an arbitrary and technical meaning to words never understood or contemplated by the testator, and that may defeat all the objects of his beneficence, as manifested in his will. Ibid.

Priority of Attachment over Deed of Assignment.—In Wilson . Eiffler, Supreme Court of Tennessee, Knoxville, 1872 (Nashville Commercial Reporter, for Aug. 10), the point is ruled that a deed received in a register's office, and the time of its reception endorsed on it by a party not authorized by law to make the endorsement, will not hold the property as against creditors attaching the property before the deed was registered.

Section 454 of code of Tennessee requires the register of deeds to keep a book in which he shall note the day and the hour at which instruments are left with him for registration, and the entering of an instrument which is left to be registered in this note book, has the same effect as though the instrument had been actually registered at the time.

It appeared that the assignment in question was left with M. L. Hall, on the day the attachment was levied; that Hall was clerk of the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, and kept his office in the rear of the court-house, and that H. M. Aiken, the deputy register of Knox county, kept the register's books in his (Hall's) office, Hall says, on the 18th of August, 1866, Aiken was absent, and the deed of assignment was brought into his (Hall's) office, and he made the following endorsement on said deed: "Rec'd, Aug. 18, 1866, 10 o'clock A. M." Hall states that he was neither register nor deputy register at the time, but made the memorandum to enable Mr. Aiken to know the time the deed was brought to the office for registration; that he made no entry in the note-book in the register's office. Aiken, the deputy register, shows that the deed was not, in fact, registered for several days after it was left at the office, and was not entered on the note-book until after the levy of the attachment, although the counsel of complainants had notice of its execution before the levy of the attachment. It was held that the deed was not noted for registration within the requirements of the statute, and that the rights of attaching creditors were not affected by the endorsement made on the deed.

Digitized by Google

Marine Insurance—Creditor—Evidence—Declarations—Insolvency.—A shipmaster and owner procured a marine insurance policy upon his one-quarter of his vessel "on account of whom it may concern;" los payable to himself. The vessel was lost during the voyage, covered by the policy, with the master and all on board. The plaintiff, a creditor of the deceased master, brought this action upon the policy, claiming that it was obtained for his benefit. He introduced testimony of the declarations of the deceased that if the plaintiff would make him a loan he would secure him a policy on this vessel; and subsequent declarations that the loan had been made to him by the plaintiff, and that he had secured the plaintiff by procuring a policy for his benefit. Held, that the testimony was inadmissible without proof that the deceased was acting as plaintiff's agent in effecting the insurance, and that the declarations themselves were not competent for this purpose. Evidence was introduced to prove the insolvency of the deceased. Held, that it was improperly admitted. Sleeper v. Union Ins. Co., Supreme Judicial Court of Maine; Western Ins. Review, July, 1874.

Removal of Causes from State Court to Federal Court—"Final Hearing or Trial."—In Burts v. Beard, Nashville Commercial Reporter, August 20, the Supreme Court of Tennessee had occasion to consider the oft-recurring question of the construction of the act of Congress of 1867, with reference to the removal of causes from the state courts to the federal courts. The case was in chancery, and on the coming in of the master's report, a petition was presented asking that the cause be transferred to the federal court. This the chancellor refused, and the supreme court, in passing upon this ruling, say: "We assume that the petition is based on act of Congress of March, 1867. That act provides that in the cases specified, the removal may be had on petition filed at any time before the final hearing or trial of the suit. This act as we think, simply means before a trial or hearing settling the rights of the parties. The object was to give the parties a trial in the federal court, where it was assumed the questions might be more fairly investigated, freed from local prejudices. After the trial it is too late to transfer the cause. This would be to give revisory power to the federal circuit court and not an original trial, as was contemplated by the statute. Such is the ruling of the Supreme Court of Ohio, in a well considered case, 4 Ohio, 642, and which we think clearly correct, and adopt. The chancellor was correct in refusing the transfer as asked."

Liability of Municipal Corporation for Injuries Caused by Failing to Keep Sidewalks Cleared of Snow.—In Grenier v. La Corporation de Montreal, 5 La Revue Legale, 195, a lady sued the city for $500 damages, suffered through the default of the corporation neglecting to keep the pavement of a street in order, whereby she slipped on the ice and fractered her arm. The corporation denied that they were compelled to keep the streets clear of snow, but that, under a by-law, citizens were bound to keep their winter pavements in order, and it was the duty of persons to notify the corporation of any refusal or neglect to obey this by-law. The judge declared that in the climate of Montreal "slippery walking in winter is the nominal condition of things," and decided that the corporation in this case was not at fault.—[Legal Gazette.

Liability of the District of Columbia, under its Present Government, for Injuries to persons Falling into Unguarded Excavations in its Streets.—In the opinion of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, General Term, delivered by OLIN, J., in the case of Barnes v. The District of Columbia, it is held, that the powers and privileges of the Baltimore & Potomac Railroad Company, under the various acts of of Congress authorizing the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of said road in the district, were granted free from the interference of the then municipal government of the city of Washington, and were in no way subject to its control; that under the act of Congress, of February 21, 1871, providing a government for the District of Columbia, the "entire control" of the streets and avenues of the city of Washington was given to the board of public works; that no powers were given, and no duty or obligation imposed upon the government created by said act, to repair them or keep in order; that said board, although created by the same act, was no constituent part of said government, and that any interference with the streets, etc., on the part of its officers, servants or agents, against the will or consent of said board would have been as much a trespass as an interference with the prescribed duty of any other agents of the United States, and that, consequently, where the railroad company, in constructing its road, opened a deep excavation for the track by the side of a traveled street, and so negligently omitted to put up barriers, safeguards and lights, that a citizen, in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, fell into such excavation and was seriously injured, the district was not liable for the negligence of the railroad corporation created as aforesaid by the act of Congress, nor for the negligence of the board of public works created in the same way.

The learned judge, while admitting the liability, on grounds of public policy, of the tax-paying population of a municipal corporation which elects or appoints its own officers, agents, and servants, for their misfeasance or malfeasance, thinks that, in the present case it would be running the doctrine of "imputed sin" into the ground, to hold that they are responsible where a government is imposing on them in respect to which they have little or no voice at all, and in respect to the streets, etc., absoluteiy none.

The case is published in the Washington Law Reporter, for August 18, from which we take the foregoing synopsis.

Measure of Damages for Conversion—"Rule of Intermediate Higher Value."—In N. Y. Guaranty and Indemnity Co. v. Flynn, the New York Court of Appeals recently held that in an action to recover possession of personal property, in case a return cannot be had, the prevailing party is entitled to the value of the property at the time of the trial, and not at any intermediate time between the taking and the trial. This decision may be regarded as settling the vexed question in New York, which has been agitated ever since Cortelyou v. Lansing, 2 Caines' Cas. 200, as to what is the true measure of damages in case of a conversion. In Baker v. Drake, 8 A. L. J. 340, the New York Court of Appeals decided that in an action to recover damages for a wrongful conversion of stocks, the measure of damages was not the highest market value which the stocks had reached between the time of the conversion and the trial. The court in that case gave a very elaborate examination of the authorities, and overruled all cases in New York state holding a contrary doctrine; but the decision was a negative one, and did not state what the measure of damages actually was. In New York Guaranty and Indemnity Co. v. Flynn, supra, the measure of damages was positively decided. Whether the rule finally adopted by this court is the most reasonable or logical one, may be open to consideration. And it seems to us that a better rule would be the value which the owner of the property converted might have (probably) realized at any time between the conversion and the trial, had no conversion taken place. This, of course, would not necessarily be the highest value, for the owner might not avail himself of the highest price. But the value would be such as the owner might reasonably be expected to have realized had the property remained in his possession at any time before trial. This would be for the jury to determine. There may be some difficulties in the application of this rule, but we think it not impracticable.

There are some recent cases in other states that hold the measure of damages to be the value at the time of conversion, with interest to the time of trial. See Sturges v. Keith, 11 Am. Rep. 28; 57 Ill. 451; Boylan v. Huguet, 8 Nev. 345. For an able and exhaustive discussion of this subject, see Sedgwick on Damages, 6th ed., 590, 609, note, entitled "Rule of intermediate higher value."—[Albany Law Journal.

Negligence, when a Question for Jury.—We have heretofore alluded to the difficulties in the way of determining in what cases the question of negligence or no negligence is one to be determined by the court, or to be resolved by the jury (ante, p. 374.) In Ohio, the question seems controlled to some extent, by statute; and we note the following interesting ruling upon the subject, by the supreme court of that state, in 24 Ohio State Reports, 83: The case was an action brought by plaintiff in error to recover for injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, a railroad company, in the management of one of its trains. After the introduction of the plaintiff's evidence, the defendant moved the court to arrest the testimony from the jury and nonsuit the plaintiff. The court, being of the opinion that the testimony adduced was not sufficient in law to sustain the action, granted the motion, as the record states, "upon the merits of said action," and rendered judgment that the defendant go hence without day and recover of the plaintiff its costs.

The court ruled the following propositions:

1. Section 4 of the act of April 12, 1858, to relieve the district courts, etc. (S. & C. 1155), which gives the right to either party to except to the opinion of the court on a motion to direct a nonsuit and to arrest the testimony from the jury, does not, by implication, repeal or modify the provision in section 372 of the code, which declares that, upon the trial of the action, in all cases except such as are therein specified, the decision must be upon the merits.

2. Under the act of April 12, 1858, the court is authorized, in a proper case, to arrest the testimony from the jury, and render judgment for the defendant. The judgment in such case, however, has not the effect of a nonsuit at common law, but is, under the provision of the code above referred to, a decision of the action upon the merits.

3. If the evidence tends to prove all the facts which it is incumbent on the plaintiff to establish in order to maintain his action, he has a right to have weight and sufficiency of the evidence passed upon by the jury, and it is error for the court to grant the motion, and render judgment against him.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor. } ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1874. { SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

THE useful article in this number on Passenger Carriers, giving a view of some of the leading decisions in this country and Great Britain, as to the liability of the carrier to the passenger (other considerations applying as to servants) for latent and undiscernable defects in the machinery and apparatus of the carrier, is from the pen of Hon. FRANCIS HILLIARD, author of the Law of Torts, etc.

WE desire to call attention to an interesting decision of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, which we publish in another place, in which several points in the law of fire insurance are ruled. The careful and discriminating note which follows this case, was prepared at the request of ourselves and others, by MELVILLE M. BIGELOW, Esq., of the Boston bar, author of the Law of Estoppel, etc. We hope to be able to favor our readers with other articles from the pen of this able and judicious writer.

JUDGE HOPKINS' RECENT DECISION IN HAMLIN V. PETTIBONE.—We publish in another place a second paper by Hon. ASA IGLEHART, of Evansville, Indiana, in which he criticises the position taken by Mr. District Judge HOPKINS in Hamlin v. Pettibone (ante, p. 404), that the recent amendments to §§ 35 and 39 of the bankrupt act, with regard to fraudulent conveyances by the debtor, are not retroactive. Judge IGLEHART, argues the other side of the question clearly and forcibly; but it is understood that, while desiring to promote discussion of novel questions of this character, we do not necessarily adopt the views of correspondents.

AMMENDED BANKRUPT ACT—NUMBER AND AMOUNT OF PETITIONING CREDITORS.—Mr. District Judge BLATCHFORD has rendered another important decision, in re Hymes, with reference to the number and amount of creditors who must join in a petition against an alleged bankrupt, under the amendatory act of 1874. The point ruled will perhaps be understood from the concluding portion of his opinion, which is as follows:

Still the point to be determined is what number of creditors must join in the petition, and such number must be determined by making a computation according to the rules laid down in the section. Those rules are, that the number of creditors joining in the petition must be, by personal enumeration, at least one-fourth of the entire number of creditors, and must have provable debts amounting to at least one-third of all the provable debts, with the further rule that, in computing the number who must join—in determining how many must join, whether 'one or more"—creditors whose respective debts do not exceed $250, are not to be reckoned. Everything that is to be done is to compute the number of creditors, "as aforesaid," who must join. In doing that the creditors whose respective debts do not exceed $250 are not to be reckoned. Those creditors are to be excluded. If they are excluded, it follows necessarily that if only the creditors whose respective debts exceed $250 are included and reckoned, the proper number to join will be assertained by computing one-fourth of such creditors and such additional number of them that the aggregate of the debts of those computed will amount to one-third of the debt of the creditors so included and reckoned—that is, one-third of the debts of the creditors whose respective debts exceed $250. This view is supported by the concluding sentence of the 9th section of the act of 1874, which provides that if there are no creditors whose debts exceed the sum of $250, or if the requisite number of creditors holding debts exceeding $250 fail to sign the petition, the creditors having debts of a less amount shall be reckoned for the purposes aforesaid. This shows that where creditors having debts exceeding $250 are to be exclusively reckoned, they are to be reckoned for all the purposes mentioned in the section—that is, for the purpose of arriving at the proper number of creditors, which is to be a number having a certain aggregate of debts.

THE CANADA ELECTION CASES.—The Canada Law Journal, for August and September, devotes considerable space to election cases. Indeed, cases arising under election laws seem to have become a prolific source of litigation in England and Ireland, as well as in Canada. These cases appear to involve exclusively the construction of election laws which, we presume, have no counterpart on the statue books of any of the United States. They are therefore without interest to lawyers in this country, unless they have leisure to observe the workings of other political systems. These statutes appear to be framed with the view of promoting the purity of elections in two ways: 1. By punishing the bribery of voters. 2. By preventing the election and voting of persons who have not a requisite property qualification. With reference to to the construction of "Corrupt Practices Act" of Canada, of 1860, in regard to bribery, we notice that the court (consisting of the Chief Justice, the Chancellor, and the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas of Ontario), in Cameron v. McLennan, 10 Canada Law Journal, N. S., 217, decline, in the present state of the law, to exclude enquiry as to the payment of traveling expenses of persons going to and returning from the polls, inasmuch as the same might amount to bribery. On this point, Mr. Chief Justice RICHARDS said:

By the Corrupt Practices Act of Canada of 1860, sec. 3, paying the expenses of voters is an illegal act, and any elector who shall hire his horse to any candidate or agent for the purpose of conveying electors to and from the polling places, shall be disqualified from voting at such election. Section 71 of the Ontario Act., 32 Vict., Cap. 21, is similar in effect, and a penalty of $100 is imposed, but the latter part provides that any elector who shall hire a horse, etc., for any candidate, or for any agent of any candidate, for the purpose of conveying any electors to and from the polling place, shall be disqualified from voting at such election, and under a penalty of $100. Cooper v. Slade, 5 H. L. 772, seems to be to the effect that merely paying the expenses of an elector, as the law stood in England, was not a violation of the statute, but promising to pay might be held to be bribery. In the present state of the law we do not think we can properly exclude enquiring in these matters.

In the subsequent case of Woodhouse v. O'Donohoe, 10 Canada Law Journal, N. S., 248, the same court hold that the hiring of teams, etc., is not a "corrupt practice" within the meaning of sec. 3 of "Controverted Election Act," of 1873, unless the hiring amounts to bribery. Upon this point, the same learned judge said:

We think the hiring of cabs and vehicles is not a "corrupt practice" within the meaning of those words in section 3 of the "Controverted Election Act," 1873. The "Act of the Parliament of Canada" there mentioned, refers to an "Act of the Dominion of Canada." But the clause will not be struck out, as the hiring might amount to bribery, and the petitioner should have the right to give evidence under it for that purpose.

These quotations serve to convey an idea of the questions which seem now to be engaging a large share of the attention of the courts of Ontario.

—JUDGE BRAZEL HARRISON, the original of one of the characters in Cooper's novel, "The Bee-Hunter," died in Kalamazoo, Mich., a few days ago, aged 104 years. His descendants number 203. He was a native of Frederick county, Md. He was not a lawyer, but this did not disqualify for judge in the wilderness, when judges were not required to know any law.

Digitized by Google

The Purpose of a Law Review.

The learned editor of the Forum has also written a letter to Mrs. Bradwell, of the Chicago Legal News, which, with Mrs. Bradwell's comments thereon, is as follows:

BALTIMORE, Aug. 27, 1874.

DEAR MADAM:—In the isssue of your valuable paper of August 15th, which I have just seen, you fall into a slight inaccuarcy in regard to the "Forum," and thereby do some little injustice. The great feature of the Review, designed by its projector, was to publish abstracts of the most recent decisions of importance, up to date, and not take the cases from the latest volumes of published reports. Of course, no one could expect us to give over a hundred cases in full (the number in July No.), which would make a volume of two thousand pages, and being issued four times a year, would be an undertaking better suited to Chicago than here. You state that two objects are necessary to a great law review — one to give carefully prepared articles on leading subjects, the other to publish reports of cases for the three preceding months. This, you say, we do, but "fail to tell where the opinions may be found." Now, we certainly did give the title of the case, and the state and court where decided. We could refer to no report, because our cases are in some states one year, and in others eighteen months, in others two years, in advance of the published reports, and we do not know what number of the reports will contain them. Of course, if, as you say, we publish cases decided from one day to three months beforehand, it will, therefore, be impossible to give any reference but what we have given, as no report then in existence will contain them.

In Maryland the 38th Vol. is out a few months; the cases we give will soon appear in 39th, and some not until 40th. Copies of all the cases we give can be obtained in full by sending to the clerks of the respective states, and we do not know what more we could do. The cases found in other periodicals in this country, are from the latest volumes of reports.

As to the question of articles, such writers as we have published articles from, as Hons. Isaac Redfield, Wm, Lawrence, Prof. Holmes, etc., will answer any objections completely on that score.

Very respectfully,

ATKINSON SCHAUMBURG.

[MRS. BRADWELL'S COMMENTS.]

We will assure our brother of the "Forum" that we did not fall into a "slight inaccuracy in regard to the 'Forum.'" We said one of the purposes for which a quarterly law review is now useful, is to give the points decided in cases involving new and important questions for the three months preceding its issue, and where the full opinions may be found. We were led to this remark by the fact that the "Forum" republished, on page 138, the syllabus to Dempster et al. v. West, which we prepared at a cost of considerable labor, without stating from whence it came, or where the opinion could be found. We cannot better illustrate than by saying, had the "Forum" added that the opinion could be found in 6 Chicago Legal News, 335, it would have enabled its readers interested in the important questions involved, to have obtained access to the full opinion. This is one of many cases, of which we can give the volume and page. We shall notice the next number of the "Forum," and should it give references when it abstracts opinions from law periodicals, we shall be glad to note the fact.

We think Mrs. Bradwell has slightly the advantage in this argument. In short, her criticism of the Forum was the same as ours, and no doubt, like our own, was simply intended as a friendly suggestion; and the instance which she cites of Dempster v. West, may be supplemented by the large number of similar instances cited by us (ante, p. 447). The September number of the Canada Law Journal contains a notice of the Forum, in which a more conspicuous failure to give the proper credit is thus pointed out:

In the last number there is a paper on the valid voluntary settlement of a chose in action, which, we think, we remember to have seen first in the Solicitors' Journal, and it is perhaps an oversight that no credit is given in The Forum for the article in question.

No doubt Mr. Schaumburg has, in the hurry of his practice, entrusted the preparation of his abstracts of decisions and other selected, matter too largely to his clerks, which accounts for his misapprehension as to the sources from whence much of this matter was compiled.

The advantage of these hints to Mr. Schaumburg consists in the fact that if his readers know that an opinion is published in the Chicago Legal News or CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, they can procure a copy of the journal which contains it for ten cents. Otherwise, they will be obliged to procure a transcript from the clerk, at a cost generally of several dollars.

Passenger Carriers.

In a late English case, Readhead v. the Midland, etc., L. R. 2 Q. B., 413, the court were divided in opinion upon the question whether passenger carriers are liable for injury caused by an unavoidable and latent defect in the carriage; a majority of the judges holding the negative. In this case, an action against a railroad company, the accident was caused by the giving away of a wheel, the tire having broken into three pieces in consequence of a flaw in the wadding, caused by an air-bubble. It was proved that such a defect would some times occur in spite of the greatest care on the part of the manufacturer; that it could not be discovered in the process of manufacture nor afterwards, either by the eye or from the ringing of the metal. The carriage, which belonged to another company, by mutual arrangement had been examined at the usual places, among others at Trent, the last stopping place prior to the accident; and the wheel, on hammering, then rang true. The tire was of considerably more than the minimum thickness, to which it is found in practice safe to wear tires.

The weight of authority seems now to be, that the law requires from common carriers of passengers the highest degree of care and diligence which a reasonable and cautious man would use. Taylor v. Grand, 48 N. H. 304; Simmons v. New, 97 Mass. 361; Maverick v. Eighth, 36 N. Y. 378; Johnson v. Winona, 11 Minn. 296. With reference to vehicles drawn by horses, the responsibility is said to apply to the team, the load and the state of the road; the carriage must be road-worthy, the horses broken and steady, the harness in good condition, the driver skillful, cautious and sober, acquainted with the road, watchful and competent, and willing properly to meet any emergency or difficulty. Derwort v. Loomer, 21 Conn. 245; Taylor Lay, 16 Minn. 566; Fuller v. Naugatuck, 21 Conn. 557. The proprietors of a stage are liable if the coach was upset by the running of the horses, and if they ran, not from accidental fright, but because the blocks were out of the brake, causing the stage to run upon them; and if the running might have been prevented, had the horses been properly harnessed, or the utmost care and diligence of a cautious person used to secure the blocks in the brake. So, if a stage is upset in consequence of baggage on the top. Farish v. Reigle, 11 Gratt. 697; Boyce v. California, 25 Cal. 467; Fairchild v. California, 13 Ib. 599; Alden v. N. Y., 26 N. Y., 102; Burns v. Cork, 13 Irish C. L. 543. Or if the superintendent allows a person other than the regular driver to drive the stage. Tuller v. Talbot, 23 Ill. 357. So, although the accident occur through the recklessness of the driver of another stage, who with his employers may be also liable; if the driver of the stage to which the accident occurred, was wanting in skill or prudence. Peck v. Neil, 3 Mc. L. 22. Proof that the plaintiff was a passenger of the accident and the injury, makes a prima facie case. Galena v. Yarwood, 17 Ill. 509; Dawson v. Manchester, 5 Law T. (N. S.) 182. See Yonge v. Kinney, 28 Geo. 111. And, contrary to the decision in Readhead v. the Midland, etc., it has been held that a railroad is responsible for injury caused by a crack in the iron axle of a car, though not discoverable by any practicable mode of examination. Alden v. N. Y., 26 N. Y. 102. And in general, that a carrier of passengers is liable for any accident occurring through defective construction of the vehicle, although the defect were out of sight, and not discoverable upon ordinary examination. Sharp v. Grey, 9 Bing. 457.

Digitized by Google

In other cases the railroad is held liable if the defect in an axle could have been discovered in the process of manufacture by any known test. Hegeman v. Western, 13 N. Y. 9. So, in case of an imperfection in a driving wheel, which had not been tested after long use, though in the usual course, hammered all round when new. Manser v. Eastern, 6 H. & N. 899. So, for the breaking of an axle from frost, if there was the slightest negligence in not preventing it. Frink v. Potter, 17 Ill. 406. And a railroad, though purchasing its stock from competent manufacturers, in the due course of business, is held responsible for their negligence. Burns v. Cork, 13 Ir. C. L. 543.

But a somewhat less rigid rule may seem to have been adopted in recent decisions, prior to Redhead v. The Midland, etc. See Anderson v. Pyper, Hay, [?] 23. Thus in Ingalls v. Bills, 9 Met. 1, specially referred to in the opinion of the court in that case, it is held that the passenger carrier is responsible, if an accident happens from a defect in the coach which might have been discovered by the most careful examination; but not where it arises from a hidden and internal defect, which a careful and thorough examination would not disclose, and which could not be guarded against by a sound judgment and the most vigilant oversight.

A coach was overturned in consequence of the removal, since the coach had last passed, of one of two cottages, whereby the driver was deceived as to the course of the road, in a moon-light night. In an action against the coach proprietor for an injury thereby sustained, the jury were instructed, that, as the road was of sufficient width, and there was no obstruction or want of light, the coachman ought to have kept within its limits. But a verdict for the plaintiff was set aside, upon the ground that the question of the driver's negligence should have been left to the jury. Crofts v. Waterhouse, 11 Moo. 133. And, with reference to railroads, it is held in recent cases, that a railroad is bound to use the best precautions in known practical use, but not every possible precaution, which the highest scientific skill, according to speculative evidence, might have suggested. Ford v. London, 2 F. & F. 730. It is bound to adopt any new and useful improvement, which would have prevented the accident. Smith v. N. Y., 19 N. Y. 127. F. H.

Homicide — Circumstantial Evidence — Force and Direction of Gun-Shot Wounds.

The case of Saunders v. State, 37 Tex. 710, furnishes an interesting discussion of this question. Saunders was indicted for the murder of James Huffhines. He was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be hanged. The principal evidence for the state was that furnished by the statements of the prisoner himself, which made the killing of Huffhines purely accidental.

It appeared that Saunders was hired to the deceased; that he was accustomed to work with, and take care of, horses; that he had, whilst working for Huffhines, and also whilst working for another person, been in the habit of getting up in the night and going out to look after the horses in his care, under some real or imaginary alarm of a disturbance of the horses by persons intending to steal them. On the night of the killing, he called the deceased to go out with him to look after the horses, pretending to have seen some person on the premises. They went out together, the defendant having a pistol. Whilst out a short distance from the house, the deceased was shot by the discharge of the pistol in the hands of the defendant, and died from the wound.

The defendant's account of the shooting was, that the deceased was walking before him; that they were returning to the house; that he (defendant) had cocked his pistol, and was attempting to let the hammer down, holding the pistol in his hands, at a angle supposed to be about 45°, from his manner of illustrating the position of the weapon in his hands; that the hammer slipped from under his thumb, causing an accidental discharge of the pistol, the ball, as he supposed, entering the deceased in the back. But instead of this, the ball, in fact, entered the head of the deceased, about the base of the occipital bone, penetrating about two inches in a downward range towards the chin. The conviction was supported by the testimony of experts, showing that from the direction which the ball took on entering the head of the deceased, that the statement of the prisoner could not be true.

Mr. Justice WALKER said:

The state has adopted a theory, favored by the evidence of professional witnesses, inconsistent with the statements of the appellant, which appears to be predicated [on the supposition] that the direction of the ball, after it entered the head of the deceased, must necessarily have followed the prolongation of a straight line from the point at which it was discharged from the pistol. This theory, if true, to account for the depression in the line of direction pursued by the ball, after entering the man's head, would establish the fact that the ball must have been fired from a point higher than the head of the deceased, which might, perhaps, involve the case in speculation, if not in absurdity. At all events, it is inconsistent with the idea that the pistol was held in the ordinary position in which such weapons are held when aimed at an object, if the theory of the state be correct.

But, after having examined some authorities of very high standing on gun-shot wounds, and particularly the reports of surgeons employed in the field and base hospitals during the late war in the United States, we are perfectly satisfied that to whatever degree of perfection the noble science of surgery may have been brought, no rules have ever been laid down or attempted to establish the geometrical direction of war missiles after entering the human body. Where bodies of equal density, and of spherical form (as in case of the ivory balls used in the game of billiards) are brought in contact, they will seperate on the geometrical principle that the angle of incidence is equal to the angle of reflection. This, however, depends upon the condition that the cue, by which the moving ball is forced, shall strike precisely upon its center — the skillful player well understanding how to produce or avoid this result. Many illustrations might be given of this principle on the billiard table.

But when bodies of unequal density and different in form are brought in contact by equal or unequal forces, the principle by which they will be deflected depends upon so many conditions as to have so far utterly baffled any law which science has established. There are plenty of living men who could, upon their own bodies illustrate the eratic and utterly uncertain direction of gun-shot wounds, by a simple reference to the wound of entrance and the wound of exit. A ball passing through the atmosphere under a diminishing force will be deflected more easily than one flying with the full velocity of its exit from the muzzle of the piece from which it is discharged. Many instances are found where partially spent balls, entering merely the muscular parts of the human body, have traversed a line varying many degrees from the line upon which they entered the body. The most remarkable and singular results are often witnessed where leaden balls come in contact with the tough sinewous cartilages or ossified parts of the human body. Nevertheless it is true that the conical balls used in modern warfare, when passing through a line of any direction with great velocity, and brought in contact with substances of less density, will pass forward on a straight line for a short distance, unless the form of the object be such as to exert an unequal resistance on the striking surfaces. We feel sure we are authorized in these remarks by the experience and scientific observation of every author who has treated the subject, and especially those who have written from personal observation. We do not feel authorized in a legal opinion to enter at length into mere scientific speculations. But we think in this case we are called on to deduce from science as far as it goes, and from known facts and principles, whatever can be so legitimately deduced in favor of innocence and human life.

Digitized by Google

The state offered in evidence the testimony which the appellant furnished against himself, and then, taking everything for granted which could fix the guilt of the appellant, those parts of his statement which would imply his innocence are attacked by the evidence of surgeons, whose statements, we believe, have been allowed an undue force by the jury. No member of the profession, whose experience has extended to this class of cases, need be admonished of the danger of relying too much on the opinion of experts. * * * We have twice very carefully examined this record, and the case has been argued, with great ability to the court, and we feel that we should be doing great wrong in taking away the life of a human being upon doubtful and uncertain evidence, were we to affirm this judgment. We regard it as one of those cases where the law has been violated in not giving the accused the benefit of those grave doubts which must rest upon every well informed mind that has attended to all the evidence in the case. We therefore reverse the judgment of the district court and remand the case."

The above opinion, notwithstanding some slight inaccuracy in the use of terms, presents what appears to be a just and correct view of the question discussed. Thus, it is hardly proper to call the rule that the angle of incidence is equal to the angle of reflection, a geometrical principle. It is rather a physical principle a law of motion, which we discover, not by any geometrical demonstration, but by observation of the action of one physical body upon another. Again, it is scarcely proper to speak of "any law which science has established." Science does not establish laws, but simply discovers those which are already in existence. In this sense it may be said, however, that science establishes the existence of certain laws of nature, and this is doubtless what the learned judge meant. Passing over these slight inaccuracies — which might well be excused in a lawyer, as a surgeon would certainly be excused in like inaccuracies in the use of legal terms — the view taken by the learned judge appears, as he states, to embody the views of the best writers on the subject. Thus, Dr. WHARTON, in his work on Medical Jurisprudence, Vol. 2, part 2, § 712, says:

A ball after entering the skin is deflected from a straight course by very slight causes. Many examples of this fact are given by all authors on military surgery. The following is a singular illustration of it: In a duel with pistols between two students at Strasburg, one fell apparently mortally wounded in the neck, but almost immediately got up, without feeling any inconvenience from his wound. It was found that the bullet had struck the larynx obliquely, and glancing from the cartilage, had gone completely around the neck and stopped on the opposite side of the larynx from where it was discovered. It was taken out by making simply an incision over it. Other examples might be cited in which balls have made a circuit around the cavities of the body, without entering them. In a wound of the head, thorax or abdomen, the ball may make a half circuit of the body and lodge or emerge at a point opposite that at which it entered, thus leading one to suppose that it must have passed directly through. In the battle of Suddozam, a soldier was struck by a bullet just above the right haunch bone. The ball passed around the trunk, entered the abdomidal parietes on the left side, then passed downward through the sciatic notch, and "at length contented itself with remaining in the left nates."

—A DARING attempt was made on the night of the 5th instant to burn the records of the office of the attorney-general of Louisiana. During the night the offices of that officer, in the St. Louis Hotel, now used as a state house, were broken open, all the records therein piled in a heap in the centre of the main office, and, together with part of the furniture, saturated with coal-oil and set on fire. Fortunately the flame went out, and only one or two of the papers were charred, though all are rendered nearly illegible by oil. The incendiaries appear to have been frightened off before completing their work.

Fire Insurance—Warranty—Concealment—Waiver of Defences.

GEO. W. CHEEK, AND OTHERS, v. COLUMBIA FIRE INS. CO.—SAME v. NORTH AMERICAN FIRE INS. CO.—SAME v. PHŒNIX FIRE INS. CO.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, April Term, 1874.

Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
" P. TURNEY, }
" ROBERT MCFARLAND, }
" JAMES W. DEADERICK, } Judges.
" THOS. J. FREEMAN, }
" JOHN L. T. SNEED, }

1. Void Tax Title.—In answer to a question whether the applicant for an insurance against fire owns the property upon which insurance is to be effected, and whether any other person is interested in it, he need not disclose the existence of a void tax title to the same.

2. Lease of Premises.—The application in thiscase, which was made part of the policy, contained the following question and answer:—"Is the mill leased or rented? If so, to whom, and how long?" Ans.—"No." Held, that the question was designed to ascertain whether the applicants had made a lease of the premises, not whether they were holding as lessees.

3. Concealment.—The non-disclosure of the fact that the title to the insured premises was in litigation, held, in the absence of any interrogatory upon the subject, not to avoid the policy.

4. Application filled out by Company's Agent.—If all the facts inquired of are truly stated to the company's agent, and he fills out the application, any failure by him to state therein facts made known to him, is to be attributable to the company, and will not avoid the policy. The evidence on this point considered.

5. Waiver of Defence.—Where the insurance company rest their defence upon the ground of a misrepresentation of title: held, that they must be confined to this point, and cannot allege other grounds of defence.

The only material fact not stated in the opinion of the court is the existence of the following condition in the policy of the Columbia Company: "If the property to be insured be held in trust or on commission, or be a leasehold, or other interest not absolute, it must be so represented to the company, and expressed in the policy in writing; otherwise the insurance as to such property shall be void." Similar provisions were contained in the other policies.

Pierce & Dix, for Columbia and North American Companies; E. S. Hammond & E. L. Belcher, for Phœnix Company.

MCFARLAND, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

These causes have been argued and considered together in this court. They are bills filed to recover the amount of three fire policies underwritten severally by the defendants, who are insurance companies, organized and having their principal offices in other states, but at the time doing business in this state, and represented by the same agent.

The policies were issued upon the application of Geo. W. Cheek & Co., and are each for five thousand dollars, "on machinery fixed and movable," in a certain cotton mill, described in the policy and application. The loss by fire within the time covered by the contract, is shown, and in fact not denied. The defence in each case is placed upon substantially the same ground.

In the application, which is made part of the contract, occur the following questions and answers, substantially the same in each, to-wit:

"Are the building and machinery both owned by applicants?" Ans., "Yes." "Is any other person interested in the property? If so, state the interest particularly." Ans., "No." "Is the mill leased or rented? If so, to whom and how long?" Ans., "No."

The applicants in said written application, agree that it contains a just and true statement of all facts and circumstances in regard to the condition, situation and value of the property, known to them, and material to the risk, and make this a condition of the insurance.

The defendants in their answers admit the contracts, but deny "that said Geo. W. Cheek & Co. were the owners of the property described in said policy, or had any insurable interest therein at the time said policy issued, except as tenants," but charge that "in truth and in fact the property at the time belonged to W. J. Smith and Fielding Hurst, who had purchased the same at the United States direct tax sale in June, 1864."

Digitized by Google

This defence proceeds upon the ground that the assured had no insurable interest in the property, and also upon the ground that, in this respect, which was material to the risk, the statements of fact in the application were untrue, and by the terms of the contract it was thereby avoided.

This necessarily presents the question whether or not Geo. W. Cheek & Co. were the owners of the property. They are admitted to have been the owners up to the time of the tax sale referred to. This tax sale is the adverse title set up by the defence. While of course we can make no adjudication binding upon Smith and Hurst, who claim this tax title, still the question is presented, and its discussion is essential to the determination of the present case.

It is not denied that such tax sale was made, and that Smith & Hurst were the purchasers of the property; but it is argued that this sale was absolutely void for several reasons, only one of which we notice. It is clearly shown by the proof that the amount of the direct tax assessed under the act of Congress, together with the penalty and costs, was duly tendered to the commissioners by the owners before the sale, but the tender was refused. Upon this proof we must hold, upon the authority of Bennett v. Hunter, 9 Wallace, 338, that Smith & Hurst acquired no title under their purchase.

This being the only objection taken to the title, it results that Geo. W. Cheek & Co., not only had an insurable interest, but were the absolute owners of the property, and their statements to that effect in their application were strictly true.

It is next argued that, however the foregoing question may be, Cheek & Co. did fraudulently conceal from the defendants or their agent, other facts material to the risk. In two of the cases cross-bills were filed to avoid the policies upon this ground. In the other case the defence was made by answer. The other facts charged to have been concealed, or falsely represented in the application, are as follows: Smith & Hurst, under their tax purchase, and by aid of the military authorities, took forcible possession of the property, and held it for a short time, until the said Geo. W. Cheek & Co. had instituted legal proceedings to regain possession. Under a decree of the United States Court at Memphis, R. C. Brinckley, who had sold the property to Geo. W. Cheek & Co., and who had a lien upon it for unpaid purchase-money, was appointed receiver, with directions that he might rent it to said Geo. W. Cheek & Co., for the sum of one thousand dollars per month, which he did. In this mode and under this contract with Brinkley, Geo. W. Cheek & Co. had regained possession a short time before these policies were issued, and this was the character of their possession at the time. It is not shown what became of the proceedings in the United States Court.

The first question is, are these facts inconsistent with the truth of the statements made in the application for the policy, as shown in the three questions and answers which we have set forth?

It is clear these facts do not contravene the truth of the first two questions and answers, to the effect that the applicants were the owners of the buildings and machinery, and that no other person was interested in the property; for we should understand the interest of other persons, enquired after in this question, to be an actual interest, and not a mere pretended claim without any real foundation. The third question and answer are to the effect that the mill was not leased or rented to any one. This was doubtless intended to mean, that Geo. W. Cheek & Co., who were the owners, were themselves in possession, and so expected to remain; that they had not rented or leased to any third person, who might take possession. On the other hand it is true that the applicants, although the owners, were themselves in possession as renters under the receiver Brinkley.

The statement contained in this last question and answer, when literally construed, is contradicted by the facts we have stated in regard to the manner in which Geo. W. Cheek & Co. then held possession; but when understood in the sense in which the parties most probably understood it, it is not contradicted by the facts stated.

But the application purports to contain a true statement of all facts material to the risk, and it might be argued that an omission to state some material fact known to the applicant, though not specially enquired about, would be in effect the same as to make an untrue statement in the application. We do not concede this proposition in an unqualified sense to be sound. For if the underwriters choose to insure without special enquiry as to certain facts, the applicant is not bound to know that these facts would be regarded as material, and a failure to disclose them would not necessarily avoid the policy. See 2d vol. Bennett's Ins. Cases, p. 279, from 5 Hill N. Y. 188.

If the facts not disclosed were unusual, and such as the applicant must know to be material, the case would be different. Fland. on Ins. 334–5.

At all events we should say that where the defence is predicated upon a mere failure to disclose some facts within the applicant's knowledge, not enquired about, the fact not disclosed must be material to the risk in order to avoid the policy. Fland. on Ins. 293.

We have not found in the numerous cases referred to on this question, satisfactory authority for holding that the facts, which it is alleged were not disclosed, were so material to the risk as to avoid the policy. For, as indicated, in fire policies there is a distinction between statements made upon direct enquries, and a mere omission to state facts not enquired about. In the latter cases, more latitude is allowed in showing that the facts were not material. Fland. on Ins. p. 328, and authorities there cited.

The cases referred to in Flanders Insurance, p. 293 and notes, are cases where the facts are stated in the application, and by the terms of the contract are made material.

Treating of concealments, Mr. Flanders says, p. 339: "A pending litigation respecting the subject of the insurance, not voluntarily disclosed, will not avoid the risk. And the underwriters are not competent witnesses in such a case to prove that the fact concealed was material. It is not a question of science or skill, with respect to which they might be experts." For this he refers to Hill v. Lafayette Ins. Co. 2 Mich. 476. Our own court has held that the existence of a mortgage not disclosed was not material. 8 Hum. 684; although there are authorities to the contrary.

The facts which it is alleged were not disclosed, are:

1st. The existence of the pending litigation in the United States Court. This litigation, as we have seen, involved only the claim of Smith & Hurst, which, in our opinion, was a claim without legal foundation. The applicants, notwithstanding this litigation, assume to state in their application that they were the absolute owners, and we hold their statement to be true.

2d. It is said they failed to state that Smith & Hurst had had possession. We do not see how this could be material.

3d. It is said they failed to disclose that, under the pending litigation, they had rented under the receiver. Assuming, as we do, that Cheek & Co. were the owners, that the claim of Smith & Hurst was illegal, the practical legal effect simply was that Cheek & Co. would be subject to the order of the court pending the litigation.

All these facts might, within the range of possibility, affect the risk. Parties engaged in an angry litigation about property might be tempted to destroy it, rather than have their adversary succeed. But this is rather a remote danger. Geo. W. Cheek & Co. were in possession claiming to be owners, and were in fact owners. We do not see that their care and prudence in regard to it would b affected by circumstances stated.

Digitized by Google

We are not satisfied that a failure to disclose these facts would have avoided the policy. Although the agent says in his opinion the facts might have been regarded as material, it is not a question to be decided by his opinion.

But aside from all this, how are the facts in regard to the alleged concealment? For the complainants it is maintained that these facts were fully disclosed to the agent, but he not regarding them as material, did not insert them in the written application, which was made out by him. Upon this we have the testimony of Cheek & Page, the two members of the firm, the former very positive and decided, the latter not so full, but to the same purport. They have no direct interest, as they have assigned the policies without recourse on them. On the other hand, the agent says these facts were not disclosed to him. We do not see that he has a legal interest, but his feelings would naturally incline him not to admit any failure of duty in the matter towards his principals.

The facts are to some extent of a public nature. If we regard the onus upon the defendants to make out the concealment, in this they have clearly failed.

And even if the written application be construed to contain statements inconsistent with the facts, still, in cases where the application is made out by the agent of the underwriters, and the facts are fully disclosed to him, and he fails to insert them, this will not avoid the policy.

Upon this question the defendants' counsel have referred us to a large number of cases, and it is maintained that this is in conflict with the rule which rejects parol evidence to contradict a written contract, and is only allowed in exceptional cases, where the facts untruly stated, are of a public and notorious character, or where there is fraud, accident or mistake. We cannot review or undertake to reconcile these authorities. We can only give the rule, which is sustained by one class of authorities, and which we think is sound.

1st. The agent who fills up the blanks or makes out the written application, is still in this the agent of the insurers, and not of the insured. He is in the employ of the insurers; it is his duty to represent them, and protect their interest, and he cannot rightfully divest himself of this character, although the application is in form the act of the insured. Bearing this in mind, and regarding the acts of the agent as the act of the company, then if we assume that the facts were fully disclosed to him, and he fails to state them truly in the application, it would be manifestly against all sound principle to allow any false statement thus inserted in the application to avoid the policy. It would be to allow the defendants to take advantage of their own wrong. It would put it in the power of an agent to destroy the effect of the policy, without fault upon the part of the applicant. Of course, if actual collusion be shown between the agent and insured, the case would be different. This may be placed either upon the ground of fraud or estoppel. We refer to the cases of the Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wallace, 222, and the Planters' Insurance Co. v. Sorrells, by this court, at Nashville, Mss., recently decided, as authorities for this holding. In the former case, it was said, this does not come in conflict with the rule rejecting parol evidence to vary a written contract, but proceeds upon the ground that the application in such case is not the statement of the applicant.

The proof clearly shows that the application was made out by the agent of the defendants, and the weight of proof is that the facts were fully disclosed to him.

A question of this character must be determined like any other question of fact, by the weight of evidence. We do not see that any different rule should be adopted as to the amount of evidence required, from the ordinary rule where any other question of fact is involved in a civil case.

Other objections are made, 1st. That the complainants have averred that they used all proper precaution to prevent the fire, that this was not admitted, and there is no proof. 2d. There is no sufficient proof of the amount of the loss.

We think it manifest, from the record, that the only defences set up are those we have considered, In fact, the real cause of resisting the payment was upon the ground that Smith & Hurst were the owners of the property. This was the real defence, and is the only real defence set up or put in issue.

It appears that proofs of losses were furnished in due time, and no objections were taken to them, and in the first named case the agent at Memphis had been instructed to draw on the secretary of the company for the amount of the policy, and the evidence indicates that the other two defendants were acting in concert on this subject. It appears that Geo. W. Cheek & Co. owed Brinkley balance for purchase-money, a note of $20,000. They (after the fire) offered him in payment four policies of $5,000 each (not the ones in controversy in this case), as they had $75,000 in insurance, but others. He was advised by the agent of the defendant not to take them, but to take the three policies involved in this case, and one other, all of which were in companies represented by him, and this upon the ground that these policies would be paid. Before the time, however, the instructions of the agent to draw for the amount, were withdrawn by telegraph and afterwards by letter, and from this letter it is clear that the defence then contemplated was upon the ground that Smith & Hurst were the owners of the property; and the defendants had determined to pay the losses, but afterwards determined to resist upon this ground. We think, therefore, the questions argued are not raised by the record.

The decrees will be affirmed with costs.

Petition for rehearing denied.

NOTE.—This case has raised in a new form the consideration of several old and well established principles of the law of insurance, if any of the rules of fire insurance can be said to be old and well established, and presents a fair illustration of the fact that the plainest doctrines of the law are often very difficult of application. This difficulty was, perhaps, in the mind of Lord ELDEN when he made, somewhere, the well known remark that his decisions must not be regarded as laying down any general principles; the rule of law in each case was to be considered just as broad as the facts of the case, and no broader — an injunction conspicuous in its breach.

Upon some of the points in the principal case, we cannot agree with the court of Tennessee. We shall not insist strongly that there may be doubt of the correctness of the first point; and yet we cannot pass it by without one suggestion. The court hold that, inasmuch as the tax title of Smith & Hurst was void, there was no misrepresentation in the statement that no one except the applicants and Brinkley were interested in the property. The court are doubtless correct in saying that this meant that no one else had a valid interest and that it was not falsified by the pretended title of Smith & Hurst. But suppose those gentlemen had called for a return of the sum bid for the property, and had received it, on the ground that the sale was void, as Cheek & Co. claimed, would not the government then assert the continued existence of its lien for taxes? If the sale was void, the lien had not been destroyed, and only awaited an assertion. Is not a lien upon real estate an interest in it? The payment by Smtih & Hurst of the purchase-price was not a payment of the taxes on behalf of the owner within the act of Congress. The sum paid may have been a great deal more, through the competition of bidders, than the amount due for taxes; it was a purchase of the property, against the interest of the delinquent.

However, the improbability of an assertion of such lien by the government makes this criticism, perhaps, appear rather technical. And yet there was a warranty of the truth of all the statements made; and a false statement, however immaterial, avoids a warranty.

As to the alleged misrepresentation concerning the character of the plaintiff's possession, the conclusion of the court would perhaps be correct if the question and answer given in the opinion were the only facts upon which such a misrepresentation could be based. Had the question, indeed, been merely "is the mill leased or rented?" we should be disposed to think that, without going farther, the court were wrong in saying that this question was intended to ascertain whether the applicants had leased the property. For, Cheek & Co. were in possession, as they had before stated in their application; and as the lessee is always in possession in the case of an actual lease, and not the lessor, it would follow that the companies must have meant by their question to ascertain whether the applicants were lessees or not. But the above quoted words were but half the question; the rest of it was, "if so, to whom, and how long?" Now it would seem from this that the companies desired to know whether the applicants had made a lease of the property; else why should they ask "to whom?" when if the question was designed to disclose whether Cheek & Co. were lessees, they must have known that they were, if there was a subsisting lease, from the fact of their possession. The fact seems to be that the apparent discordance between the two parts of the question arose from the previous statement of Cheek & Co., that they were in possession; and had not this statement been made, it would have been clear that the company desired to know whether the applicants had rented the property. And this view is strengthened by the preceding question and answer as to the character of the ownership. For, the applicants having stated that they owned the property in fee, what sense would there be in asking them if they were lessees? But probably the questions were printed ones, and not raised and put at the time, by reasons of answers given to previous questions.

Digitized by Google

If this were all, we should think, as we have said, that the court were possibly right. But the court seem to have overlooked one of the conditions of the policy having a direct bearing upon the character of the possession of the insured. The condition was, "if the property to be insured be held in trust or on commission, or be a leasehold, or other interest not absolute, it must be so represented to the company, and expressed in the policy in writing; otherwise the insurance, as to such property, shall be void." Now it is to be observed that the language of this clause is, "if the property to be insured * * * be a leasehold, not if the interest to be insured be a leasehold. If the latter had been the language, Cheek & Co. might indeed say that the insurance was not upon their leasehold interest, but upon their absolute interest, and therefore the condition was not broken. Nor can the term "property" in this connection be synonymous with "interest" in the sense named. It would be absurd to say that there must be a disclosure of a leasehold interest in the case of an insurance upon a lease. The fact that the insurance was upon a lease, would of course show that the interest held was a leasehold; and a lease could only be insured Eo nomine.

If this view be correct, it follows that there was a breach of the condition quoted, unless Cheek & Co. claim that not only the tax title was void, but also all the proceedings of the United States court, by which Brinkley was made receiver, and they given possession as lessees under him. Surely they would not care to knock out such a prop from underneath them. This would be in effect to deny their own statement that they were in possession, which was true; but this possession was under the lease from Brinkley; and they could not say that they were wrongfully in possession under him, under a void lease, because they had themselves instituted the proceedings in which they had thus obtained possession, and for the express purpose of regaining possession under the authority of the United States court. They must therefore uphold the lease; and upholding it, there is a plain breach of one of the conditions of the policies.

The point next considered by the court, the non-disclosure of the judicial proceedings concerning the tax title, is perhaps the most difficult one in the case; but we are strongly inclined to support the position of the court on this question.

There are two things in respect of the statements upon which a policy is issued which go to defeat the contract; these are misrepresentations and concealments. Now these terms are sometimes in effect synonymous, and sometimes distinct — a fact too often overlooked. For example, if I am asked if there are any incumbrances upon the property proposed to be insured, and I answer, there is one, or there is none, when in fact there are several; this may be called a misrepresentation or a concealment, according to the point from which it is viewed. But if, without any enquiry being made, I should fail to disclose the fact that there had been repeated efforts to burn the property within the past few days, or that a great fire was raging at the time of my application, in the immediate vicinity of the property to be insured, this would be called a concealment, and nothing else. Now, concealments of the first class named have the same effect, and are governed by the same rules of law, as misrepresentations; and it would prevent obscurity and difficulty if they were always called misrepresentations, and the term concealment restricted in its meaning to the second class. Calling then, the first class "misrepresentations," and the second "concealments," we shall see that, while there is an obvious distinction between them, in the way in which they arise, there is a perfect equivalent in effect.

Misrepresentations (as thus understood) are false answers to enquiries; which enquiries are made to ascertain the nature and extent of the risk. And these avoid the contract, either because they are material, or because they are warranties, though the answers be honestly made and believed to be true. But fraud vitiates contracts of insurance as well as other contracts; and fraud may arise in other ways than in making knowingly false answers to enquiries; and one of these ways is by concealment as understood above. Concealment, thus understood, is a fraud in insurance law, and avoids the policy on this ground. If the non-disclosure of a fact not enquired of, be not fraudulent (that is, known to be false), as well as material, or at least if the fact be not of an unusual and extraordinary character, it will not avoid the contract The term concealment implies this fraudulent notion; and the maxim in contracts and sales well conveys the idea—aliud est tacere, aliud celare. Indeed, though we have put in a saving clause, we seriously doubt if the non-disclosure of any extraordinary fact, not known to the applicant, or anything less than express fraud in a material point, will vitiate an insurance policy, in the absence of an enquiry, which would naturally tend to the disclosure of the fact.

This, upon careful examination, will be found to be the line of distinction upon which all the authoritative cases in insurance are decided; and this brings the law of insurance into approximate accord with general priciples. Contracts and sales are avoided for material misrepresentations (in the broad sense) and for fraud; but to keep silence merely as to a material fact has no effect. There must be something more than silence; the party complaining must have been put off his guard in some way by the other; there must be fraud. The law of insurance is not so rigid; and silence amounting to concealment in the above sense, without the something more than silence, is fatal to the contract.

We have given so much time to this point because of its importance and its bearing upon the question in the principal case. Now, conceding as we have reluctantly done, that the questions concerning the title to the property in controversy, and the character of the possession, were correctly construed by the court, particularly the question whether the property was leased—there appears to have been no enquiry which would naturally have led to the disclosure of the litigation in the United States Court. The first question, at most, should have only stated the government lien for taxes; and the second only called for information as to whether Cheek & Co. had leased the property. The supposed concealment must therefore fall under the second head; avoiding the policy only because it was fraudulent and material, or at least because it was concerning a fact of an extraordinary character.

Now, if the former view be taken, that the fact was material and fraudulently withheld, it is clear that the party alleging these facts must prove them. Such a non-dsclosure does not appear to have come within the terms of the warranty so as to have imposed the burden of proving its non-existence upon the assured. Warranties are strictly construed, and their terms are not extended, though sometimes they arises by implication. To have established this defence, then, the defendants must have proved that the fact of the litigation was material (a question of fact for the jury), and that it was fraudulently withheld; which does not appear to have been done.

If the view be taken that this non-disclosed fact was merely extraordinary; we answer that if such a case without fraud can be a defence, it must be because the risk is very greatly affected. An unusual fact, not increasing the hazard, would be of no importance, and clearly could not affect the policy; but if the fact be extraordinary by reason of its relation to the risk, we do not see how the defence in this particular could be made out. At best, it would be for the defendants to establish the point as a fact before the jury; no court would undertake to say that the pendency of such a litigation greatly enhanced the risk of burning.

In the discussion of this point it will be observed that it has passed for conceded that if there be a fraudulent non-disclosure where no enquiry is made, it is sufficient that the fact be merely material; but some of the authorities seem to indicate that the fact should be something stronger than this—that it should be a fact of extraordinary hazard. See Bufe v. Turner, 1 Ben. Ins. Cas. 92; Boyd v. Dubois, Ib. 94: Protection Ins. Co. v. Harmer, 2 Ohio, St. 473. We are confident it should be such where the fraud was not an active one, and something more than mere silence; otherwise all distinction between non-disclosure upon enquiry and concealment, as we use the term, is confounded. The result would be that enquiries would be useless, since the applicant would be required to disclose everything at all events.

